

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

REPORTS OF CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

12th November 1841.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 1.—ANDREW GARLAND, Petitioner, v. PETER STEWART and OTHERS, Respondents.

Proof—Presumption—Death—Heritable and Moveable—1. Circumstances in which a sailor, after an absence of thirty-seven years without being heard of, was presumed to be dead. 2. A sum of money, with interest, arising from a compulsory sale of the sailor's property under a Statute which expressly provided against any innovation of existing interests, found to be heritable, and allowed to be uplifted by his heir-at-law, on security to repeat in the event of his reappearance.

In 1802, Joseph Garland, a sailor belonging to Dundee, sailed from that port for the west of England, and in the spring of 1803, under apprehension of impressment for the navy, left his vessel at Beaumaris, and, travelling to Liverpool, embarked for Pictou in America. It was understood that he afterwards went to Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, and hired himself as seaman in an American vessel trading to the West Indies. Nothing has been heard of him since 1804. His age, at present, would be about fifty-eight.

Before leaving Dundee he had succeeded, under his father's settlement, to the pro indiviso half of a tenement of houses in that town,—the other half going to his brother, the petitioner. In 1811, this property was sold under an Act of Parliament (51 Geo. III. c. 15, local and personal), obtained by the town-council for improving and widening the street in which it is situated. The Act (§ 7) provides, that in the cases of persons labouring under any legal incapacity, the proceeds of any of their property sold under it, should be employed in paying off land-tax or other burdens affecting it, or failing them, in purchasing other houses and subjects of the like nature, the rights and titles being "devised to the same person or persons, or for their benefit, to the same uses and purposes, and under the same provisions, conditions, and limitations as the houses and other subjects taken and used for the purposes of this Act;" and § 10 enacted,

"That in case any person or persons, to whom any sum or sums of money shall be awarded for the purchase of any house or other subject to be purchased by virtue of this Act, shall refuse to accept the same, or shall not be able to make a good title to the premises, to the satisfaction of the said Magistrates and Town-council; or in case such person or persons, to whom such sum or sums of money shall be so awarded, as aforesaid, cannot be found; or if the person or persons entitled to such lands, houses, or other subjects, be not known or discovered, then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Magistrates and Council to order the said sum or sums of money, so awarded as aforesaid, to be paid into the Bank of Scotland, or Royal Bank of Scotland, to the credit of the parties interested in the said houses or other subjects" (describing them), "subject to the order, control, and disposition of the Court of Session; which said Court, on the application of any person or persons making claim to such sum or sums of money, or any part thereof, by petition, shall be, and is hereby empowered, in summary way of proceeding, or otherwise, as to the Court shall seem meet, to order the same to be laid out and vested in the public funds, and to order distribution thereof, or payment of the dividends thereof, according to the respective estate or estates, title or interest, of the person or persons making claim thereunto; and to make such other order in the premises as to the said Court shall seem just and reasonable."

The sum awarded for the property was £800, of which one-half was paid to the petitioner, and the other half consigned, in terms of the Act, for the behoof of Joseph Garland. On the presumption of his death, Andrew Garland presented the present petition for warrant to uplift the consigned money, with the interest which had accrued upon it.

The Court ordered intimation to be made in certain Scotch and English newspapers, and afterwards remitted to Lord Ivory, who ordered special intimation to be made to the petitioner's nearest of kin. These were originally three sisters, Helen, Barbara, and Jean Garland. Helen died in 1797, leaving one daughter, who died soon after. Barbara died unmarried in 1834. Jean died in 1832, leaving children, who, under the special intimation made to them, entered appearance as respondents. A record was accordingly made up, in which

The petitioner pleaded—1. Under the provisions of the Statute 51 Geo. III. c. 15, and also at common law, on account of the compulsory nature of the sale of Joseph Garland's property, the price of that property consigned on his account in the Bank of Scotland, remains heritable, and, on the supposition of his death, falls to the petitioner as his heir-at-law. 2. In regard to the interest due upon the principal sum consigned, that also falls to the heir-at-law, the presumption, in the absence of direct evidence of death, being, that Joseph Garland died before the consignment of the money, by which time he had been missing for a period of above seven years. 3. If it is not to be presumed that Joseph Garland died before Whitsunday 1812, in consequence of the probability of his having perished about the time when he was first amissing, then the presumption in favour of life ought to extend to the longest possible period, and therefore to a period subsequent to the death of Jean Garland, on 15th of October 1832, in which case the petitioner would be entitled to the interest of the consigned money, as Joseph's sole survivor and next of kin. 4. At all events, as Barbara

VOL. XIV.—No. I.

Garland survived Jean, she was entitled, and the petitioner, as her next of kin, is now entitled to one-half of any interest which may be held to be due to the executors or next of kin of Joseph Garland. 5. The prospect of the respondents succeeding as heirs of Joseph Garland is, in the circumstances, so extremely remote, as not to justify the retention of the money on any plea of the possibility that Joseph Garland may be in life.

The respondents pleaded—1. Whether the legal presumption for life has been overcome in the circumstances, is matter for the consideration of the Court; and until it be determined that there is sufficient in the circumstances of this case to presume that Joseph Garland is dead (which the respondents do not admit), there are no termini habiles on which this application can be supported to that effect or extent. 2. Supposing it to be held that Joseph Garland is to be presumed dead, the fair inference, in the circumstances, is, that he must have died subsequent to 1812, and prior to 1832, at least there are no circumstances tending to instruct that he is dead, which did not exist in 1832, and the presumption for his death, as at that date, is at least as strong as that he has died since. 3. Supposing Joseph Garland to be presumed dead, the fund in question is to be held moveable, and at all events, the interest thereof must be held as moveable, and the respondents, as representing their mother, who was one of the next of kin of Joseph Garland, are entitled to their proper share of said moveable funds.

The petition, as originally presented, prayed for authority to uplift the money consigned, with or without caution; but the petitioner afterwards put in a note, offering to find unexceptionable caution to repeat the money paid to him, in case Joseph Garland should ever appear to claim it.

The cause was this day advised on minutes of debate.

Lord President.—The only point of consequence appears to me to be, whether, on the presumption of Joseph Garland's death, we can apply it so as to exclude the respondents from claiming a share of the fund. There can be no doubt, I presume, as to the question of heritable and moveable. The price awarded for the house is evidently a surrogatum, and must be held to be heritable, both in terms of the Statute, which are very specific, and also at common law. The other point is more difficult; but unless we hold that the death took place at some date between 1812 and 1832, the respondents have no claim.

Lord Gillies.—The puzzling point is to fix the period of the death, and it would be desirable to have all possible light thrown upon it; but unfortunately there is none. My opinion is, that the petitioner is entitled to get all, or the greater part of the money consigned. If not a certainty, there is a very strong probability of the death; and since caution to repeat is offered, I cannot see, in the circumstances, that more is necessary. My own impression is, that the man died before 1812; for on an opposite supposition, his silence seems to me unaccountable. He was aware that a succession had opened to him, but he makes no demand upon it from 1804 to 1812. The presumption is, that he had died before the latter period,—not that he survived it, and died afterwards at some period between 1812 and 1832. In this view, the whole fund belongs to the petitioner, but it seems reasonable, in any view, to allow him to uplift the greater part of the sum on caution,—the remainder lying consigned.

Lord Fullerton.—The case is attended with considerable difficulty. It appears that advertisements have been inserted in newspapers in this country. A better method for ascertaining the fact would have been, to have inserted them in the newspapers of the country to which he is understood to have gone. In that way certain information might have been obtained, showing both when he died, and where. The essential point now is, who is to get the money? It is true the petitioner offers caution, but the respondents may also offer it, and then the question of preference can only be determined by the presumed period of the death.

Lord Mackenzie.—There are here two questions totally distinct. The first respects the nature of the fund; and I think there can be no doubt that it is heritable. There is nothing in the Act of Parliament to change its nature, and without that, it is clear at common law that it is heritable. The petitioner is therefore entitled to the fund consigned as a surrogatum, provided it is shown that an opening has been made for his succession by the death of the proprietor. Is the death then proved, as in a question between the petitioner and the absent party, or rather the Court, as protecting his interest? I rather think it is so proved. After the long lapse of time—the disappearance and total silence—I think the heir is entitled to get possession of the principal on proper security, and with the principal, the rents; for I view the interest as rent. But then comes the question with the executors. Before the succession opened, the rents fell into the estate of the absentee, and form part of the executry, and after it opened, they fell to the heir. It is therefore necessary, in order to decide the competing claims, to fix the time of presumed death. The time of sale is of no consequence. The question is, when did he die? If he died before 1812, the heir takes the whole, both heritage and rents; but on the other hand, if he survived that period, there was a time after the sale when the heir was not in possession, and when, of course, the rent or interest not belonging to him but to the deceased, must go to the heir in mobilibus. We must thus determine in some way when the death must be presumed to have taken place. It is certainly difficult to determine this. Nothing has been heard of the man for the long period of thirty-seven years, and we have no account of when or how he died. We hear of no battle, or pestilence, or shipwreck, or accident of any kind. If any light could be thrown on the subject, it would be satisfactory; but if none can be thrown on it, I agree with Lord Gillies, that in fixing the period, we must go back a good long way; for, as he never inquired after his succession, the probability is that he had died soon.

Lord President.—I agree with your Lordships, that the fund, after the sale, belonged to the heir-at-law. The Act of Parliament gives full effect to existing interests, and declares that they were not to be innovated. It is impossible for the respondents to claim the principal, but the question remains as to the interest; and the only way of determining it, is to fix the period at which death must be presumed to have taken place. It may be said that the period, however fixed, must be arbitrary. It is so; but considering the long absence without any communication by correspondence or otherwise, and the fact (for it is a strong circumstance) that this man went out of the way in time of war, and must have been exposed to its vicissitudes, I am inclined to adopt the view of Lord Gillies, that the death must have taken place at an early period, and that the petitioner ought to get the greater part of the money, on giving unexceptionable security.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords having advised the application for Andrew Garland, with the revised minutes of debate, Find him entitled in the meanwhile, in the circumstances of the case, to receive out of the fund consigned in the Bank of Scotland, the principal sum of £400, with one-half of the interest due thereon, since the term of Whitsunday 1812, on caution being found before extract to repay the same to the said Joseph Garland in case of his reappearing, or to any one in his right entitled to receive the same; and grant warrant to, authorise and ordain the treasurer of the Bank of Scotland to pay the said sums accordingly; and also grant warrant to, authorise and ordain the Magistrates and Town-council of Dundee, to deliver up to the petitioner the deposit-receipt of the treasurer of the said bank, in order to be given to the said treasurer upon payment, as now authorised: Also, find the respondents entitled to payment, in the meantime, out of the remaining fund, of the expense incurred by them in this process, on caution, in like manner, to repay the same to Joseph Garland, or to any one in his right entitled to receive it, should the Court so appoint; and remit the account of expenses to the auditor to tax the same and to report, and decern ad interim; reserving to the petitioner, and to the respondents, hereafter to apply to the Court in regard to the remaining funds; and appoint the Bank of Scotland to grant a new receipt for the balance of the said fund, to abide the orders of Court."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

NO. 2.—ALEXANDER DUKE OF HAMILTON, Objector,
v. JOHN URQUHART, Respondent.

Teinds—Stipend—Augmentation.—An heritor holding a feu-right to his teinds for payment of a certain quantity of meal annually to the titular, or, in his option, to the minister of the parish, had an amount of stipend laid upon his lands equal to the value of the teind-duty.—Held, in providing for a subsequent augmentation, that it must be laid proportionally upon the teinds of the lands of the titular and the heritor, after deducting from the gross amount of those of the heritor the teind-duty payable by him as old stipend.

This is a question in the process of locality of the augmented stipend which, in 1832, the Court modified to the ministers of the parish of Hamilton. The respondent is proprietor of certain lands and teinds in the parish, held of and under the Duke of Hamilton, who is titular of the parish. The words of the reddendo for the teinds are—"Paying to us, or at our option to the ministers of Hamilton and their successors," a certain quantity of oatmeal annually. The teind-duty thus payable was liable, according to the established principles of allocation, to be localised upon, primo loco, for the stipend of the minister, and was so appropriated by the titular from a very early period. The point raised in the present locality is, whether, in ascertaining the augmented stipend to be allocated upon the teinds of Mr Urquhart's lands, the teind-duty appropriated to the minister is, or is not to be deducted from their gross value.

The Duke of Hamilton submitted, that the deduction ought not to be allowed. Teinds, when in the natural possession of, and drawn by the titular, are considered as free teinds, liable to be allocated, primo loco, for the maintenance of the minister. But if the titular confer on the heritor a right to his teinds, the consideration being an annual payment or duty, such duty is also liable to be allocated upon primo loco. The teind-duty is not a payment by the heritor out of his teinds, but the consideration which the titular receives for transferring the absolute right to the teinds. If the respondent's proportion of the augmentation were to be allocated only on his surplus teind, after deducting the teind-duties, his teinds, in that case, would be held blench. The consideration for the right may or may not be the full value at the time. It cannot be assumed, in the present instance, that the duty was the full value of the teinds of the land at the time; and though they should increase twenty-fold in value, the titular would have no claim upon them. Farther, if the titular should stipulate for a sum of money instead of for an annual payment or duty, he is entitled to do with the price what he pleases, and the heritor could not deduct any part of the price, or the interest of it, from the gross amount of his teinds.

On the other hand, the respondent, assuming his rental to be such as to bring out the gross value of his teinds at £50, and assuming the extent of his teind feu-duty, already allocated to the minister, £20,—then, to the extent of the remaining £30, being the amount of the unexhausted teinds in his hands, he could not dispute that he was open to be allocated upon for augmented stipend pro rata with the other heritors, in respect of the unexhausted teinds in their hands. Beyond such proportional liability, however, it was considered that he could not be subjected in any payment on account of his teinds, either to the titular or to the minister. The teind-duty is the full equivalent of the teinds; and supposing that no increase in value had taken place, the principle contended for by the Duke would lead to nothing else than making the heritor, after he has paid the full value of his teinds under the name of teind-duty, pay the same amount over again, out of the stock, in name of augmented stipend. In the case of a proper sale of teinds under the Statutes, the titular is not required to allocate the interest of the price; but this is explained by the authorities to proceed on the difference between a forced sale at an undervalue by the Statutes, and a voluntary sale or feu where the full value is presumed to be taken. The principle for which his Grace contends stands ruled against him by a judgment of the Court, pronounced in an action at his own instance, and affirmed in the House of Lords. 15th December 1835; House of Lords, May 12, 1837, Sh. and M'L., II. p. 586.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, May 22, 1840:

"Finds that the respondent and sundry other heritors in the parish hold feu-charters of their several lands, and of the teinds thereof, originally granted by the Hamilton family to their predecessors in the seventeenth century: Finds that the said feu-charters contained stipulations, whereby the feuars, respectively, were bound to pay or deliver certain sums or quantities of victual to the superior, or, in his option, to the minister of Hamilton, annually, in name of teind-duties: Finds that these teind-duties were in general appropriated to the minister, and paid by the heritor to him, to account of the old stipend payable at the date of the feu-charters, and that the noble superior's family, as lay proprietors in the parish, paid the balance of the old stipend: Finds that the teind-duties being thus applied, exhausted all further claim on the part of the superior for teinds for the several years in which they were paid: Finds that, when a subsequent augmentation was awarded in 1697, the same was provided for by certain small additions made to the teind-duties of the feuars, which were, in many instances, specified in the renewed charters granted by the Duke's predecessors, while the remainder of the stipend, as thus augmented, continued to be paid by the noble pursuer's predecessors: Finds that augmentations were awarded in or about 1796 and 1814, and that these augmentations were provided for by a final scheme of locality in 1828, which proceeded on the principle, that the allocations for the old stipends were not to be disturbed, and that the said later augmentations were to be laid proportionally on the teinds of the lands of his Grace, and of the feuvers holding right to their teinds (in respect of their several valued rents, as ascertained either by decrees of valuation, or failing these, by schemes of the proven rental), but always after deduction from the said teind of the old stipend laid upon the lands of the said feuvers respectively: Finds that the same principle of allocation must be followed in apportioning the augmentation of 1832; and remits the case to the clerk to make up a scheme of locality in conformity with these findings: Finds the respondent, Mr Urquhart, entitled to expenses from his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report."

Against this interlocutor the Duke presented a reclaiming note, praying that it should be recalled, and found,

"that in allocating the stipend upon the respondent's lands and teinds, the teind-duty payable by him must first be allocated as free teind in the titular's hand; that such teind-duty does not form any part of the stipend exigible out of the respondent's teinds; and that the stipend effeiring to his land falls to be allocated upon the teinds rateably with the titular and the other heritors having heritable rights to their teinds, irrespective of said teind-duty, and to remit to the clerk to prepare a locality in conformity with these findings."

The draft of an interlocutor, such as the Duke proposed, was submitted to the Court, and was conceived in the following terms:

"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties, recal the last two findings in the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find that the teind-duties fall to be primo loco localled; and that such farther payments of stipend, if any, as may have been made under the former decrees of locality by the respondent and pursuer respectively, are to be continued; and, quoad the augmented stipend, find that the same falls to be allocated upon all the heritors having heritable rights to their teinds, in proportion to the real rents of their lands, or decrees of valuation respectively, but without deducting from the augmented stipend so to be allocated the amount of the teind-duties primo loco appropriated by the titular in payment of the old stipend; and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to give effect to these findings," &c.

At the advising (5th March 1841) it was urged, that the decision in the case of Chesters in 1738, Duke of Douglass v. Elliott, February 1, 1738, supported the principle for which the Duke contended; and a written argument was appointed, chiefly to give parties an opportunity of examining the pleading in that locality, and the principle upon which the allocation of stipend was there made. The particulars of that case are as follows:—The Court modified to the minister of Chesters a stipend of 1200 merks, and 100 merks for communion elements. The old stipend was 900 merks, and consequently the augmentation amounted to 300 merks. The old stipend had been paid to the minister by the Duke of Douglass, while his Grace drew from the lands of Ashtrees 30 merks, and from the lands of Woolie and Wolfhoplie 20 merks of teind-duty. In the process of locality, the Duke of Douglass, as patron, and as such having right to the teinds of the parish, and right also to allocate the stipend, so as to "exceed his own lands, as far as the other teinds will go," lodged a scheme of locality of the teinds of the other heritors, which he proposed wholly to exhaust in the first instance, and then to burden the teinds of his own lands merely with what should be necessary to make up the amount of the modified stipend. To this it was objected by Elliott, that he had an heritable right to his teinds, subject to the burden of 100 merks of teind-duty; that in regard to the old stipend, he was subject only to the extent of his teind-duty; and in regard to the augmentation, it was ultimately found by the Court that it fell "to be allocated upon the teinds of the Duke and William Elliott their land, proportionally to their respective rents." The interlocutor does not state, that from the teinds of the parties there was to be deducted such amount of old stipend as they respectively paid, in allocating upon them their proportional shares of the augmentation; or that as regarded the teinds of William Elliott, deduction was to be made of his teind-duty prior to his proportion of the augmented stipend being calculated; but from an examination of the record, it was admitted by both parties, that in adjusting the several proportions of the augmentation, such deduction was actually given.

At the final advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I concur in the conclusiveness of the arithmetical details given in the respondent's minute, as to the effect of the decision in the case of Chesters. But I have always felt it to be an anomaly in teind law, that if a titular confer upon an heritor a right to his teinds for a price, he may do with it what he pleases, and is himself no farther liable; whereas, if he feus the teinds, the teind-duty is first allocated for ministers' stipend, and is therefore just so much out of the titular's pocket. On the whole, I agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I see no difficulty in this case. The specific form of the objection may not be the same as that urged in some of the previous cases, but the argument is the same, and has been repeatedly refuted and repelled. In the case of Chesters, the teind-duties were first deducted in allocating the augmentation; and if it were to be otherwise in this case, it would be an allocation on the stock.

Lord Meadowbank concurred.

No. 3.—MRS CAROLINE KENNEDY and ANDREW KENNEDY, Petitioners, v. GEORGE STEELL, Respondent.

Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Divorce—Circumstances in which the Court refused to remove a child from the custody of a stranger, on an application, presented after the father's death, in name of the mother, who had been divorced for adultery, and of her brother.

Mrs Caroline Kennedy, designating herself "late wife of James Currie, now deceased," presented a petition, with consent of her brother, Andrew Kennedy, professor of music, Dublin, praying for the removal of her son, Charles Wilmot Currie, from the custody of George Steill, writer in Glasgow, to a boarding school in Edinburgh. Steill lodged answers, in which he stated that Mrs Caroline Kennedy "was divorced by her husband, the late James Currie, on the ground of adultery, and that, since the dissolution of that marriage, she has continued the same criminal connexion, of which several children, now alive, are the fruits." He further stated, that his connection with the child originated as follows:—In May 1835, a person of his acquaintance, now settled in London, "mentioned, as if casually, that a friend of his, an English gentleman of the name of Wilmot, then resident with his wife in Edinburgh, was contemplating a visit to England, and perhaps to the continent, and was desirous, in the meantime, of placing their infant child, a boy, under the care of some person of respectability in Glasgow, or its neighbourhood." The respondent and his wife having no children of their own, agreed to take charge of the child. A few days after, the pretended Mrs Wilmot called upon the respondent, and after apologizing for the unavoidable absence of her husband on business at Newcastle, produced a letter from the person who had first introduced the subject to the respondent, in which he stated that Mr Wilmot had left with him full powers to arrange every thing as to board. Two days after the child, then about thirteen months old, was brought to the respondent's house by Mr Wilmot's servant. For some time the respondent had no doubt that the child was truly the child of a Mr Wilmot, and that the lady who had called as his mother, was Mrs Wilmot; but his suspicions having been awakened, he made inquiry, and ascertained that no Mr Wilmot existed, and that Mrs Wilmot was no other than the petitioner, at that time living separate from her husband Mr Currie, and shortly afterwards divorced by him for adultery. In September 1835, the petitioner, still under the assumed name of Wilmot, applied for the child to be delivered up to her, but the respondent now refused; and having made the person who first negotiated about the child aware of the discoveries he had made, entered into an arrangement, in which he stipulated, that the degrading connexion on the part of the mother should cease, and that she should not interfere with the residence or education of the child. The connection continued to subsist, but no further interference with the child was attempted till 1840, when, in consequence of the death of Mr Currie, the child's presumed parent, a lucrative succession opened to him. Mr Currie having died intestate, the nearest agnate might have served as the child's tutor-at-law, but Mrs Kennedy, with her brother, presented a petition craving the appointment of a certain individual as factor loco tutoris. The nearest agnate appeared to oppose the appointment, but ultimately an arrangement was alleged to have been entered into, by which the agnate, on condition of recognising the pupil's legitimacy, and renouncing all right to the office of tutor-at-law, was to receive £500 from the pupil's succession. The respondent further alleged, that the object proposed in the removal of the child to Edinburgh, was to educate him in the Roman Catholic religion, to which both the mother and the factor loco tutoris belonged, though the father and all the relatives on the father's side were Protestants. Along with his answers, the respondent produced certificates of his respectability from clergymen in Glasgow, and also a letter from the nearest agnate, stating, that though he had agreed not to claim the office of tutor-at-law, and did not wish to do any thing inconsistent with that agreement, he had a clear interest, as the child's heir-at-law, to see to his comfort and improvement, and that as he was convinced he could not be in better hands than with the respondent and his wife, to remove him from their custody was contrary to his wishes.

The petitioner, in her replies, did not expressly deny the respondent's statements, or allege that the child's comfort was not properly attended to, but she insisted on the relationship of herself and her brother to the child, and the feelings and obligations thence arising, as justifying her application. Divorce only destroyed the patrimonial interests of the parties, but did not affect the rights arising out of relationship. The mother of an illegitimate child has, in the general case, a right to its custody; and it was impossible that the petitioner could be in a worse position. Besides, the respondent had no title whatever to the custody of the child. It was placed under his charge by the petitioner, and therefore, whatever her rights might be in the abstract, or in a question with parties having some legitimate title, it was clear, conformably to the case of Forbes v. Hume, March 2, 1832, that the respondent could not be heard in opposition to the present application. The concurrence of the nearest agnate did not alter the matter. As he was the heir of the pupil, there was an insuperable objection to his having any thing to do with his custody; the more especially as he had actually lodged a note, when the application was made for a factor loco tutoris, in which he denied the pupil's legitimacy, and claimed his succession for himself. "No doubt it is true that the threatened opposition to the appointment of a factor was prevented, and, as alluded to in the answers, a sum of money was agreed to be given him, on the engagement that he should refrain from injuring the prospects and happiness of the pupil, by making the unfortunate circumstances which attended the connexion of the parents a topic of discussion in a public court." It was now evident that the agnate had not kept this engagement.

The respondent lodged duplies, in which he denied that the petitioner had any title to make the present application,—maintaining, that though divorce might not dissolve the natural ties of affection between parent and child, it dissolved all the legal rights arising out of marriage, and among them, the right of custody or guardianship of the children. But, independently of the legal effect of the decree of divorce, the conduct of the petitioner was in itself sufficient to exclude her from any interference with the child.—Case of Walker, March 10, 1824.

At advising,

Lord President.—The present application raises questions of great importance. Independently of the abstract point of title, there is matter in these papers which calls distinctly and pointedly for the interference of the Court, in order to protect the interests of this pupil. Our attention, in the Second Division, was lately called to the case of an individual of some status, who had the misfortune to become pregnant during her widowhood. A child of the marriage was at the time in her custody, and the question was, whether, in the circumstances, it could be continued. We were satisfied that the point having been brought under the notice of the Court, we were bound to interfere and see that the boy should be removed from her custody, and we accordingly gave an order to that effect. The present is a much stronger case; for I must say I have never read papers displaying more coolness, or greater mystery. The facts are not fairly brought out. We see the name of the woman, and we may have our suspicions as to that of her paramour, but though it may be disagreeable to make such statements, parties should speak out, and let us know exactly how the matter stands. This much however appears. The woman is divorced as an adulteress. The husband lives for some time after, and dies leaving a fund available to the pupil. Then the mother, after leaving the child to remain a number of years, almost unnoticed, with Mr Steell, whose respectability is not questioned, comes forward with the present application to remove him, and place him in a boarding-school in Edinburgh. Now, it is not necessary to discuss the abstract question, how far an application of this nature can competently be made by a divorced woman. It is enough to know that this woman actually continues to live in a state of reprobation. Such being the case, we are called upon not to give the slightest countenance to her interference, either to fix the residence, or control the education of the child. I say nothing as to the religion in which it is alleged she wishes to bring him up. With that we have nothing to do; but we are bound to refuse an application, the result of which, in all probability, will be, to give the control to this woman herself. It is true that her brother concurs with her, but his application appears to be only pro forma, and there is no reason to presume that he would afterwards interfere. But supposing we refuse the present application, the question still remains, whether we should leave the boy where he is, or place him elsewhere. Were there any doubt as to the respectability of the respondent, it would be our duty to remit to the Sheriff to inquire; but from the certificates produced, it is evident that there is no ground of objection on that head. Besides, in allowing the child to remain with Mr Steell at present, we are not deciding that he shall have the custody in all time to come. Circumstances may arise to make that inexpedient. It is of importance to observe, that Mr Steell has the concurrence of the nearest agnate. But then it is said that the agnate has been bought off, and that £500 of the pupil's money has been given him to withdraw his opposition to the appointment of a factor loco tutoris. This is another peculiar feature in the present case. I of course reserve my opinion upon it till the proper time; but it is more than doubtful if the Court will ultimately sanction such an application of the pupil's funds. I am clear that we are not called upon, either in law or in the exercise of our equitable jurisdiction, to grant this petition.

Lord Gillies.—I concur in all that has been said by your Lordship. My only doubt is, whether we ought not to go a step farther than your Lordship has proposed. This woman is in petitorio. The first thing, then, we have to do is, to look to her title, and consider her object. Now, the object evidently is, to withdraw the child from the custody of the respondent, and place him in her own. It is said, indeed, that she does not want this, but that she merely wishes to transfer him to a boarding-school in this town. Did we grant this application, there is nothing to prevent his removal to-morrow. The lady who keeps this boarding-school is not in Court. We can neither compel her to undertake the custody of the child, nor prevent her from giving it up. The concurrence of the brother makes no alteration in the case, since it is evidently given for the petitioner's interest. Then I see no ground for objecting to Mr Steell. The certificates produced, show that he is sufficiently qualified; and the propriety of his management hitherto is proved by the admissions of the applicant herself. Looking at the whole circumstances,—the ridiculous and false correspondence when the child was first intrusted to Steell,—the indifference manifested by the mother for years, till the succession opened to him,—and the continued guilt plainly charged upon her, and not attempted to be denied,—I cannot listen to any proposal to remove the child, still less to remove him to the custody of a person recommended by the present petitioner. Had she alleged that Mr Steell was not a proper person to have the charge, it would have been our duty to inquire into the allegation. But this is not the case. She wishes him removed, merely because she prefers to have him with a person through whom she would ultimately have him at her sole disposal. But the matter ought not to rest here. We have no direct power, as in Chancery, to make this pupil a ward of the Court, as he would have been made there, in circumstances much less aggravated: But still he is to be regarded as in some sense a ward, as it appears that a factor loco tutoris has been appointed, and has his estate under management. Now, it is said that the factor, in order to remove opposition to his appointment, has paid away a large sum of money belonging to his pupil. If he has done so, are we not bound to take cognizance of the fact? It may be that when the pupil comes of age, this sum of £500, said to have been paid, may go for nothing, and that he may be restored against this dilapidation of his patrimony. If it is true that the factor has given this money to silence opposition, he ought to be called on to appear and explain.

Lord Mackenzie.—I take the same view. If a petition were given in, stating that the child had fallen into evil hands, and praying the Court to rescue him, even a divorced mother must have been listened to, and certainly far more an uncle. Divorce does not go to destroy the relationship of the mother; for I have no doubt that, in certain circumstances, she would be bound to give aliment. Neither does divorce affect the relationship of collaterals; for instance, the father of the mother. The divorce may be itself the very reason for allowing his interference. Suppose a father were to come forward and say, that he had the misfortune to have an adulterous daughter, and that his grandchildren by her had fallen into improper hands,—could it be said that he has no title to interfere? That is out of the question. The present case, however, is not of this nature. The petitioner does not say that the respondent is an improper custodian; but she wishes one recommended by herself, and her brother for her; for he is living at a distance, and evidently does not mean to take any charge. She is doubtless entitled to come into Court; but we are not bound to grant what she asks, as she does not want our assistance to prevent injury to the child. The question is, ought we to disturb the possession of Steell, and give it to another, merely on the mother's recommendation? If there were any doubt of Steell's qualifications, we might institute inquiry. But nothing of the kind is alleged. But what has become of the factor loco tutoris? In questions of this nature, it is usual for him to give assistance to the Court. Here he apparently declines to come forward; and I don't wonder at it, for there is something in the matter very strange. It is said that the relations on the father's side have been bribed not to take the office of tutor, and that a factor loco tutoris was accordingly appointed, I presume, on the application of the mother and her brother. This case of the factor might have been brought directly before the Court, but the father's relations are not disposed to interfere. They have got the money, and are not disposed to give it back. Supposing that to be the case, I think it is clearly our duty, ex parte judicis, as in a matter between us and the factor, to call upon him for explanation. Suppose no explanation is given, is it our business to remain till the party who has been bribed sees it proper to bring a complaint? Unquestionably not. Our duty would be to remove the present factor immediately, and appoint another, with whose help we may be able, if necessary, to find a proper custodian too. I think we ought, in the first place, to refuse the petition, and call upon the factor to clear up this alleged transaction.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur so entirely with Lord Mackenzie, that I think it unnecessary to make any remarks.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Refuse the desire of the petition, and decern; find expenses due, and remit the account, when given in, to the auditor to tax and report: Further, appoint the factor loco tutoris for Charles Wilmot to give in a minute stating the facts connected with his appointment, and explaining that appropriation of the funds of the said Charles Wilmot which is set forth by the respondent as having taken place."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 4.—CHRISTIE of Durie, Petitioner.

Statute—Road Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, § 65—Entailed Proprietor—Expenses—Road trustees, with a view to acquire a right of ferry belonging to an entailed proprietor, made offer of £567 as the value, which was refused; the proprietor, however, made no tender of it for any specific sum, and a jury was summoned to ascertain the value. The verdict was for £625, and the proprietor, in applying to the Court to regulate the investment of the fund for the benefit of the succeeding heirs of entail, craved that the expense of realising and investing the fund should be deducted from it—Held that he must pay his own expenses in realising the fund, but that he might deduct the expense of investing it.

The petitioner was entailed proprietor of a right of ferry, which was taken by the road trustees under the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43. The ferry was valued at £2385. 8s., and the trustees offered £567. The proprietor, considering the great difference between the offer of the trustees, and the valuation which he had himself procured to be made, refrained from asking any specific sum. A jury was in consequence summoned to ascertain the value, and they fixed it, by their verdict, at £625. The expenses of the proceedings are regulated by the 65th section of the Act:

“And be it enacted, that in case such jury shall award a greater compensation than the trustees shall have offered, but less than the proprietor or occupier shall have required, the expenses of the process and proceedings shall be borne by such trustees and the said proprietor or occupier, equally; but in case the said jury shall award to such proprietor or occupier the sum so required, or any greater sum, the whole of the said expenses shall be paid by such trustees; and, on the other hand, if the said jury shall award the sum offered by such trustees, or a less sum, the whole of the said expenses shall be paid by the said proprietor or occupier.”

The proprietor, in applying to the Court for a remit to the Sheriff to inquire into the value of certain lands which he proposed to purchase with the price, and to entail for the benefit of the succeeding heirs of entail, craved at the same time that the expenses of realising and investing the fund should first be deducted from it. He pleaded—that it was a casus improvisus; there being no provision in the Act for the case of a proprietor not asking a specific sum as the value of the subject, but getting more than the trustees offered.

Lord Medwyn—The object of the Statute is signified in the 65th section, and the proprietor was bound to condescend upon a specific sum, which would have brought the transaction under the operation of the Statute.

Lord Moncreiff—It is evidently a casus improvisus, for it is not imperatively laid down in the Statute that the proprietor shall claim a specific sum. If the trustees make him an offer, he may refuse it, and then he tries the value, for the benefit of the heirs of entail generally. It would be hard, in such a case, to make the heir in possession pay out of his own pocket the expense of producing such a fund for the future heirs of entail.

Lord Meadowbank—The sale of the subject here was compulsory under the Statute, whether held in fee-simple or under entail. If held in fee-simple, the proprietor must have paid his own expenses, having made no tender to the public at all. Now, is there any ground for applying a different rule to an heir of entail? The trustees made an offer of a specific sum, and the jury found a verdict for a greater. But the proprietor made no offer, which it is contemplated by the Statute that he should make, in order to put it in the power of the trustees to accept of it. The 64th section provides, that where the proprietor “delays or refuses to treat,” recourse is to be had to a jury to ascertain the value. Having delayed to treat, he is presumed to have made an offer which the trustees could not accept of. I am therefore of opinion that he must pay his own expenses, without deducting them from the fund realised.

Lord Medwyn—With regard to the expense of investing the fund, I think it may be taken from the fund.

The Court allowed the expense of investing the fund to be deducted, but not the expense of realising it.

Act. Dunlop.—[J.W.]

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.R.)

No. 5.—MAGISTRATES and TOWN-COUNCIL of ELGIN and OTHERS, Suspenders, v. MESSRS GATHERER and WALKER, Chargers.

Church—Manse—Statute 1663, c. 21—Where a manse has once existed, the repair or rebuilding of it falls under the second branch of the Statute 1663, to which the restriction of the expense to £1000 Scots does not apply.

Process—Citation—Res Judicata—1. An edictal citation of “heritors, feuars, and others liable in the expense of a manse and offices,” in a parish partly burgh and partly landward, is sufficient to include the magistrates and town-council of the burgh. 2. A suspension, by individual heritors, of a charge for their proportion of the expense of building a manse, does not form a res judicata as to the whole body of heritors, though the suspenders pleaded the general question of liability, and obtained a judgment finding that the minister’s claim of a manse could not be sustained.—Question, What would the effect have been if these individual heritors had proceeded by declarator?

The parish of Elgin is partly burgh and partly landward, and the ministerial charge is collegiate. Since the period of the Revolution neither of the ministers has possessed a manse, but there seems sufficient evidence to prove that at an earlier period one manse at least existed, and was destroyed by fire. In 1741, the ministers applied to the presbytery and obtained decree for a manse. Opposition was offered by the heritors, and the matter was dropped. In 1764, the presbytery again gave decree for a manse. A stent roll was prepared and approved by the presbytery, who decerned for the proportion to be borne by each heritor, and appointed payment to be made to William Troup, mason in Elgin, who had contracted for building the manse. Several of the heritors having refused to pay, a charge was given by Troup,—the charge being to furnish a manse to the second minister of Elgin. The only heritors who suspended the charge were the Earl of Fife, Stuart of Pittendrich, and Duff of Milton, who ultimately succeeded in obtaining a judgment, finding, “that in this case neither of the ministers of Elgin are entitled to a manse upon the Act of Parliament 1663, and therefore assoilzie the defenders, and decern.” Nothing farther was done in the matter till 1828, when Dr William Gordon, the senior minister, petitioned the presbytery to design him a manse and offices. The presbytery ordered an edictal citation to be given “to the whole heritors, feuars and others in the parish of Elgin, liable in the expense of a manse and offices,” and afterwards gave decree ordaining them to build. The decree was not resisted, but an arrangement was entered into by which the landward heritors, including the representatives of the three who had succeeded in the suspension of 1764, agreed to pay an annual sum of £50 in lieu of a manse. This arrangement subsisted till 1838, a period of about ten years, when Dr Gordon died. The two incumbents, Messrs Walker and Topp, then presented separate petitions to the presbytery, each praying to have a manse designed to himself. The presbytery granted the prayer of Mr Walker's petition (Mr Topp entering a protest, which, however, was not ultimately insisted in), and appointed the "heritors, feuars, and others liable in the expense of a manse and offices," to be cited by edict, "in order that, with their concurrence, the necessary steps may be taken for providing the accommodation applied for by Mr Walker." Ultimately, the presbytery found "that Mr Walker, as oldest incumbent in the parish of Elgin, is entitled to a manse and office-houses, and therefore ordain the said feuars, heritors and others, to build the same." No contract for building having been entered into by the heritors, the presbytery appointed a committee to advertise for contracts, and also to prepare a scheme of assessment, and afterwards entered into a contract to build a manse, offices, and garden wall, for the sum of £990, which sum they accordingly found "was a burden upon the whole landward and burgal heritage of the parish of Elgin, and falls to be borne by the proprietors thereof in proportion to their real rents, and decern accordingly." The decrees of the presbytery, in their previous assessments, had been given on stent rolls made up according to the valued rent, and including the landward heritors only. The proportion of the whole assessment to be borne by the burgh was stated at £433. 4. 8; and this sum was decerned for both against the Magistrates and Town-council, as primarily liable for the community, and also against the individual burgal proprietors. Messrs Gatherer and Walker, writers in Elgin, were appointed collectors of the assessment.

The Magistrates and Town-council having refused to pay the first instalment, a charge was given them for the amount. A charge was also given to Alexander Hay and James Walker, two of the individual heritors within burgh, for their respective proportions of the instalment. Both charges were suspended, and the bills having been passed on caution, the processes were conjoined.

The suspenders pleaded—

1. The proceedings of the presbytery, and the charge following upon these proceedings, have been, from want of due citation and otherwise, irregular in point of form, and on this ground alone the charge ought to be suspended. 2. It was incompetent for the presbytery to decern for a manse in favour of Mr Walker, in face of a competing claim by his colleague Mr Topp; and they ought to have delayed proceedings until it had been decided in the competent tribunal which of the parties had a right to the manse, or whether indeed either of them possessed such right. No proceedings could competently be taken in the church courts against those alleged to be liable for a manse, till they had it definitely settled by the civil courts that they were liable, and if liable, had it so settled which of the clergymen was entitled to the manse, as to protect them from all claim at the instance of the other. 3. It is res judicata by the judgment of the Court in the process of 1769, that neither of the ministers of Elgin is entitled to a manse, and that no legal right to a manse exists within this parish. 4. Supposing a legal right to a manse to exist, no part of the expenses of the manse can legally be laid on the royal burgh of Elgin, or on any of the proprietors of heritage within burgh. It is settled law, that no legal claim for a manse exists within a royal burgh; and although the rule is different where a landward district is attached, yet as this difference arises in respect of the landward district, it is on the landward district that the burden should exclusively fall; and the burgh ought not to be made worse by having a landward district attached to it than it would otherwise have been. 5. At all events, supposing any portion of the expense to fall upon the burgh, it must be allocated betwixt the burgh on the one hand, and the landward district on the other, according to the valued rent effeiring to each respectively. 6. The decree of the presbytery, which is directed both against the Magistrates and Council, and also against the individual proprietors of heritage within burgh, is altogether unwarrantable and illegal. 7. The limitation in the Statute 1663, c. 21, restricting the sum to be decerned for to £1000 Scots, applies, and is in force in the present instance, which regards not the repair of a manse, but the erection of a manse where none exists.

The chargers pleaded—

1. The whole proceedings of the presbytery, and the charge given to the suspenders, have been regular and valid. (1.) The suspenders were duly and legally cited under the general citation given to heritors, being heritors in the sense of the Statute 1663, as legally representing the burgh proprietors, and that without any reference to the criterion of valued or real rent. Case of Lanark, 24th January 1832. (2.) The chargers had not acted counter to any usage in the parish as to parochial assessments, there being no usage whatever in regard to such matters. No instance has occurred of any assessments, except in the case of the new church built in 1825, when a voluntary assessment was agreed to both by the landward and burgal heritors, which could constitute no precedent as to the future. Farther, it had not then been decided that Magistrates are primarily liable for the assessments laid on burgh property for building manses. (3.) It was perfectly competent to charge the Magistrates for the cumulo amount of the assessment on the burgh property, under deduction of the sums paid or to be paid by the individual proprietors, more especially as many of these proprietors entirely dispute their liability under the decree of the presbytery. (4.) The whole proceedings of the presbytery being known to the Magistrates, and the question of their liability being distinctly brought under their notice by the landward heritors, and deliberated upon by them, they are in mala fide in bringing forward any plea that they were not duly cited to the proceedings. 2. The decree in the former action in 1769 does not constitute a res judicata, so as to deprive the present ministers of the parish of Elgin of the legal right to a manse. 3. (1.) The charge in this case being given, not for a manse to any one particular minister, but simply for a manse to the minister of Elgin, disposes of no question of right as between the ministers themselves, and it is jus tertii to the suspenders to found on any competing claim brought on the part of Mr Topp. (2.) Supposing the charge to be considered as proceeding on a decree finding that Mr Walker is to have right to the manse, the presbytery are, in the first instance, the judges which of the two ministers is entitled to the possession of the manse. (3.) The protests taken by Mr Topp have been fallen from, and no attempt is made on his part to disturb the finding of the presbytery. (4.) The parochial accommodation in this case being immediately required, and the manse being now in the course of being built, the expense requires to be immediately provided for. The suspenders are not entitled to anticipate that neither of the ministers is to obtain immediate access to the manse when finished, or to withhold payment of their contribution on the plea of a possible competition between them for its possession. 4. The provision in the Act 1663, by which the expense of manses, &c., was limited to £1000 Scots, has been long departed from; and the sum decerned for by the presbytery was moderate in the circumstances, and according to law and practice. Dingwall against Gardiner, November 17, 1816, F. C., affirmed on appeal; Shaw's Cases, 2d March 1821. 5. According to the law as now fixed, the minister of a royal burgh having a landward district annexed, has a right to a manse; the burgh property is liable to be assessed for the expense of building such manse, along with that of the landward heritors; and the Magistrates, as representing the community, are, in the first instance, liable for the assessment laid on the burgh, with relief against the individual burgh proprietors. Auld, 13th June 1827; 2 Wilson and Shaw, 5th July 1828; 6 Sh. and D.;

and Lanark, 24th January 1832; 10 Sh. and D. 243. 6. No usage and no circumstance of any kind exists in the case of the parish of Elgin by which the general rule of law is altered or affected; the landward heritors having always reserved their claim against the burgh heritors; and the arrangement of 1825 being a single instance, and that of a voluntary assessment. 7. The assessment has in this case been properly levied according to the real rent. But the suspenders have no interest to object to the principle of the assessment; because, supposing the assessment to be levied according to the valued rent (as to which it is admitted that the Magistrates represent the community), the result would only be to lay an increased amount of assessment upon the burgh property. 8. The liability of the individual heritors for a proportion of the expense of building the manse, as having acquired a share of church accommodation, does not affect the primary liability of the Magistrates to implement the decree charged on, but merely insures to them their relief against the individual proprietors.

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause on cases, with the following note:

"As the questions argued in these papers are of some importance in parochial law, and the parties have indicated a wish to obtain the opinion of the Court upon them with as little delay as possible, having prepared and printed elaborate cases on the points which fall to be decided in the first instance, the Lord Ordinary thinks it best at once to report the case to the Court.

"It is explained in the revised cases, that the parish of Elgin is composed partly of a landward district and partly of the ancient burgh. It is a collegiate charge; and it seems to be admitted, that, since the Revolution till the present question occurred, there has been no manse possessed by either of the ministers. At the same time, there are certainly strong circumstances stated to show that one, if not both of the ministers, possessed a manse at an anterior period.

"Farther, it rather appears from the statements on record, which are not denied, that both of the ministers in this parish enjoy, equally, certain grounds which are held by them as glebe.

"The ministers, as might have been expected, do not appear to have been satisfied with the want of a manse. Accordingly, in 1741, they applied to the presbytery for a decree for a manse, which was awarded; but as the ministers did not insist on that decree, it was dropped. But, in 1764, the presbytery again originated a proceeding for having a manse provided to one of the ministers,—and, after various proceedings, the presbytery, in April 1765, gave decree against the heritors for £335. 17s. 11d. Sterling as the expense of a manse to one of the ministers, and approved of a contract entered into with one William Troup for building the manse, and of a stent roll allocating the assessment among the heritors.

"That decree was afterwards suspended by the Court by interlocutor, quoted fully in the papers:—but the documents produced establish certain specialties well deserving to be kept in view in the present discussion. (1.) It would appear from the suspension presented in 1767 (No. 47 of process,) that the charge then given was to furnish a manse as for the second minister of Elgin. (2.) The suspension and process farther show, that the only parties who then litigated and opposed the decree were the Earl of Fife, Colonel Stuart of Pittendrich, and Mr Duff of Milton. (3.) No opposition, or indeed appearance, was then made for the burgh of Elgin. It appears also, that although the stent roll bore, in words, that it was the "stent and proportion among the heritors of the town and parish of Elgin," there was no assessment on the houses and tenements within burgh.—See the roll, No. 48 of process. At the same time the Magistrates, as representing the community, were assessed for sundry possessions held by them in the landward part of the parish, which it does not appear they resisted.

"It is explained in the record, that the Court, in 1769, found, in the process between the contractor and the three heritors who opposed the decree of the presbytery, "neither of the ministers entitled to a manse under the Act of Parliament 1663;" after which no farther proceedings took place till 1828. In that year, Dr William Gordon, then the senior minister of Elgin, took steps for enforcing his claim to a manse; the presbytery accordingly gave decree for a manse to Dr Gordon; but the landward heritors entered into an agreement, by which they became bound to pay the reverend incumbent £50 annually in lieu of a manse, and that agreement seems to have been acquiesced in, and implemented by all the heritors (including the representatives of Lord Fife, Mr Duff of Milton, and Colonel Stuart of Pittendrich, who opposed the manse in 1767,) till Dr Gordon's death in 1838, a period of nearly ten years.

"The proceedings were renewed in 1838 for a manse to Mr Walker, who, by the death of Dr Gordon, now became senior minister of Elgin. The presbytery again gave decree for a manse; but now, for the first time, that decree was issued upon a stent roll, which included not only the landward heritors, but the Magistrates and Council as a corporation—said to be the Crown vassal of the whole houses and tenements within burgh—and also the proprietors of these subjects themselves. The questions have been waived for the present, whether the Magistrates and Council, or even the proprietors within burgh, are liable to any extent for the expense of a manse, and if so liable, on what principle they should be assessed, till other preliminary pleas be disposed of, which, if decided in favour of the suspenders, may supersede the assessment altogether. The pleas are fully argued in the revised cases; and it will now be sufficient for the Lord Ordinary briefly to state his views with regard to them.

"I. The Magistrates urge an objection in point of form to the alleged citation given to them before the presbytery. The presbytery issued an edict as against the heritors of the town and parish of Elgin; on that edict the Magistrates did not at first appear, but they were well apprized of the proceedings; they requested time to consult counsel in October 1838, (see Nos. 15 and 16 of process,) and thereafter the decree assessing the Magistrates was not pronounced till January 1839. Looking to the determination of the Court in the case of Lanark, whereby the magistrates of a royal burgh were held, in a question of assessment, to be 'heritors,' it is rather thought that the suspenders here were sufficiently brought before the presbytery by an edict as heritors. But as they were afterwards regularly charged by executions delivered to the whole Magistrates and Council separately (see No. 29), it is clear, that if the least difficulty were felt on this plea of form, it could be obviated by turning the charge into a libel; and, therefore, it is supposed the Court will have no difficulty in disposing of this point.

"II. The next question is that which is of most importance in the present discussion, being the plea of res judicata urged by the suspenders. It is said that the judgment of the Court in 1769 was conclusive, not only against the reverend incumbent who then claimed the manse, but against all his successors in the benefice. The chargers, on the other hand, refer to the case of Dunfermline, as showing that such a claim as the present cannot be excluded by any judgment against their predecessor at a prior period.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary must own that he is not prepared to find that the defence of res judicata cannot be pleaded against future incumbents on a judgment pronounced in a process fairly litigated between the minister serving the cure for the time, on the one hand, and the whole heritors and parties interested, on the other. The difficulty felt by the Court in opening up decrees even in absence of parties interested in cases of valuation and approbation, and the direct decision in the late case of Lord Blantyre and Earl of Wemyss (22d May 1838), afford strong grounds for holding that the plea of res judicata is entitled to effect in all cases where the judgment founded on has been pronounced in questions litigated by the minister and the whole heritors of the parish; and if that were the case here, it would be for the Court to consider if the case of Dunfermline was not decided on grounds which cannot be applied to other questions where the same specialties do not occur.

"But it humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, that there are strong circumstances in the present case, to affect the plea of res judicata as raised by the parties who alone urge it. Giving the utmost weight to the competency of that plea, in ordinary cases, it can only avail the parties or their successors who appeared and litigated a former process super eandem rem. But it appears from the record of the former process, that the only parties who opposed the manse in 1769 were the Earl of Fife, Colonel Stuart of Pittendrich, and Mr Duff of Milton. The town of Elgin, instead of opposing, acquiesced in the decree. And now it appears that the successors and representatives of the heritors who obtained the decree sought in 1769, have specially waived all plea peculiar to themselves on that judgment; and first, in 1828, they consented to an assessment for an annual payment to the minister in lieu of a manse; and latterly, in 1838, they seem expressly to concur in paying a rateable share of the present assessment. Accordingly, it is not alleged that the present suspenders represent any of the heritors who opposed the manse in 1767. The question, then, comes to be, can parties found on a res judicata in a cause to which neither they themselves, nor their predecessors were parties? This of itself is abundantly questionable. Had Lord Fife, Colonel Stuart, or Mr Duff, abandoned their opposition in 1769, the minister, for aught yet shown, must have got his manse. But must not all plea raised by third parties in the present suspension equally fail in 1840, when the successors of the former litigants withdraw their plea? Again, the magistrates who acquiesced in a manse in 1767 cannot, with much justice or consistency, plead that the minister's right is excluded by the decree in a former process, to which they seem then to have refused to be parties.

"As the case stands, therefore, the judgment of 1769, in a question with the suspenders, is no more than a precedent or authority to be weighed against other and later cases. To the suspenders it can afford no proper plea of res judicata, as the former judgment was to them res inter alios acta. No doubt if Lord Fife and Lord Moray, as representing Stuart of Pittendrich, came forward and urged the plea of res judicata, and if that plea had been sustained, then of course the other heritors would have been well entitled to maintain, that the claim could not be insisted in against them, because they could not be made liable for the heavy portion of the assessment falling on these parties, and without their share of the assessment, the manse could not be built; but the consent of Lords Fife and Moray to pay their share of the assessment removes every plea of that sort.

"In these circumstances, the Court has to consider whether there be not much stronger grounds for overruling the plea of res judicata in the present instance, than were to be found in the case of Dunfermline; and supposing the claim of the ministers to be still an open question, it is impossible to find any essential distinction between the present case and the second case of Dunfermline in 1805, and that of Ayr in 1820, decided in the House of Lords in 1827; 2 Wilson and Shaw, Appeal Cases, p. 600.

"III. The only other plea urged in these cases is that by the suspenders, that the minister is only entitled to £1000 Scots for a manse in terms of the Act 1663, and not to the sum of £990 Sterling, fixed by the decree of the presbytery. On this point it is difficult, on perusing the various ancient records, of which extracts are produced and quoted by Messrs Gatherer and Walker, in their revised case (pp. 30-45), to resist the conclusion, that long after the Reformation, and indeed at and subsequent to 1663, there was actually a manse in this parish; and if so, the decision of this Court and of the House of Lords in the case of Dingwall v. Gardiner in 1821 (1 Shaw's App. Cases, p. 10), is conclusive in favour of the chargers. The Court will judge from the detail of the respective parties, whether that decision should not rule the present case. No such point seems to have been raised either in the case of Dunfermline or Ayr, though it apparently might have been maintained in both on grounds more favourable for the heritors than in the present instance."

At advising,

Lord President.—I have read this case with all the attention in my power, and, with the benefit of the notes of my venerable predecessor, and after the most careful and deliberate consideration, have arrived at a conclusion conformable with his. In the first place, I do not think there is any validity in the objection taken to the citation. After the case of Lanark, it is impossible to doubt that, in this matter, a citation to the heritors is sufficient to include magistrates. The second point is more difficult, viz., whether the former proceeding amounts to a res judicata, which bars us from entertaining the present claim, and which, whether rightly or wrongly decided, if regularly before the Court, must be held as binding on us? I have read these papers with all the attention in my power, and have not been able to satisfy my mind that there is any solid foundation for this plea. It is a strict technical objection; and your Lordships always see that there is a solid ground for it, and not a mere resemblance between the cases decided. The proper parties—the matter at issue—and the media concludendi, must be the same. Now, as to the first of these there is a formidable objection, to which no answer has been given, viz., that the previous action was a suspension of a charge for the shares of three particular heritors. No doubt their case would be important and powerful as a precedent; but there is no proof that they were authorised to act for others,—nothing of the kind. But, in the second place, this was a mere suspension, and not a declarator as to the abstract right of the minister to a manse. Then, again, the presbytery was not made a party; and it would be a serious matter to hold, that the permanent rights of the benefice could be compromised where the presbytery was not a party. The presbytery only gave decree as judges, and were not present as parties. Another objection is, that the charge was given for a manse to the second minister. We are told that this is a technical objection, and was merely a clerical error; but whether it was a blunder or not, the charge was only as to the manse of a second minister. Now, it is clear that this did not seriously raise the question of right as to the first minister, and therefore it is impossible to hold that it was a res judicata as to the first. This is too formidable an objection to be got over; and on the whole, it does not appear that there is any solid objection on the ground of res judicata. The next point is, whether there is sufficient evidence to satisfy us that there ever was a manse in this parish. Now, if, from the beginning of time, there never was a manse, it would be difficult to establish the right of any of the ministers. But looking at the whole evidence in the documents produced, I am satisfied it is sufficient to show, that long before 1688, the Protestant Presbyterian incumbent was in possession of a manse. It is material to observe, that a formal report was made, stating that the manse was burnt down. I also see evidence that the ground on which it stood is let, and the rent drawn by the minister. Taking the whole evidence together, I have no hesitation in holding that there was once a manse; and so this case is similar to that of Ayr, where the question was carefully sifted; and it was settled, that the minister of a parish partly burgh and partly landward, had a good claim to a manse, wherever it could be proved that a manse had once existed. The point being so settled, we must here follow the same course. But it is said that no more can be claimed for the manse than £1000 Scots. After the case of Dingwall, and the distinction taken by the House of Lords between the first and second branches of the Statute, this cannot be pleaded. Though the former manse has not left even a trace of its foundation, yet as it once existed, the present application falls under the second branch of the Statute, which enjoins us to see that the manse is properly repaired; and this can only be done by giving the sum necessary for that purpose. But, indeed, there is no proper objection to this sum. The manse is finished. It appears to have been erected in the most economical manner, and the minister is actually in possession—enjoying the benefit of it. In these circumstances, I think we ought to find the letters orderly proceeded.

Lord Gillies.—I had some difficulty at first, but I have now come to be of the same opinion. The grounds of that opinion have been stated so fully by your Lordship, that it would only be a waste of time were I to attempt to go over them. I concur entirely.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur also. It appears to me that the pleas of the Magistrates have all been answered satisfactorily. I think the citation was properly given. The Statute lays the burden on heritors; and all are liable as heritors. They appear to have been once cited as Magistrates, but that is nothing to the purpose. The citation was superfluous; and why adhere to a less correct citation, merely because it happens to have been once employed. Then, as to the plea of res judicata, it is evidently not available to the Magistrates, for they were not parties in the case in which judgment was pronounced. It is true the cases are much connected, but the parties not being the same, there could not be a res judicata in their favour. These points being got over, there can be no doubt that, in a parish partly burgh and partly landward, the heritors are liable to furnish a manse. This was settled by the cases of Dunfermline and Ayr, and must be considered a shut point. Then, as to the amount of the sum, which is the only remaining point, we must be guided by the House of Lords. Here we had a difficulty. We held that the Statute was modified by custom, and that the first clause, applicable to building, was in force, but that the limitation of the sum to be expended was in desuetude. The House of Lords did not adopt that view, but another,—that where a manse had once existed, the keeping up of it must be considered as repair; and so the expense of it fell under the second clause, in which there is no limitation. That is the only principle on which it is possible to explain the judgment of the House of Lords; and on that principle I concur with your Lordships.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. The objection to want of citation is altogether out of the question since the decision in the case of Lanark. It is clear also from the consideration, that if they are not liable as heritors they cannot be liable at all, since the Statute lays the burden only on heritors. Whatever mode of citation may have been customary in former proceedings, it is impossible to deny that the word heritors is sufficient to include magistrates. Then, as to the plea of res judicata, at first it might seem difficult: For the finding in that case, if in favour of the heritors generally, would undoubtedly warrant the plea of res judicata. I am not disposed to rest much on the fact, that the assessment bears to have been laid on for a manse to the second minister, for that is expressly disclaimed in the proceedings; and the only question raised was, whether there should be one manse? I go on the other ground, that the litigation was between individual heritors and the collector. The assessment was laid, and a charge given to those individuals who refused to pay their shares. That was the only point before the Court. No doubt they pled the general ground in which all had an interest; but to determine the question of res judicata, we must look at the nature of the litigation, which was limited to the sums leviable from those heritors. There is a very simple test of this: Suppose the judgment had been the other way, and the letters had been found orderly proceeded—when the collector went to other heritors, would any one or all of them have been entitled to suspend, and plead the question of liability over again? What the effect might have been if the process had been a declarator, though only by one heritor, is a different matter. For in a declarator, the general question would have been raised. It would have been a much nicer point, whether one raising the general question in which all were interested, might not be considered as raising it for behoof of all; but no such point is here raised. It is true the others might have got the benefit of the judgment indirectly; for if these individual heritors were not liable, the collector could not have come against any, because he could not have had an effectual charge against all. This would have been a formidable difficulty, but it would not have been founded on the plea of res judicata. That difficulty is removed here; for the parties have formally waived their plea, and paid the assessment. But there is another ground by which the plea of res judicata is excluded. If the assessment was, as I understand, and as it appears in the papers, laid entirely on the landward heritors, and no assessment was laid on the burgh, then it is quite evident that the Magistrates could not plead res judicata; but whether that is the case or no, on the other general ground there was no res judicata. Then there is another question as to the amount of the sum for which decree can be given. To that question the judgment of the House of Lords completely applies. It is clear that there was once a manse, but that there has been none for many years. Undoubtedly, therefore, this is not the case of a new manse. The circumstances, then, are precisely the same as those of Dingwall. In that case there had once been a manse, and there was no proper question of repair, for de facto the manse had ceased to exist; but the House of Lords held, certainly by a curious construction, that rebuilding was a matter which fell under the second branch of the Statute concerning repair. We must hold it so here; and that since there was once a manse in the parish, the limitation of the Statute does not apply.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Repel the reasons of suspension, in so far as discussed in the said cases, and, quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as shall be just: Find expenses due to the chargers, and remit the account,” &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 6.—MAGISTRATES and TOWN COUNCIL of LOCHMABEN, Petitioners, v. WILLIAM BECK, Respondent.

Burgh—Customs—The petty customs levied by a corporation under their charter, “for the public good of the burgh,” are not liable to be attached by creditors.

In 1824, on the application of the Magistrates and Town-council of Lochmaben, the property of the burgh was sequestrated, and a judicial factor appointed. The whole of the property has been sold, with the exception of the petty customs. These the judicial factor has levied from the date of his appointment; but in 1838, the Court granted an interim warrant, ordaining him to pay over part of the proceeds to the Magistrates, in order to defray their expenses of management. This has accordingly been done; but the Magistrates, conceiving that, both in conformity to the decision in the case of Auchtermuchty, and the special terms of their charter, the petty customs belonged to them inalienably, as to them alone belonged the right of “intromitting, raising, receiving, and collecting” the same, “and applying them to the public good” of the burgh, craved the Court,

“1st, to find that none of the petty customs which have been hitherto levied, or may be hereafter levied, under the sanction and authority of the Magistrates and Council, as before set forth, were or are attachable for the debts due to the creditors claiming under the sequestration awarded in 1824; 2d, to ordain the judicial factor to account for and pay over to the Magistrates and Council the customs which have been collected by him, in so far as the same have not been already paid to them; 3d, to find that the Magistrates and Council are entitled, without the interference of the judicial factor, to levy and collect the customs in time to come, and to apply the past and future customs in defraying the expenses already incurred, or which shall hereafter be incurred, in maintaining and protecting the rights of the burgh, and the police and other municipal expenditure.”

The annual amount of these customs, which were said to form the only fund for the annual and casual expenditure of the burgh, did not exceed £16, and even that amount had not been obtained till 1806, when the Magistrates had advanced the rates previously paid.

The judicial factor admitted that the customs were primarily liable for the ordinary expenditure of the burgh, and could not be adjudged, so as to take the power of levying them from the Magistrates; but he maintained, that, in perfect accordance with the case of Auchtermuchty, the creditors were entitled to attach and appropriate any surplus which might remain, when the ordinary expenditure was defrayed. In the present instance the amount was trifling, but the principle was the same, whatever the amount might be.

The Lord Justice-Clerk having heard this case in the Inner-House as Lord Probationer, gave it as his opinion, that it was clear, from the terms of the charter, that the customs in question formed part of the common good. They could neither be alienated by the corporation, nor attached by its creditors, nor separated from the erection to which they inhered, as an essential part of the rights and privileges which it conferred. Then they were specially appropriated to the burdens and duties of the burgh. If a surplus were to arise and be accumulated, the right of the debtors to receive it would be a different question; but that was not alleged here. The case of the Creditors of the City of Edinburgh could not be appealed to as a precedent, because it was settled by special Act of Parliament; but the right of the creditors to interfere, was excluded both by Act 1491, c. 36, and by the decision in the case of Auchtermuchty, which disposed of the very point now raised. It is clear, however, that the claim for repetition cannot be sustained.

Lord Gillies.—I have no difficulty. The case of Auchtermuchty is clearly in point, and the respondent is practically out of Court: for he says he is bound to pay over what he levies to the Magistrates, in so far as it may be necessary for defraying the ordinary burdens, and keeping up the dignity of the burgh. Their burdens must be small, and their dignity easily sustained, if an income of £16 leaves a reversion to be contended for. Besides, the Magistrates appear to have the power of fixing the amount to be levied. If so, the creditors are struggling for nothing. For, supposing them to succeed, the Magistrates have only to return to the rates levied before 1806, and annihilate the excess, so as to make their expenditure and the amount of the customs exactly correspond. It is argued for the creditors, that the amount might rise to £160, while only £16 were required. But what then? It would, in that case, be the duty of the Magistrates to relieve the inhabitants to the extent of the difference. I am clear that the creditors cannot attach these customs; but as to bygones, I see no ground for repetition.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. We must, pro forma, recal the sequestration on the grounds stated by the Lord Probationer. Then, it being recalled, the petty customs must in future go to the Magistrates, and not to the creditors. But what is to be done, it is asked, if their amount is greater than the public expenditure requires? There might be some difficulty in saying. Possibly the creditors might be able, as in the ordinary case, to make a fund, so gathered, available for their payment. That is not the case here, and therefore we need not enter into it.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree with your Lordships. It is impossible to distinguish the point now raised from that decided in the case of Auchtermuchty. The customs in question are the petty customs, and they are leviable solely for burgh purposes. They are liable to be modified at the option of the Magistrates, and have nothing of the nature of a perpetuity on which creditors can calculate or adjudge. Before 1806 they were of little value. An addition was made then; but if the burgh expenditure does not require the whole amount, there is nothing to prevent the Magistrates from recurring to the old rates. I don't think there is any good claim for bygones. The creditors have been allowed to levy them, and the Magistrates, who allowed them, cannot call upon them to repeat.

Lord President.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Auchtermuchty was well considered, and I cannot see any thing like a distinction between that case and the present. The principle of law is perfectly clear. With regard to bygones, as the Magistrates were parties to the sequestration, their claim of repetition cannot be sustained.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Conjoin the petitions: Recal the sequestration and the appointment of the respondent, William Beck, as judicial factor thereon, in so far as applicable to, or concerns the market or petty customs: Find that these customs are not attachable for the debts due to the creditors claiming under the sequestration: Ordain the judicial factor to give in an account thereof, and to pay over to the petitioners the balance of the customs remaining in his hands since the 10th day of February 1838; and find that the petitioners are entitled to levy and collect these customs in time to come, and to apply the same in terms of law: Find expenses due to neither party, and decern."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

NO. 7.—ADAM GLEN, Pursuer, v. DAVID BLACK and his CAUTIONERS, Defenders.

Public Officer—Messenger—Reparation—Diligence—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114.—A messenger instructed to charge a debtor immediately, gave a charge on six days on the 13th, but did not transmit the charge, so as to be in the hands of his employer, till the 21st, and on the 22d, before ultimate diligence could be used, the debtor escaped—Held that the messenger was liable for the debt.

Diligence—Execution—Charge.—The charge given bearing to be by virtue "of an extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange," Question, Whether the inaccuracy was such as to make the charge inept?

A bill for £450, accepted by Lady Charlotte Bury to Adam Glen, baker, Regent Street, London, with a protest for non-payment, was transmitted for ultimate diligence to Gibson-Craigs, Wardlaw and Dalziel, W.S., who, on the 11th November 1840, sent the following instructions to David Black, messenger, Inveraray:

"We enclose registered protest, with warrant annexed, and request you will immediately charge Lady C. Bury for payment. She is at present residing with her brother, the Duke of Argyle, at Inveraray Castle. If you know of any funds or effects belonging to her, we beg you to use arrestment. We are," &c.

No answer having been received, on the 19th they wrote Mr Black as follows:

"We sent you on the 11th, a registered protest and warrant. We desired you to give a charge for payment immediately, and we expected you would have returned us the warrant and execution several days ago. The Duke of Argyle's agent called upon us on Monday to say that Lady C. Bury had received a charge for payment, but that there was some mistake in your charge.

"We cannot understand why you should have retained the warrant so long. The days of charge must have expired; and had you done your duty, by returning us the warrant with a proper execution, our client would, ere this, have been in condition to proceed with ultimate diligence. If, through your delay, Lady C. Bury shall have left Scotland, or through any irregularity in your charge, delay or expense shall arise, we have now to intimate to you, that we shall hold you liable for the debt."

A second letter, in the following terms, was written by them on the same day:

"Since writing you this morning, the Duke of Argyle's agent, Mr Monypenny, has shown us the charge which you gave to Lady C. Bury, and which begins with these words: 'By virtue of an extract-registered protested bill,' &c., you charge Lady C. Bury to make payment of the sum contained in the bill. Now, you have committed an obvious mistake, in calling your warrant an 'extract-registered protested bill.' The warrant is at the end of the extract-registered protest, not the bill. Mr Monypenny seems determined to take advantage of your blunder. As prompt measures are of the utmost importance, and as you have by your delay and blunder defeated the object which our client had in view, namely, the speedy incarceration of Lady C. Bury, we must now hold you liable for the debt. It is now, therefore, at your own risk, and you may take what steps you please to recover it. You are at liberty to use our client's name, if you can thereby more speedily incarcerate the debtor."

On the 21st, Gibson-Craigs, Wardlaw and Dalziel, received a letter from Mr Black, dated the 19th, but with the post-mark of the 20th, in which he says:

"I now return you the extract-registered protest at Mr Glen's instance against Lady Bury, with my execution, and below is note of fees.

"I understand that her brother the Duke has forwarded instructions to his agent in Edinburgh for the settlement of this debt."

The execution thus returned, bore that the charge was given on the 13th November, "by virtue of an extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange, dated at Edinburgh the 11th day of November current, at the instance of Adam Glen, &c. against Lady Charlotte Maria Bury, presently residing at Inveraray Castle."

On receiving this execution, Gibson-Craigs, Wardlaw and Dalziel, wrote as follows:

"We have this morning received your letter of the 19th, returning the extract-registered protest and warrant, with an erroneous execution annexed. It is erroneous—(1.) In respect that your execution bears to be 'by virtue of an extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange, dated at Edinburgh the 11th day of November current;' and, (2.) The said bill or note bears no such date. The after part of the execution, also, does not correspond with the first. Altogether, we never saw such a piece of bungling.

"You say that you understand Lady C. Bury's 'brother, the Duke, has forwarded instructions to his agent in Edinburgh for the settlement of this debt.' So far from this being the case, Mr Monypenny has no such instructions. Your erroneous charge has been forwarded to him, and he seems determined to take advantage of your blunders. Your execution is dated the 13th, and yet you keep the warrant beside you for six days, without returning it to us. We should be sorry to think so, but all this has very much the appearance as if you were conspiring with the debtor, to allow her to escape.

"We return the registered protest enclosed; and referring to our two letters to you of the 19th, we repeat the intimation, that we hold you liable for the debt. We are," &c.

"P. S.—You are, for your own sake, quite at liberty to give a new and a correct charge on the enclosed, and to follow up ultimate diligence on such correct charge in the names of Mr Glen and his mandatory; but we shall not authorise or sanction any proceeding in their names, based on such an irregular execution as you have already given. If you succeed in apprehending the debtor speedily, you will get payment of the debt, but if you allow her to escape, it will be a total loss to you."

Same day Mr Black replied to the letters of the 19th:

"I have received your two letters of the 19th instant. You would receive the extract Glen v. Lady C. Bury before these letters reached me. My being otherwise engaged was the cause of the extract not being earlier returned, but you will see from the date of the charge that there was no unnecessary time lost.

"The objection to the words, 'By virtue of an extract-registered protested bill,' &c., appears to me to be more ideal than real; but if there were any thing in it, the objection is removed by the subsequent words,—'And the protest recorded in the books of Council and Session, and a decree of the Lords thereof interposed thereto, all in terms, and to the effect contained in the decree and extract referred to.'

"Lady Bury is unwell, and confined to her room. She

The present action was thereafter raised by Mr Glen and Mr Dalziel, as his mandatory, concluding against Mr David Black, and his cautioners, for the amount of the debt, on the ground both of erroneous execution and undue delay.

The defenders pleaded—1. The charge and execution libelled were in due and proper terms of law. 2. The defenders are not, in any view, liable for the debt sued for, seeing that the charge and execution thereof libelled are in conformity with the general practice in similar cases. 3. The pursuer has not incurred loss or damage in consequence of any error in the said charge and execution, for which the defenders are legally responsible. The defenders therefore crave absolvitor, with expenses.

The record having been closed on summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"22d June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel in this cause, and thereafter considered the record, writs produced, and whole process, Sustains the defences, and assoilizes the defenders from this action; but finds expenses due to neither party, and decerns.

"Note.—The pursuer claims the whole of a large debt from the defenders, on the ground of irregularities in the charge and subsequent proceedings of the principal defender, the messenger, when lately employed to serve a charge on Lady Charlotte Bury, then at Inveraray Castle. The Lord Ordinary has not been able to satisfy himself that the pursuer is entitled to succeed on either of the grounds laid in the record for supporting this very penal action. The pursuer rests his claim for subjecting the messenger on two grounds:—

"1. It is said that the execution is erroneous, because it is set forth in the outset that it was given 'by virtue of an extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange, dated at Edinburgh the 11th day of November current, at the instance of Adam Glen, &c., against Lady Charlotte Maria Bury, presently residing at Inveraray Castle.' Now it certainly is a very homely and unprofessional description of the document on which the charge proceeded, to describe it as an 'extract-registered protested note or bill;'—but the Lord Ordinary cannot say that it could have raised the least doubt or uncertainty in his mind as to the writ upon which the charge really proceeded. The execution plainly sets forth that a charge was given in virtue of an extract, which is described to have been an extract of a protested bill, i. e. of that protest, with the official copy of the bill prefixed, which, by the usage of Scotland and England, is expressed in the instrument of protest on a bill, and is recorded, along with the copy of the bill, in our records.

"It is of course, however, assumed by the pursuer that the charge was specified as proceeding on a wrong or misrecited writ, holding the execution to refer, in the outset, to the date of the protested note or bill, and not of the extract; but that clearly is a wrong reading of the extract. The farther recital of the execution afforded evidence in græmo, that the date first specified was the date of the extract of the protest, and not of the bill. The latter document (the bill) is very distinctly set forth a few lines afterwards in the execution, as dated 20th July, payable three months after date, 'all in terms and to the effect of the decree and extract before referred to.' Now, though no decree was before recited, that word was used as synonymous with 'extract,'—and the extract certainly was very clearly set forth in the outset of the execution, as dated 11th November; and the Lord Ordinary would consider it a species of hypercriticism, quite unfit to be applied to the writ of one of the humblest officers of the law, such as that now founded on, to hesitate in applying the reference here made to the extract, distinctly announced in the commencement of the execution as the warrant of the charge.

"In short, when this execution is read as a whole, without dwelling on a detached sentence or word, the Lord Ordinary does think it in every respect distinct and unambiguous;—and if a bill of suspension had been presented of the charge founded on this objection alone, he would without hesitation have refused it.

"It was argued, however, at the debate, that the messenger, in the present instance, had resorted to a new style, which made its validity at least doubtful, and therefore that he must be liable to the creditor, on the principle laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Stevenson, that when a conveyancer deviates from accustomed style, he must pay the penalty, if any error be found ultimately to have been committed. But the messenger's justification on this point appears to be complete. The summary charge on protests registered in the books of the Court of Session, without the necessity of hornings, was unknown prior to the Act of 1 and 2 Vict., cap. 114, passed on 10th August 1838; and if the messenger at Inveraray had been possessed of an excellent treatise on the office of Messengers and Constables, published by Mr Darling in 1840, he would have seen how to describe, with faultless accuracy, such warrants as the new Act authorises. But on the supposition that the messenger, as yet, was only furnished with a copy of the recent Act of Parliament as to diligence, the Lord Ordinary, on turning to the schedule, No. 2 of that Statute, feels that he must make considerable allowance for a messenger in a remote country town, acting on his own unassisted skill, who may have filled up an execution under the new form, with a few expressions of superfluous description. The example of right executions given in the statutory schedule (No. 2) sets out thus:—'Upon the day of _____, I _____ messenger-at-arms, by virtue of (state nature and date of extract, and decree or document whereupon it proceeds,) at the instance of B., &c. Now, without impeaching the accuracy of the parenthetical direction contained in this schedule (which probably could not have been otherwise expressed without a multiplicity of forms), it is manifest that the messenger, in the first instance, plainly intended and attempted to follow the statutory schedule, to the best of his understanding, to the very letter; he therefore proceeded to describe the extract, both of the protest and relative document, whereon the charge proceeded, by using the terms 'extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange.' As the further recital of the execution showed clearly to every one, learned or unlearned, who read the whole writ, what was the warrant thus referred to, on which the charge proceeded, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold, on any construction fairly applicable to the case, that there was any recital of the warrant in this execution sufficient to annul the diligence.

"II. The second ground on which the liability of the messenger is maintained, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be attended with more difficulty. The warrant for charge here was transmitted to the messenger, by letter from Edinburgh, dated 11th November. The charge was given on Friday the 13th, and consequently, it expired on the evening of Thursday the 19th; but the messenger did not despatch it from Inverary till Friday the 20th November, as the post-mark, still visible on the letter, proves. By this negligence, it is said that the messenger subjected himself for the debt.

"Under ordinary circumstances, the Lord Ordinary certainly would hold, that a messenger retaining a warrant for diligence in his own possession for a series of days after the charge has been given, without returning it till the induciae of the charge have expired, has acted so unwarrantably as to subject himself for the whole of the creditor's damage. He is not entitled, in general, to keep back the horning, so as to prevent the creditor from raising ultimate diligence at the earliest possible hour after the charge expires. But there were specialities in the proceedings of the creditor which lead the Lord Ordinary to doubt if he be entitled to complain of the delay in the present instance.

"In the first place, it is proved by the correspondence produced, that the pursuer, in expectation of recovering the debt from the messenger and his cautioners, wrote to him on 19th November 1840, that he rejected the execution as informal, and intimated his resolution not to proceed with farther diligence against the debtor, and that letter was written before the charge had expired. Of course, on the supposition that the execution was inept, this was all right, and the pursuer having his recourse against the messenger, he rested and periled his claim on that objection alone. If it shall be found, however, that the execution was not null, can a creditor complain of the non-return of an execution, which he had intimated during the currency of the charge, that he held null? It is apprehended that the chief foundation of an action of reparation is awaiting in such a case. A party cannot truly aver that he suffered any injury from the want of an execution which he had previously intimated that he was not to receive or act upon when he got it.

"In the next place, the pursuer is precluded, by his letter of 21st November, written when he first received the execution, from insisting in any claim against the messenger. The pursuer, by that letter, returned the protest and execution to the messenger without caption, that he might deal with these instruments as he chose. That was a legitimate and proper step; and indeed, the pursuer's mandatory could not have acted otherwise, if the objection which he had been advised to state to the execution had been well founded; but, on the other hand, if the execution was not null, and if the only legal ground of complaint which the creditor had, was the delay of the messenger in returning the execution, then it is obvious the creditor was the more bound to do every thing, in a case which he himself viewed as so very urgent, to save the messenger and his cautioners, in a critical stage of the debtor's affairs, from loss. Instead of that, the pursuer in his letter of 21st November, stated that the creditor could not even 'sanction any proceeding in their name on such an irregular production.' He thus not only returned the warrant without a caption, but he refused the use of his name to the messenger to raise diligence for his own relief in the creditor's name. On the supposition, however, that the execution was not null, the Lord Ordinary does not think that the pursuer was entitled so to act. He should have sent the ulterior step of diligence (caption) to the messenger, under an intimation of his liability, so as he might have used it for his own behoof. Having failed to do so, the pursuer is barred, on that separate ground, from now throwing this debt on the messenger and his cautioners."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I cannot enter into the view put forward by counsel, and noticed by the Lord Ordinary, viz., that a messenger is to be regarded as a humble servant of the law, and that therefore any action brought against him for failure in his duty ought to be decided on very strict principles, as being of a highly penal nature. The situation of a messenger, I humbly conceive, is somewhat different. He is presumed to be properly educated for the discharge of his duties, and before he is permitted to undertake them, the law calls upon him to find security. The case of a messenger is thus the same as that of any other party who has pledged himself to the public, that he possesses the requisite skill, and gives security to indemnify those who might suffer by his want of it. Here, then, an action has been brought against a messenger and his cautioners for a sum of £450, contained in a bill on which he was employed to give a charge in terms of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. Two objections are taken to the mode in which he performed this duty: First, that his execution is insufficient; and secondly, that the return of it, with its warrant, was unwarrantably delayed. As to the first objection, though I cannot say that the execution is free from doubt and ambiguity, or is in due conformity to the Statute, I am not prepared to say it is so defective as not to have warranted ultimate diligence. It is certainly so far defective, that any prudent practitioner, on looking at it, must have paused before venturing to proceed upon it. The second objection appears to me more formidable. The messenger received instructions to give a charge to Lady Charlotte Bury immediately. The instructions were dated on the 11th November, and the execution bears that he gave the charge on the 13th; but then he keeps it by him till the 19th, when the days of charge were about to expire, and then transmits it in a letter addressed to the agents of the pursuer. His letter is dated the 19th, but it bears the post-mark of the 20th, having apparently been put in too late for the post which leaves inveraray in the morning at nine o'clock. It thus does not reach Edinburgh till the 21st. Now what follows? Lady C. Bury, who had been charged on the 13th, leaves Inveraray on the 22d—a Sunday,—and that day or the following takes refuge in the Sanctuary. This is the state of the facts, as admitted by the defender, and proves that, by his negligence, the debtor was permitted to escape before the creditor could possibly proceed to take the necessary steps for ultimate diligence. Though the execution had been perfectly unexceptionable, the messenger, by his unwarrantable delay, rendered it impossible to make any use of it; and on this ground, I am much afraid that we cannot sustain the defender's excuses, but must find that, by the way in which he has acted, he has made himself liable for the debt. One excuse for not sooner transmitting the documents is, that "he was otherwise engaged." I cannot receive this as an excuse. Having given the charge (and we cannot forget to whom it was given), he ought to have transmitted it instantly, so that it might have been in Edinburgh on the 14th, in time to rectify any error, if any had been committed. But then he gives another excuse, viz., that he had heard the Duke of Argyle had written to his agent to make a settlement of Lady Bury's debts. What right had he to bear this, or pay any attention to it? Quoad the party employing him, his single duty was to perform, with the least delay, the duty intrusted to him. This excuse appears to me altogether insufficient, and I must therefore differ from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, that there is any thing either in the situation of a messenger, or in the particular circumstances of this case, to justify the defender's conduct, and exempt him from liability for the debt.

Lord Gillies.—I take the same view. The messenger had a very disagreeable duty to discharge, but he knew the nature of his office: he took it with his eyes open; and having taken it, his undoubted duty was to perform it without choice, whenever called upon, and against whomsoever. He has nothing to do with the communications of parties. All he has to do is to obey his directions. These directions, in the present case, were few and simple. A warrant is sent to him, and he is directed to give a charge upon it immediately. Nothing can be more distinct than this—immediately. Now, two objections are taken to the execution of the charge: First, it is said that it is informal and inept—null; and, second, that whether good or bad, it was too late. It appears to me that either objection is sufficient. If the execution is defective, he is liable for the deficiency. If not defective, but unwarrantably delayed, he is liable for the delay. How, then, does the matter stand? In the first place, the charge is very inaccurately and clumsily worded. The expressions used can scarcely be said to import what is meant; yet, as there could be no room to doubt its meaning, on a perusal of the whole, I am not prepared to say whether it was inept or no. And it is not necessary; for I am clearly of opinion that the other objection of delay is sufficient to make the messenger liable. It is important to attend to the dates. The instructions are sent from Edinburgh on the 11th, and the charge is given at Inveraray on the 13th. So far there was no delay. But then the messenger detains the execution till the 19th, equivalent, from the hour at which the post leaves, to the 20th, and it does not reach Edinburgh till the 21st. That was a Saturday, and it thus became impossible to make any use of the diligence, for it is admitted that the debtor was off. It is impossible to listen to the excuse of being otherwise engaged. No engagement could have superseded the engagement to execute the duty which had been intrusted to him. But then he talks of a rumoured settlement of the debt. He had nothing to do with this, and was not entitled to consider it. The Lord Ordinary seems to have attached some weight to the fact, that the messenger was not allowed to act upon the diligence in the name of his employers. This should have weight, if, by acting on it, it could have been made effectual, and if the diligence was in itself such as a prudent man would have ventured to act upon. Neither of these was the case. It is quite possible that the diligence might ultimately have been found good; but were Messrs Gibson-Craig, on looking at it, and seeing how clumsily and inaccurately it was worded, warranted to risk the consequences of its being found inept? Besides, the dates show plainly, that even if the execution had been unexceptionable, it would have been impossible, from the messenger's unwarrantable delay, to use it with effect. I wish we could have sustained the interlocutor, but I am clear that it must be altered.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur. The action is raised on two grounds. The first is, that the statement in the execution is not in terms of the Act of Parliament. I have some doubt, but I rather think this objection is not sufficient. Comparing the statement in the recent Statute with those in the Statutes 1681 and 1696, I rather think the terms of the charge, as given by the messenger, might be supported. But then comes the second objection, viz., that of delay to return the execution in due time. Whether the charge was right or wrong, the messenger did not send it back so as to be available to the creditor. The charge was given on the 13th, to pay in six days after. The object was to obtain the warrant of imprisonment as soon as the charge expired, in order that the diligence might have effect. As if to prevent this, the messenger keeps the execution by him, and does not put it into the hands of his employers till the day when, if he exercised due despatch, the warrant of imprisonment would have been at Inveraray. The debtor takes advantage of the delay, and goes off to the Sanctuary on Sunday the 22d. Thus all chance of accomplishing the object of the diligence was lost. There was here evidently a failure of duty in the messenger, and he must be liable, if he is liable in any duty at all. His excuse rather makes matters worse. I am much afraid the true account of the matter is, that he was very reluctant to execute the diligence. It required him to apprehend the Duke of Argyle's sister, and lodge her in the jail of Inveraray. I don't wonder at his reluctance. I don't think the worse of the man's heart for it; but he ought to have recollected that he was a messenger, and forgotten that he was a highlander. I am afraid some feeling of reluctance influenced him; and if he delayed on this account, he is clearly liable. But the Lord Ordinary thinks, that even admitting there was a ground of liability, it is obviated by the answers: first, that the agent objected to the diligence, and, by declaring his determination not to act upon it, made despatch in transmitting it unnecessary; and, secondly, that he refused to sanction the use which the messenger might make of it for his own behoof. The dates completely obviate the first answer. The messenger was allowed the use of the diligence on the 19th, and this permission was not recalled till the 21st. Now, I agree with Lord Gillies, though my doubt of the regularity of the diligence is not so strong as his Lordship's, that an agent is not bound to allow his client's name to be used when there is an apparent mistake in the diligence, and the consequence of proceeding with it may be an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment. Not long since a sum of £800 was awarded for the imprisonment of a female of ordinary rank for a few days in the jail of Greenlaw; and it would be difficult to say what sum might have been awarded for the wrongous imprisonment of Lady C. Bury in the jail of Inveraray. As far as my recollections go, it is not one whit better than the jail of Greenlaw. The agents were not bound to risk this action, for not only was the diligence doubtful, but the doubt was caused by the fault of the messenger. Perhaps the irregularity was not such as to ground an action of damages, but it was great enough to prevent the messenger from saying that he suffered wrong in not being permitted to use it. I see no sufficient answer on the part of the defender, and I think we must decern for the pursuer in terms of the libel.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

No. 8.—EPHRAIM BOND, Pursuer, v. M'LEOD, Defender.

Process—Proof—Witness—Competency—Commission to examine a witness abroad, granted, notwithstanding of his appearing to have such an interest in the cause as may render his evidence incompetent.

In this action, in which the pursuer claimed payment of a sum of money, said to have been advanced, the defender moved for a commission to take the evidence of a witness residing in India. The pursuer opposed the motion, on the ground, that though the individual proposed to be examined was thoroughly cognisant of the facts, he had a most material interest in the cause—being in one view directly liable for the debt, and in another view, indirectly liable by way of relief, and so incompetent to give evidence.

The defender replied, that the motion was made in perfect accordance with the practice of the Jury Court, where a commission to examine a witness was considered merely as equivalent to a citation, and the relevancy or competency was left to be determined when the evidence was reported.

Lord President.—There are two questions here: the one, whether this is the proper stage for deciding on the competency of the witness, and the other, whether, supposing it to be the proper stage, the objection is such as ought to be sustained.

Lord Gillies.—The ordinary form is to grant the commission, and allow the objection to the competency to be stated afterwards. I can conceive a case where an objection to the competency ought to be determined at this stage, but I am not prepared to say that circumstances have been stated here sufficient to justify a deviation from the ordinary rule.

Lord Mackenzie.—It appears to me not only that there is nothing sufficiently apparent to require us to refuse the commission, but, on the contrary, that there is enough to show it ought to be granted. There may be competent, and there may be incompetent questions put to this witness, but till they are put, it is impossible to say whether they are competent or not.

Lords President and Fullerton concurred.

The Court granted commission.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 9.—GEORGE COYNE, Pursuer, v. JAMES BOAG, Defender.—Et è contra.

Expenses—Process—Record—Circumstances in which the Court, on cause shown, allowed the expense of a condescence which the Lord Ordinary held to be unnecessary.

In both of these actions verdict had been given for Coyne, but Boag moved for the expenses incurred in preparing a record by condescence and answers. The ground on which he supported the motion was, that he was willing to have closed the record on summons and defences,—that the Lord Ordinary had strongly recommended this when the cause was first brought before him, and had afterwards, on returning it from avizandum, stated in a note that he still thought the condescence so unnecessary, that the party who had insisted upon it ought to be subjected in the expenses thereby occasioned.

had been introduced into the defences, and which there was nothing in his summons to rebut, as he never anticipated that they would be made. His statement was, that he had been traveller to the defender under an agreement, by which he was to receive a fixed salary and his travelling expenses. This agreement was to subsist till put an end to by either party giving three months' notice. About six months after the employment commenced, he received a proposal from his employer to allow him, instead of salary and travelling expenses, a certain commission on his sales. He was willing to entertain the proposal, but never accepted it, and continued till his last journey, in rendering an account of his transactions, to state the amount of his travelling expenses. That journey was to Newcastle, and while there he received a letter from his employer, desiring him to get an account of £22 due by a customer. He accordingly received payment on the 26th July, and on the 27th left for Leeds, where his employer then happened to be. He called for him the following day, Saturday the 28th, but not having found him, a meeting was arranged to take place on Monday, at the counting-house of Plint, O'Meara and Company. At that meeting some discussion took place as to the nature of the terms on which he was employed,—he (Coyne) insisting that the original engagement still subsisted, and Boag insisting that his proposal of a commission was accepted. Boag left hurriedly, before receiving any account of the journey, and Coyne then paid into the hands of Mr O'Meara, for Boag's behoof, the sum of £12 odds, being the payment received by him at Newcastle, under deduction of his expenses. The following day Boag dined with O'Meara, and on being informed of the balance left by Coyne, requested that it might be placed to the credit of his account. Coyne now considered his engagement at an end, and accepted an offer made to him by Plint, O'Meara and Company. He was allowed a few days to go to London and see his family; but having met with a very cool reception from his new employers, he inquired the reason, and was shown the following letter which they had received from Boag:

"I observe by your letter a statement regarding Coyne's matters, which I do not recognise, so that if you have received any money from him on my account, you had better return it again to him, as I have handed this matter over to my friend Mr Campbell, to act with in a different way. I trust you will not lose a post in sending him back the money, as Mr Campbell has this day applied for a criminal warrant against him for uplifting my money, and not duly accounting to me for it. The consequences may be serious against yourself if you retain the money a single post after this notice, as he may then have it in his power to say that you sanctioned his settlement."

His employers told him that he must now consider their engagement with him as cancelled. He immediately set out for Edinburgh, to meet the charges for which it was said a criminal warrant was taken out against him, and waited with his agent on the agent of Mr Boag, but, instead of a criminal warrant, was shown the copy of a letter which was addressed to him, in the belief he was still at London, and was in the following terms:

"Edinburgh, 7th August 1838.—Mr Boag, in whose employment you lately were, has learned, that upon the 24th ultimo, you received from Mr Henry Melvain of Newcastle, £22, the property of Mr Boag, but which you have not accounted for to him. Mr Boag is exceedingly surprised at this improper act of yours, and has directed me to intimate to you, that unless you account and settle with him in course of post for the money uplifted by you, proceedings of a personal nature will be instantly taken against you, for what is looked upon as a breach of trust."

The summons gave the above narrative, and concluded for

"the sum of £500 Sterling in name of damages, and as a solatium for the injury sustained by the pursuer in his feelings, character, and success, and prospects in life, in consequence of the false, calumnious, and injurious statements and accusations made by the defender to his prejudice, in manner before mentioned."

The defences, besides asserting that the pursuer, at the time when he deducted the money in question, knew that he was acting under an engagement which prohibited him from doing so, and producing a variety of documents in support of the assertion, contained a statement that the pursuer himself "had been guilty of a false, slanderous, and injurious statement as to the defender's character," for reparation of which he had raised an action of damages, with which, in the event of being found liable in damages to the pursuer, he was entitled pro tanto to compensate their amount. There was nothing in the summons to meet this statement; and the pursuer held, that on that ground alone, a condescendence was indispensable. It was true he had met that statement fully in his defences to the counter action, but the two actions might, for any thing he knew, have been tried by different juries, or been dropped altogether, so as to send him to a jury with an uncontradicted averment made against him, that his claim of damages for slander could not be sustained without compensating it by a claim against himself for similar slander.

Lord President.—As a general rule, we are not disposed to interfere with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary concerning the expenses incurred by the parties in making up the record. Long and unnecessary statements are often introduced, which complicate the case, and increase the expense; and this the Court never will encourage. Still it is clear that we are not bound by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary; and if on cause shown, we are satisfied that that judgment is erroneous, it is unquestionably our duty to dissent from it. In the present case, I am clear that the new matter introduced into the defences, made it necessary for the pursuer to have a condescendence; and I have, therefore, no difficulty in refusing the present motion.

Lord Gillies.—I concur. The record was made up as the pursuer suggested. The case went to the jury, and the verdict returned was in the pursuer's favour. It is quite possible that the same verdict might have been returned, though the record had been closed on summons and defences; but it is also possible—perhaps probable, that if there had been no condescendence, the verdict might have been different. I can conceive cases where there is no room for doubt that a condescendence is altogether unnecessary, and where, of course, the party insisting on it ought to bear the expense; but where there is a doubt, it would be perilous to hold, after a verdict has been returned in favour of the party who considered the condescendence indispensable, that the result would have been equally favourable to him if he had dispensed with it. In the present case, I think the statements made by the pursuer show that he was right in insisting on a condescendence.

Lord Mackenzie.—It certainly is not safe for us, in the general case, to take upon us to decide what papers might or might not have been dispensed with. The Lord Ordinary is the best judge of that; but when statements are made to us showing the necessity of the papers alleged to be unnecessary, we must decide according to the information given us. In actions of damages, in particular, the party who thinks himself sure of his cause, may be disposed to luxuriate in condescendences. We must look sharp after that, and discourage it; but from the statements now made, I cannot venture to say that the condescendence in question could safely have been dispensed with.

Lord Fullerton.—I am most unwilling to go against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary who prepares the cause, and has full opportunity of ascertaining what kind of record is required to furnish the proper issues. Here the Lord Ordinary, both before the issue was prepared and after, gives a decided opinion that the condescendence was unnecessary; and it appears to me that something stronger than the statement we have heard, would be necessary to justify us in dissenting from that opinion. Where a cause is not to go before a jury, I can understand how very necessary it is, where new matter is introduced into defences, that the pursuer should have an opportunity of rebutting it by a counter statement in the record; but where the cause is to go before a jury, all that the record requires to contain is matter sufficient to raise the issue by which the facts are to be tried. Now, who can be so good a judge of this as the Lord Ordinary? I cannot see how the verdict can be affected by the mode of making up the record. The verdict is given on evidence, and the important point is not what is averred, but what is proved. If the summons and defences did not contain matter sufficient to raise the proper issue, or, in consequence of any omission, precluded either party from bringing forward proper evidence, I could understand the necessity of a condescendence. This risk, however, is sufficiently guarded against in practice, as the record is not closed till the issue is prepared, and the party who finds that the proper issue can't be raised under the record as it stands, has it still in his power to introduce the statements that may be required. Here the Lord Ordinary stated his impression before the cause went to the jury clerks, that a condescendence was unnecessary; and after it returned with the issue prepared, stated expressly in a note that his impression was confirmed, and that the expenses of the condescendence ought to fall on the party who had insisted upon it. I am not satisfied that his Lordship erred in this opinion, and I am therefore inclined to grant the motion for these expenses.

The Court refused the motion.

Parent and Child—Paternity—Illegitimate Child—Oath in Supplement—Circumstances held not to amount to a semiplena probatio, so as to entitle a party to her oath in supplement.

This was an action of aliment for an illegitimate child, of which the pursuer was delivered on the 5th May 1840, and of which she alleged that the defender was the father. He denied the paternity; and in the course of the proceedings before the Sheriff-court of Forfarshire, the pursuer, in her judicial declaration, stated, that on the night of the Monifieth races, the 31st of July 1839, she went down to the Dundee Railway station at Arbroath, to see the evening train arrive, which she thinks was between nine and ten o'clock on the evening of the race-day: That she left the station after the arrival of the train, and returned up the town, accompanied by John Jolly and Jess M'Donald: That they went to the house of one Phillip, a vintner, and remained about half an hour: That the three then went to the house of a Mrs Gunn, where the pursuer went to bed, and in the course of the night was awakened by Mrs Gunn to go into another room, where she found the defender alone, and remained with him about half an hour or three quarters of an hour.

A conjunct proof having been allowed, the first witness for the pursuer, Elizabeth Henderson, deponed, that on the night of the Monifieth races, while M'Donald and the pursuer were asleep together, Mrs Gunn awakened the pursuer, and sent her into another room to the defender; and that, two or three nights thereafter, the defender was again in Gunn's house, and inquired after the pursuer.

Jess M'Donald deponed in terms of the pursuer's declaration, but that she did not see the defender in Mrs Gunn's.

Jean Valentine deponed, that she went along with the pursuer to the defender, when the pursuer stated that she was with child by him; but the defender said to the pursuer, that she had no claim upon him unless the child came to his time, and then he would answer for it.

On the other hand, John Jolly deponed, that on the night of the Monifieth races he did not see the pursuer, Ann Bruce, nor during the following morning: That he was not in Phillip's tavern with any woman on the said evening of the races, or morning following; nor was he, during that time, in the house of Mrs Gunn: That since the deponent commenced business at Whitsunday 1837, he has only been once in the house of Mrs Gunn, and that happened in the autumn of 1838: That he recollects distinctly of having once been in company with the pursuer, Ann Bruce, in Phillip's tavern, but this happened fully three years ago.

Mrs Gunn deponed, that in 1839, a short time before St Thomas's market-day, which is held in Arbroath on the 18th day of July, she recollects of John Jolly coming to her house in company with the pursuer and M'Donald: That as she was showing Jolly out of the house by the street door, she saw the defender, William Petrie, passing along the street at the time: That he came up and spoke to her at the door, and accompanied her into her kitchen: That while they were there a rap was made on the street door, and she, not wishing the defender to be seen, directed him to run up stairs, which he did: That she followed up close after him, and found that he had gone into the same room where the pursuer, Bruce, and M'Donald were in bed: That she again went down stairs, and after being absent about five minutes, she returned and remained a short time in the room with the pursuer and defender; and Jess M'Donald having risen from bed, sat down beside them: That the deponent then left the room and went down to the kitchen, leaving the pursuer, defender, and M'Donald together: Further, she deponed, that the defender was never in the deponent's house in company with the pursuer, unless on the occasion above deponed to.

David Ormond deponed, that on the same evening he went out with the defender's father and mother to the defender's house at Waulkmills, and after supping, he and the defender returned to Arbroath betwixt two and three o'clock in the morning: That he parted with the defender in Smithy Croft, where the deponent resides, and he saw the defender go down the road towards his father's house, which is also in Smithy Croft.

The defender's brother deponed, that he was awake in the course of the night by his brother, the defender, coming into the house: That day-light was not then come in: That the defender came into the same bed with him, and he again fell asleep. His father returned home from Waulkmills in the morning, a little past five o'clock, and his brother, the defender, was at that time in bed with him.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Forfar, 4th March 1841.—The Sheriff-substitute circumscribes the term for proving, and having advised the proofs for the parties, minutes of debate thereon, and whole process, finds that the pursuer has brought a semiplema probatio of her allegation that the defender is the father of the child in question, and therefore allows her to give her oath in supplement of the proof; assigns for her doing so."

(Signed) "A. ROBERTSON."

"Note.—On the night of the Monifieth races 1839, (i. e. either on the 31st July or 1st August of that year), the pursuer and the girl M'Donald having been shut out of their lodgings, went into a house of bad fame in the neighbourhood, kept by Mrs Gunn, where they went to bed the worse of liquor.

"That night, or very early next morning, the defender, after parting with the witness Ormond, on the street of Arbroath, was in Mrs Gunn's house, where he remained for a considerable time.

"The pursuer got out of bed, and she and the defender were by themselves in Gunn's house for some time.

"The witness Henderson swears, that on the Saturday following she again saw the defender in Gunn's house, and that he expressed a desire that she would bring the pursuer to him.

"The witness Valentine swears, that she and the pursuer went to the defender some time in the following winter, to inform him that the pursuer was with child to him; that when the pursuer did so, the defender denied that he was the father, and said she had no claim on him unless the child came to his time, and then he would answer for it.

"The child was born on the 5th May 1840.

"The defender, in his declaration, denied that he had been in Gunn's house since he was ten years of age.

"The Sheriff-substitute cannot discover, on the evidence, any trace of a plot to saddle the defender with the maintenance of the child, as insinuated by him. There is, it is true, various discrepancies in the evidence. Thus Mrs Gunn dates the meeting in her house about a fortnight before the races; but this seems to be a mistake, for there was only one meeting of the parties there, the circumstances attending which are sworn to by her and by the other witnesses. There are some discrepancies also as to what took place in Gunn's house, but this may be partly accounted for by the state of intoxication in which some of the persons then were. Gunn and M'Donald, too, swear that Jolly was in company with the pursuer and M'Donald that night; while Jolly swears that the occasion on which he was in their company was some months prior to the races. In the view of the Sheriff-substitute, these discrepancies do not demolish the important parts of the evidence.

"The witnesses for the pursuer, and Mrs Gunn, called by the defender, are undoubtedly loose characters, but they are just such persons as would be in the knowledge of the facts to which they swear. There were no other witnesses to these facts, and the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses is corroborated in some particulars by the defender's proof.

"The Sheriff-substitute does not see any grounds for holding, that because the defender happened by chance to be late on the street on the night in question, he has been fixed on by the pursuer as the father of her child, and that she has concocted all the evidence which has been brought against him without a particle of truth in it, so far as he is concerned, unless, however, it is to be held that that evidence is a fabrication of falsehoods, so far as applicable to the pursuer, and that four witnesses (who have no interest in the matter) are perjured, his plea cannot be sustained.

"The defender argues, that the proof is insufficient to identify him as the person alluded to in it. The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the proof is sufficient on that point."

The defender reclaimed, and on the "20th March 1841.—The Sheriff-substitute having advised with the Sheriff, recalls the interlocutor of 4th March, assoilzies the defender, and finds him entitled to expenses, whereof appoints an account to be given in and taxed."

(Signed) "A. ROBERTSON."

"Note.—The evidence led by the parties is in many particulars very contradictory, but it is not necessary here to enter upon all of it. The points are very well brought out in the minutes of debate for the parties.

"The Sheriff is of opinion that a satisfactory semiplena probatio has not been made out by the pursuer, and that the attempt is defective, and not to be relied on.

"The pursuer's allegation is, that the child was begotten (or at least that the first sexual intercourse between the parties took place) in the house of Mrs Gunn, who seems to be the keeper of a brothel, late on the evening of 31st July, or early on 1st August. She alleges that she and Jess M'Donald were asleep in a bed in Mrs Gunn's house,—that the defender came there for the purpose of sexual intercourse,—that Mrs Gunn put him into a separate room—awoke the pursuer, and sent her into that room—and that the parties remained there together for some time.

"This is indeed sworn to by Eliza Henderson, who appears to be a frequenter of Mrs Gunn's house, and was there, as she admits, at that untimely hour of the night, and also on another occasion a few days after. But she is not supported by any other witness. Jess M'Donald, who was in bed with the pursuer, proves nothing against the defender, and did not even see him in the house, which, to a certain extent, contradicts Henderson; while Mrs Gunn, whose proceedings form the main part of the charge, gives a very different account of the matter, viz., that the defender was merely passing the door at the moment when it was opened by Mrs Gunn to Jolly, who was leaving the house, and that the defender seeing Mrs Gunn, went into the house in order to give Mrs Gunn a dram, and while in the kitchen, a rap was heard at the door, and she directed the defender to run upstairs, that he might not be seen, and that he accidentally went into the room where the pursuer and M'Donald were, and sat down at a table with them. Mrs Gunn says she did not put the parties into a separate room, as alleged by Henderson; nor does she say that she saw any familiarity take place between them, or that any opportunity was afforded them of having sexual intercourse, or that she awoke the pursuer for that end.

"Now, 1st, Henderson is but a single witness; and even if she had stood uncontradicted, and supposing her testimony entitled to the fullest credit, her evidence, unless supported by some corroborative circumstance that could be relied on, would not establish a semiplena probatio. For facts amounting in any case to a semiplena probatio must be proved like any other set of facts that are to be founded on, viz., by two or more witnesses, or by circumstances supplying the want of a second witness.

"But, 2d, Henderson's evidence is not only not supported by M'Donald, who must have seen some part of what she (Henderson) states, but is positively contradicted by the evidence of Mrs Gunn, whose proceedings Henderson swears to, which totally neutralizes Henderson's evidence.

"This is all the proof, except the statement by Jean Valentine, one of the pursuer's associates, that when the defender was in the following winter charged with being the father of the child, he denied it; but said, 'she had no claim upon him, unless the child came to his time.'

"If Henderson had been a person whose testimony was deserving of full credit, and had stood uncontradicted by any witness equally deserving of credit, the above circumstance mentioned by Valentine would have gone far to supply the want of a second witness, and to make up a semiplena probatio. But as matters stand, it is of no value as coming out of the mouth of a single witness of her description, while the main allegation of sexual intercourse is not proved,—Henderson's testimony being neutralized by that of Mrs Gunn.

"But a great deal of evidence has been adduced for showing that the whole story of the defender and Jolly being in Gunn's house on the occasion in question is false; and assuredly the witnesses adduced on this branch of the cause are much more worthy of credit than Henderson or Valentine,—the former, by her own account, the frequenter of this noted brothel, and the latter the associate of the pursuer, who had previously strayed from the paths of virtue, and on the occasion in question was found in Mrs Gunn's house in a state of intoxication. But if the pursuer's proof has failed, as the Sheriff thinks is the case, it is the less necessary to rest upon the proof of alibi, for which much is to be said, and which is still open for consideration."

The pursuer advocated; and on the 9th July 1841,

"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, Recalls the interlocutor of the 20th of March 1841: Finds that the advocator has brought a semiplena probatio of the respondent being the father of the child in question; and remits to the Sheriff, with instructions to allow her oath in supplement, with power to the Sheriff to dispose of the expenses of the advocacy, as well as the expenses in the Inferior Court, according as his judgment shall find the oath affirmative or negative, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary concurs in general with the views taken by the Sheriff-substitute."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Moncreiff.—This is a case of some difficulty, and I am not surprised at the difference of opinion among the learned Judges before whom it has already come. But it is a matter to be judged of upon the evidence, and we must decide according as it appears to us. Now, according to President Blair, semiplena does not mean suspicion merely, but something more. The pursuer comes into Court, averring the 31st of July to be the particular night on which certain circumstances occurred, and that she was alone with the defender in a room in Mrs Gunn's. She also says that some intercourse took place between them afterwards, but she does not say that any took place before. The evidence of Jolly expressly contradicts her story. As to what took place in Gunn's house, Elizabeth Henderson states, that she saw the defender there, and that he and the pursuer were in a room together for half an hour; and certainly, considering the character of the house, if this were corroborated, it would be quite sufficient to constitute a semiplena; but she fixes the date to be the 31st of July, while Mrs Gunn says it was some time before the 18th July. The whole evidence is contradictory as to what took place in Gunn's house; and in such circumstances, we are bound to look at the evidence of alibi.

Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The object of an oath in supplement is, not to cast the balance, or to remedy contradictions.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of advocate the cause; refuse to allow the pursuer's oath in supplement; assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

No. 11.—JESSIE DARLING OR WILSON AND OTHERS, Pursuers, v. JAMES ADAMSON, Defender.

Process.—Title to Insist.—Trust.—An action at the instance of two trustees and the beneficiaries under the trust, was raised against a third trustee, to compel him to execute the trust; pending the action the trustees, pursuers, died.—Held that the instance remained good, and that the beneficiaries had a proper title to pursue the action without sisting the representatives of the deceased.

An action was raised at the instance of Mr and Mrs Darling, two of the trustees, and their children, the beneficiaries under the trust-deed of the late Mr Stormonth, against Mr Adamson, another trustee, with a view to compel him to execute the trust. The pursuers prevailed, and were found entitled to expenses, subject to modification. The defender reclaimed upon the matter of expenses, and the Court, before answer, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to modify the expenses. During the dependence of the action the two trustees pursuing died, and the defender moved the Lord Ordinary to sist process until their representatives should enter appearance. The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the Court,—when it was pleaded, that the instance was still good, as the beneficiaries who concurred in the action, and who, by themselves and in their own right, had a sufficient title to institute and follow forth the action, still survived. Answered—That an interlocutor in favour of a deceased party, was as bad as an interlocutor against a deceased party, and that the representatives of the deceased should be sisted. Replied—That the trustees sued qua trustees, and their representative in that character is the defender himself, the sole surviving trustee.

The Court refused to sist process.

No. 12.—MRS JANET POLLOK or TENNANT and HUSBAND, Advocators, v. DR WILLIAM POLLOK, Respondent.

Service—Brieve, Advocation of.—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 2.—Process—A note of advocacy of a brieve was presented to, and marked by the depute-clerk of Session, and was thereafter, without being published in the calling lists, and then enrolled in the printed rolls for the week, laid before the Lord Ordinary named in the note—Held that the procedure was correct, and that the next step in the cause was for the Lord Ordinary to advocate the brieve.

James Pollok of Logiegreen, Esq., having fallen into such a state of mental derangement as to be incapable of managing his own affairs, his daughter, Mrs Tennant, in September 1841, presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, praying for the appointment of a curator bonis to her father, and suggesting Mr James McClelland, accountant in Glasgow, as a proper person to be appointed to that office. A similar application was a few days thereafter presented by Dr Pollok, the younger brother and nearest agnate of James Pollok, craving that he himself should be appointed to the office, which he was willing and bound to discharge gratuitously.

On the 15th October 1841, Lord Fullerton pronounced the following interlocutor:

“The Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills having resumed consideration of the petition of Mrs Janet Pollok or Tennant and husband, answers for Dr William Pollok, replies and duplicates, and productions for the parties—Of new nominates and appoints James McClelland, accountant in Glasgow, to be curator bonis ad interim until the 14th day of November next, to James Pollok, mentioned in the petition, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, and decerns; and allows an interim extract to go out accordingly.

“Note.—It is to be regretted that there is here any difference between parties so nearly connected, and it is perhaps hardly necessary for the Lord Ordinary to disclaim all intention of countenancing any imputation against the respondent, Dr Pollok, by pronouncing the above interlocutor.

“He has only followed what he considers to be the usual practice. There is no question here of the legal rights of the respondent as nearest agnate. He may assert those, if he is so advised, in the common form. The appointment of a curator bonis is a matter mainly within the discretion of the Court, and in the exercise of that discretion they are of course guided by the circumstances of each case.

“Here Dr Pollok suggests himself for the situation. His near relationship would give him great claim, if those claims were not opposed by one still nearer, viz., the only daughter of the party, in concert with the wife and sister.

“In the face of such opposition, the suggestion of the respondent cannot, consistently with the usual practice, be listened to. The only alternative is the appointment of a third party; and as Mr McClelland is a third party, against whom no objection is made by the respondent (if a third party is to be named at all), the Lord Ordinary sees no reason to hesitate about appointing him.

“As to the expense of employing a professional person, that can make very little difference; for, from the nature of the subject of management, it is pretty clear that the respondent could not dispense with professional assistance.”

Dr Pollok reclaimed, and meanwhile applied for, and obtained a brieve from Chancery, directed to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, for the purpose of cognoscing his brother as insane, and of getting himself served as his tutor-at-law. After the brieve had been published, the service was fixed to take place at Glasgow upon Monday the 15th November; whereupon Mrs Tennant and her husband, with concurrence of the wife and sister of Mr Pollok, entered appearance in the cause by lodging a minute of compearance and objections; and thereafter they presented a note of advocacy for the purpose, and in terms of the 2d section of the Statute 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 86, which advocacy was duly intimated. The note was addressed “unto the Right Honourable the Lords of Council and Session,” and the prayer with which it concluded was, that their Lordships should advocate the brieve, &c.; and also, “to remit to, or appoint Lord Cuninghame, or any of their Lordships’ number, to be Judge in the said cause, and to proceed with the same, and to hear and dispose of the complainers’ objections in common form.

By the section referred to, and founded on, it is enacted, that

“where a party claiming right to appear and oppose a service has made appearance, it shall be lawful to any party to remove the cause or proceedings to the Court of Session by written note of advocacy, as aforesaid, not only from any inferior Judge, but also from the Sheriff of Edinburgh, acting under special commission by authority of the Court of Session, and such note shall be received and marked in manner and to the effect foresaid, and be laid before a Lord Ordinary named in the note, who shall advocate the brieve, and be the Judge in the said service.”

It being of importance that the service should be proceeded with as speedily as possible, the respondent requested the clerk of Court to lay the note before Lord Cuninghame, in order that he might advocate the brieve, and be the Judge in the service, as directed by the Statute. But as doubts were entertained by the clerk how far the note of advocacy should not abide the ordinary course of the rolls, the respondent lodged a note, craving his Lordship to order the note of advocacy to be laid before him for the purposes of the Act. On this application the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:

"16th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having considered a note for Dr William Pollok, and heard counsel for the parties—Makes avizandum with the process and debate."

"19th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the objections urged by the respondent (advocators) to the enrolment of the present advocacy of brieves in the Lord Ordinary's hand roll, instead of going through the printed roll—Makes avizandum with the cause to the Second Division of the Court, and appoints printed copies of the brieve and advocacy, with the certificate of the clerk thereon, to be forthwith boxed, that the case may be reported.

"Note.—On 24th October 1841, Dr William Pollok took out brieves from Chancery, addressed to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, for cognoscing his brother, James Pollok of Logiegreen, as insane. On 9th November, Mrs Tennant, the only child of Mr James Pollok, with concurrence of her mother, the wife of Mr Pollok, presented a note of advocation for removing the inquisition to this Court, which note was framed in strict accordance with the late Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 86, relative to advocations. The note was not presented to the Bill-Chamber clerk, but to Mr Beveridge, the depute-clerk of Session, who officiates in the causes before the present Lord Ordinary.

"In a few days afterwards the case was enrolled by Dr Pollok, the raiser of the brieve, in the hand roll of the Lord Ordinary, to get an order for fixing or expediting the trial. It was then objected that the case had not been regularly enrolled, as it should have been put, called, or published in the calling lists, and then enrolled in the printed roll of the week. At the request of both parties, this incidental point of form is now reported to the Court.

"The Lord Ordinary was at first disposed to view this as a trivial point of form, which, when fixed either way, was of no great consequence to the law; and he was, and still is of opinion that the objection in this instance is not well founded under the peculiar terms of the Statute, to be immediately referred to. But though the question is in one view very immaterial in itself, the decision may affect other points in the trial of brieves under the new system lately prescribed for them in this Court, of considerable importance in practice.

"By our ancient forms it is well known that brieves were uniformly directed to inferior Judges: See Erskine, B. I. t. 3, § 19. This was probably soon felt to be inexpedient in practice, and therefore advocations of brieves to the Supreme Court were sustained at an early period in cases of importance; but the Court did not, even in these cases, allow the service to be concluded before themselves, but they gave commission to the macers to try the case, and directed a brieve from Chancery to be issued to these functionaries to make the necessary inquisition and return,—two of the Judges being usually named assessors to the macers. All questions as to the title of the pursuer of the service, and other objections thereto, capable of instant verification, were heard and decided, either by the Court before a remit to the macers was made, or on report of the Lords Assessors at a subsequent stage: See the cases of Sir Alexander Don in 1712 (Dict. p. 14,425), and of Douglas and the Duke of Hamilton in 1761 (p. 14,457). When the assessors determined any point themselves, there does not seem to have been any remedy except by reduction.

"This antiquated and preposterous system of trial before the macers continued in observance till 1821. By Act 1st Geo. IV. cap. 38, § 11, all brieves to macers were abolished, and such inquisitions as were in use to be directed to the macers were appointed to be tried before the Sheriff of Edinburgh; and as to the removal of brieves into this Court, it was provided, that 'in all cases of competition of brieves, as well as when a party claiming right to appear and oppose a service shall make such appearance, either party may apply for and obtain advocacy of the brieves to the Court of Session, not only from any inferior Judge, but also from the said Sheriff of Edinburgh, acting under special commission; and the Lord Ordinary before whom the letters of advocacy shall be called shall advocate the brieve, and remit to the fifth or junior permanent Lord Ordinary for the time to be Judge in the said service, without prejudice, nevertheless, to the power of the Court, whether on declinature or any other cause shown, to remit to any other Ordinary to be Judge in any service.'

"It is then provided, that the service shall proceed before the Judge of this Court, to whom 'it is remitted in the same plan, form, and manner (unless in so far as the same may hereafter be otherwise regulated, in manner herein after authorised), as services heretofore have proceeded before the macers.' The clause concludes with a very ample power to the Court to make such rules 'for altering and amending the form of issuing and executing brieves, and conducting the proceedings in services,' which has not as yet been acted on by the Court.

"Then came the Statute of 1838 (1 and 2 Vict., cap. 86), relative to advocations, which, in section 1, provides very specially for the passing, calling, and enrolling of advocations in ordinary civil causes from inferior courts; while in section 2, that circuitous procedure is not prescribed as to the advocacy of brieves, but, apparently from the summary and urgent nature of the inquisitions required in brieves, it is declared that it shall 'be lawful to any party to remove the case or proceedings to the Court of Session by written note of advocacy as aforesaid, not only from any inferior Judge, but also from the Sheriff of Edinburgh acting under special commission by authority of the Court of Session; and such note shall be received and marked in manner and to the effect aforesaid, and be laid before a Lord Ordinary named in the note, who shall advocate the brieve, and be the Judge in the said service.'

"It is obvious, that under this clause, the Legislature did not intend that advocations of brieves should go through the same course as ordinary processes; but it gave a right to all having interest to remove, per saltum, the trial of the brieves from an inferior Judge to a Judge of this Court; and instead of being put out in the calling list, taken to see, and then enrolled in the Outer-House rolls, when one or other of the parties comparing might have insisted on a record being made up, a simpler and more summary course is authorised; and the Statute provides that the case 'shall be laid before the Judge named in the note of advocacy, who shall advocate the brieve and be the Judge in the service.'

"This Statute made several important changes on the Act of 1821. Under that Act, the advocations were directed to be called before the Lord Ordinary (it is presumed) of the week, who was to remit them to the junior Lord Ordinary. This necessarily implied an enrolment in the Outer-House printed roll—which direction is entirely omitted in the late Statute. But, besides, there is a more important change in the law of brieves by the last Act. It is now imperative on the Court (or at least Lord Ordinary) to advocate the brieve, and be the Judge in the service. The Court has no discretion to refuse the advocacy, and to send the brieve back to the inferior Judge to be tried, as was done under the Act of 1821, in the case of Jardine and Currie.—See 4 Shaw's Reports, p. 159, 8th July 1825. The enactment is express and unqualified, that the Lord Ordinary 'shall advocate the brieve.' This is placing the right of either party, and in fact of any one interested, to insist on a trial of the brieve in this Court, just as under the Judicature Act of 1825, any party interested in a civil suit involving an interest of more than £40 Sterling, has a right to advocate the case for trial by jury, without assigning any reason, than that he prefers that mode of trial in this Court.

"But while brieves are thus summarily removable into this Court, it seems to have been the policy of the Legislature that the inquisition should proceed with as little delay as possible. The brieves for serving heirs, and for cognoscing furiosity, are governed by the same rules; but in each case the law has always been jealous of delay and opposition, and allows the service to proceed ad interim, to establish the title of the heir, or to procure the necessary protection to a fatuous party, leaving any error to be corrected by reduction. Hence, no reasons of advocacy are allowed in the advocacy of brieves, and no calling of the cause is provided; no right is given to take the advocacy to see; but the case is at once to be laid before the Lord Ordinary, who is apparently to proceed just as the assessors of the macers did in former practice.

"If the case were enrolled in the roll of other advocations, that very course might imply that this was to be treated as an ordinary cause, in which every form of the advocacy process is to be gone through; and all orders of the Judge preparatory to trial to be reviewable by reclaiming notes, and possibly by appeals to the House of Lords, in case of difference of opinion among the Judges. But that would be an utter obstruction of justice, and would often prostrate the great object of services, as it might be doubted if the powers of the Court to give interim execution would apply to the progress of a service. The policy of the law has ever been, to give the most summary dispatch in services, and on the same principle that the retour of the inquest of Chancery cannot be stopped by any allegation of error in the jury or presiding Judge, the party aggrieved cannot get a new trial on the ground of misdirection, but the retour must be made first to Chancery; and the form of review is by reduction,—thus implying that the trial of the brieve is a separate process, which the Court can only review in that form without interfering with the trial during its progress.

“These views naturally lead to a consideration of the powers of review possessed by the Court over the judge of the service, even in its preparatory stages. Such power was taken for granted in the case of the Rev. William Fraser against Lord Lovat, in December 1840 (reported only in the Jurist of that date), when the Second Division altered and enlarged a diligence (which had been allowed by the present Lord Ordinary as Judge of that service in limited terms), and granted a wider range of expiation to the raiser of a brieve of propinquity. But the question now suggested did not occur, and was not considered. It is, beyond all doubt, expedient that such power of review should exist (if the delays incident to appeals to the Court of last resort pendente processu can be avoided), to prevent the hardship and loss to individuals and families, which an error in the conduct of any Judge in a service may inevitably lead to, as exemplified in the case of Sommerville against Thomson, (Fac. Coll., 19th May 1816). And, on the whole, if there be any doubt as to the ulterior course of proceeding in these services, it would form a strong ground for the Court exercising, without delay, the powers competent to them by the Act of 1821, ‘to alter and amend the form of conducting the procedure in such services.’”

Lord Cuninghame having reported,
Robertson pleaded for Dr Pollok—That the advocacy of a brieve was a process sui generis, and was not to proceed as an ordinary note of advocacy. By the 2d section of the Statute, it was to be laid before the Lord Ordinary named in the note, and might be laid before him in vacation as well as during Session. It was of a summary nature, in which there was to be no record; and it was imperative upon the Lord Ordinary, on its being laid before him, to advocate the brieve, and be Judge in the service. Thereafter, the cause was to proceed by fixing the day of service, as the Sheriff would have done had there been no advocacy. If there be any objection in bar of trial, it ought to be stated at the trial, and not at the present stage. The legal remedy for protecting a person who has become insane, is by the service of a tutor-at-law; the appointment of a curator bonis is merely a prætorian remedy.

Maitland—The only point to be considered is, in what shape the cause is to be brought into Court? The practice is, to call advocations of brieves in the ordinary way, and to allow them to be taken to see. The second section provides, that such note shall be received and marked in manner and to the effect foresaid; that is, in the manner an ordinary note of advocacy is received and marked, as provided in the first section.

Solicitor-General replied—That the first section of the Act refers to ordinary advocations; the second to a competition of brieves; and the note of advocacy is to be received and marked by the clerk, to the effect of stopping proceedings in the Inferior Court; but after this, the mode of proceeding prescribed in the two sections is totally different. By the second section, the note is to be laid before the Lord Ordinary, who shall advocate the brieve without going through the course of the rolls, which implies the making up of a record.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Find that the first step in the present process is to advocate the cause: Remit to Lord Cuninghame accordingly, to advocate the cause, and proceed further in terms of the Statute.”

The Court then disposed of the reclaiming note against Lord Fullerton's interlocutor, by recalling the appointment of William M'Clelland as curator bonis, and remitted to the Sheriff to report to them a neutral person to be appointed to that office, until the service of the tutor-at-law.

23d November 1841.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 13.—JOHN CRAIG, Suspender, v. BROCK and FERGUSON, Respondents.

Diligence—Charge—Process.—A warrant to charge in name of a company, and the individual partners, is not sufficient to sustain a charge in name of the individuals only, without any mention of the company.

The firm of Brock and Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants at Hamilton, drew, the following bill on John Craig, senior, farmer, Auchinraith, and John Craig, junior, his son:

“£29. 8. 6. Sterling. Hamilton, 8th September 1840.

“One month after date pay to us, or our order, at the British Linen Company's office here, the sum of twenty-nine pounds eight shillings and sixpence Sterling, value of”

(Signed) “BROCK and FERGUSON.”

The Craigs accepted the bill, but did not pay it, and a protest was taken, which bore that the bill was duly protested “at the desire and instance of the drawers and holders thereof, Messrs Brock and Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants in Hamilton, and John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants there, the individual partners of the said company.” The protest was registered, and extract obtained, containing a warrant to charge the acceptors to make payment, “all in terms of the said bill, protest, and decree above written, and that to the said Messrs Brock and Ferguson, and John Brock and Thomas Ferguson.” The execution of the charge omitted the company name of Brock and Ferguson altogether, and was as follows:

“Upon the 22d day of December 1840 years, I, James Kemp, Sheriff-officer, by virtue of an extract-registered protest and warrant of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, at Hamilton, thereon, dated the 21st day of December 1840 years, at the instance of John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants in Hamilton, against John Craig, senior, and John Craig, junior, farmers, both residing at Auchinraith, Blantyre, passed, and in her Majesty's name and authority lawfully charged the said John Craig, senior, and John Craig, junior, to make payment of the sum of twenty-nine pounds eight shillings and sixpence Sterling, and the legal interest thereof since due, and till paid, contained in and due by a bill, dated the 8th day of September 1840 years, drawn by the said John Brock and Thomas Ferguson upon, and accepted by the said John Craig, senior, and John Craig, junior, payable one month after date; and that to the said John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, within six days after the date hereof," &c.

The extract-registered protest, with the execution on a separate paper, having been presented at the office of the Particular Register of Hornings for Lanarkshire, the execution was registered, and on a minute, bearing to be "Minute for Messrs Brock and Ferguson, pursuers," warrant was craved and granted, to imprison the debtors "till they fulfil the said charge." John Craig, senior, was imprisoned accordingly, and brought the present note of suspension and liberation; in support of which

He pleaded—1. When a debt has been contracted to a partnership exclusively in its social character, and as a company firm, diligence upon such a debt, not at the instance of the company, but of individuals styling themselves partners of that company, is inept; and much more is such diligence inept, when it does not even connect these individuals with the creditor in the document of debt, by setting them forth as partners of the firm; Bell's Com. 4th ed. Vol. II. pp. 619, 620, and authorities there referred to; Thomson on Bills, p. 601, et seq. 2. The charge under suspension was irregular and illegal; (1.) Because it bore to proceed upon a warrant, and ordered payment of a bill which had never existed, and was in both respects disconform to its warrant: (2.) Because it ordered payment to be made of a debt for which no warrant to charge had been granted, and to persons as drawers who are not the drawers, and at whose instance no warrant had either been sought or obtained, and was thus, in both respects, without any warrant at all; Act Geo. III. c. 72, § 41; Bell's Principles, § 338, 339, 344, 146, and the authorities there stated; Thomson on Bills, under the head Protest of Bills. 3. The execution of a charge, which is on a paper apart, does not sufficiently apply and refer to the warrant on which it professes to be given. Authorities ut supra. 4. The warrant of imprisonment following upon the charge was illegal; (1.) Because the previous charge being illegal, all that followed upon it was equally so; (2.) Because the warrant was to imprison till that illegal charge be implemented, by making payment to persons, who had no warrant to charge, of an alleged bill for which nobody had a warrant to charge; (3.) Because the warrant to imprison is not at the instance of the individuals who alone charged, and is at the instance of a party who never charged, while there is no derivative title from the one to the other. Authorities ut supra.

The respondents pleaded—1. Having regard to the terms of the bill, which was the foundation of the diligence, and to the fact that John Brock and Thomas Ferguson are the only partners of the company of Brock and Ferguson, there is nothing in the terms of the protest, or warrant of charge, to render the charge, as given, irregular, or liable to any solid objection in law; Bell's Com. 4th ed. Vol. II. pp. 619, 620, and authorities there referred to; Thomson on Bills, p. 561, et seq. 2. In the circumstances, as appearing from the terms of the bill, and the preceding steps of the diligence, the application for a warrant to imprison, and the warrant itself, were made and granted conformably to law, and the objections taken to them ought to be repelled: Act Geo. III. c. 72, sect. 41. Bell's Prin., § 338, 339, 344, 146, and the authorities there stated. Thomson on Bills, under the head Protest of Bills, and authorities there stated. 3. Generally, the reasons of suspension are unfounded, and the letters ought therefore to be found orderly proceeded, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary ordered minutes of debate with the view of reporting the cause, and issued the following note:

"In this case, a bill was drawn under the firm of Brock and Ferguson, and it was protested, and warrant of charge given by the Sheriff to Brock and Ferguson, and John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, partners of the said company. The charge was given as at the instance of John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants in Hamilton, referring to a bill 'dated the 8th September 1840, drawn by the said John Brock and Thomas Ferguson.' The charge having expired, warrant for imprisonment was granted on a minute for Messrs Brock and Ferguson, pursuers, indorsed upon the protest. The protest, charge and minute, are in the same document. The suspender maintains that, in this case, the charge was not in conformity to the protest, and has founded on the case of Forsyth v. Hare and Co., 18th November 1834 (S. and D., XIII. p. 42), on the Statute 1681, c. 20, and the decision in the case of Selby and others, where it was held, that in every step in the progress of a bill, in order to authorise diligence, the rights of parties must be clearly made out, and maintains that by this, in making the charge in disconformity to the protest, the debtor in the bill might have been prevented pleading compensation against the company. The Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion, that there is no disconformity in the diligence in this case, and that, according to the form used in the protest and charge given, the party might have had the benefit of every plea of compensation which he might have been entitled to use against the bill; but as these proceedings took place under the recent Act of Parliament, and relate to the due execution of a diligence, he has thought it proper to report this case to the Court."

At advising,

Lord President.—This is a novel objection. The parties admit there is no case precisely similar to it. I for one think the objection is not to be got over so easily as the respondents seem to imagine. In the first place, we must look to the terms of the bill. It is dated Hamilton, 8th September 1840, and is drawn for a specific sum by Brock and Ferguson on the suspenders, the Craigs. The bill was not paid: it was regularly protested; and the protest, after giving an exact copy of the bill, bears, that it was taken at the instance "of Messrs Brock and Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants in Hamilton, and John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, grocers and spirit merchants there, the individual partners of said company." The Sheriff grants warrant to charge in the names of the very same parties. The messenger proceeds to give the charge, but takes it upon him to depart from the terms of the protest and his warrant; and instead of repeating the names of the firm as they stood on the bill, describes the protest and warrant as having been obtained at the instance of John Brock and Thomas Ferguson, and charges the acceptors to pay to the said John Brock and Thomas Ferguson. The question is, was he entitled thus to deviate, and is the charge so given such as authorised summary diligence on the bill; for it is necessary always to attend to this. I have great difficulty in holding that it is. The duty of the messenger was precise and definite, and his charge ought to have been in strict conformity to the protest. It is said he knew that the names he gave were those of the individual partners of the company. But these names are not on the bill. The only names are "Brock and Ferguson." No doubt the Sheriff, in his warrant, sets forth the names of the individuals as well as the company; but still he gives the proper description, and did nothing to authorise the messenger to drop the proper phraseology of the bill itself. I see no authority for that. I know of no dictum anywhere, that an officer, when performing a specific duty, is entitled to cut and carve on the description of the parties, and give one which he himself thinks sufficient. It is true, in point of fact, that the names given are those of the individual partners; but where was his authority to give them? If he had proper evidence of the fact before him at the time, ought not the charge to have referred to that evidence? It appears to me that this is a deviation without authority; and as the diligence used was summary, we are bound to apply to it the strictest possible rules. I can figure cases in which great injury might result from such a deviation. I do not mean the case of compensation referred to by the suspenders, and which, it is said, might be cut off as against the company, by using the names only of individual partners, but cases in winding up bankrupt estates, where the ranking might be affected by such a deviation in form as occurs here. On the whole, the objection may seem narrow; but I apprehend it is fatal.

Lord Gillies.—I concur, though with some reluctance and hesitation. Your Lordship's observations appear to me just. A messenger is merely an instrument, and is not entitled to abridge, or make what he may think an improvement on his warrant. All he has to do is to give a charge conformable to its terms. Nothing is so simple, and nothing can justify its not being done. It is impossible not to regret the blunder, but it is equally impossible to overlook it. The charge was, to make payment to John Brock and Thomas Ferguson of a bill said to be drawn by them. This is literally untrue. The bill was not drawn by these individuals, but by the company of "Brock and Ferguson." It was not drawn by both, but by one of them in name of the company; though no doubt, in so far as it formed an obligation, it was binding on both. Take the case of a bill drawn on the house of Coutts and Company, —could a charge be given on it in the name of Miss Burdett, Sir J. Antrobus and others? This would be absurd. Is the messenger entitled to proceed on his private knowledge of the individual partners? Certainly not. The terms of his warrant are clear and unambiguous, and he should have followed them.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, and for the same reasons. The bill in the charge is totally different from that in the protest. In the charge, there is no mention of a company, or any intimation of the existence of a company, but of two individuals, to whom the debtors are required to pay. This is the sum and substance of the charge, and it won't do; for the bill charged upon was not drawn by individuals, but by a company. We must here assume that the protest is regular; for the present is not a question of damages, where a prior irregularity in the protest might be pleaded, but merely a suspension,—in which all we have to decide is, whether the execution is such as to warrant the diligence which has been used upon it? I think it is not. Two cases have been referred to, which I consider strong. The one was the case of a husband who charged in his own name on an obligation which had been granted to his wife before marriage. The charge was objected to, and though it might have been pleaded that the marriage was notorious, the charge was held to be insufficient. The other was a case of diligence used against an individual member of a company, and in it the charge was found to be inept, because it was given to the individual only, without any mention of his being member of a company. I concur with great reluctance, but I think it is impossible to sustain this charge.

Lord Fullerton.—I am quite sensible of the propriety of adhering to strict rules in questions of diligence. Here the plea is, that the messenger did not keep in all the names contained in the registered protest. The variation is to be regretted, but looking at the whole circumstances, I am not able to say that it is fatal. The objection appears to me the most critical that ever did occur. The bill was drawn by Brock and Ferguson. It is admitted that John Brock and Thomas Ferguson were the sole partners of the company; and the Sheriff grants warrant in the name both of the company and the individuals. The execution mentions the individuals only. The statement contained in the execution is true, at least to this extent, that the individuals to whom payment was ordered to be made, are the only individuals who were entitled to receive it. I have often found it difficult to reconcile the decisions as to the competency of proceedings in the name of a company; but it seems to be fixed, that on a bill granted by a company, a charge may be given to every individual partner of the company. On a similar principle, the charge which may thus be given to the individual partners, they themselves might be entitled to give. The charge here is not given in the name of the company, but it is given in the name of all the members composing it; and though there is an irregularity in the execution, which is to be regretted, I don't think it is such as to be fatal to the diligence.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Sustain the objection, that the charge is disconform to the warrant; therefore suspend the letters simpliciter, and decern; and grant warrant to the Magistrates of Hamilton to set the suspender at liberty, but find no expenses due."

NO. 14.—JAMES BRYSON, Pursuer, v. MUIR'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.

Process—Summons—Conjoined Action—Competency—An original and a supplementary process being conjoined—Held that a declaratory conclusion contained only in the former, was, in consequence of the conjunction, competently directed against the defenders in the latter.

Continuation of case, Vol. XIII. p. 453. The original and supplementary actions having been conjoined, the defenders in the latter action lodged additional defences, in which they maintained, that the conclusion for payment in the supplementary action having been withdrawn, agreeably to the decision of the Inner-House, the original incompetency was not cured, but rather increased, inasmuch as there was now no conclusion against them to any effect whatever. The only conclusions to which a defender can be called to answer, are those in the particular summons under which he was cited. It was true the actions had been conjoined, but the effect of this conjunction could not be to direct all the conclusions of both actions against the defenders in each of them. There being then no conclusions remaining in the supplementary action, the defenders in it were entitled most emphatically to plead the defence of "no process."

The Lord Ordinary repelled the plea of incompetency.

The defenders reclaimed. The Court ordered the conclusion for payment to be withdrawn, but sustained the competency of the declaratory conclusion.

Process—Cessio—Examination.

Application by creditors for authority to bring two debtors imprisoned at Dornoch to Edinburgh, to be examined by commission in a process of cessio bonorum, was supported on the ground that the books of the debtors (bank agents), which were of great bulk, were lying in process; that the importance of the examination made it necessary that counsel should be present; that on both accounts it would be less expensive, and more convenient that the examination should take place here. Application granted.

No. 16.—ANN MACPHERSON, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM MACPHERSON AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Expenses—Honorarium to Counsel—Process—Circumstances in which the fees of three counsel were allowed against a party found liable in expenses.

Vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 555. The executors of Sir John Macpherson, defenders, having been allowed their expenses in this case, and an account thereof having been given in and taxed, it was objected, that the account contained a charge for fees to three counsel instead of two. Answered, that two of the executors were domiciled in England, and one in Scotland: That two separate defences were given in, resting upon distinct pleas; but that the executors concurred in making up only one record.

Lord Macdowbank.—The executors gave in separate defences, although they agreed to make up only one record: two junior counsel must therefore have been employed in the Outer-House, and neither party was bound to drop his counsel in coming to the Inner-House. Here they were entitled to one senior counsel, so that I think the pursuer has nothing to complain of.

Lord Moncreiff.—There is a great deal in the special circumstances of this case, although the general rule is, that the fees of only two counsel can be charged against the party found liable in expenses.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Separate pleas were maintained by these defenders, and I don't know if they could have been compelled to join their defences.

The Court, in respect of the special circumstances of the case, allowed the charge for three counsel.

No. 17.—JAMES KING, Pursuer, v. P. & W. CREIGHTON, Defenders.

Bill of Exchange—Indorsation—Designation—Alteration—Suspension.—A bill was indorsed by several parties, and when it passed out of the hands of the last indorser, no designation was attached to his own signature or to those of the prior obligants. Subsequently designations were added, inaccurate as to some of the prior indorsers; and a charge being given by the holder to the last indorser, he presented a bill of suspension, on the ground that the errors in the designations vitiated the diligence and also the note, as there were alterations upon it in material parts by which his recourse against the prior obligants was injured.—The Court repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the letters orderly proceeded.

This is a suspension of a charge given upon a bill blank indorsed by the payee and five successive holders, of whom the pursuer was the last. When the note passed from his hands, all the blank indorsements consisted of the name and surname only of the different indorsers, without any addition or designation. The note fell due on the 15th–18th May 1829, and was then in the hands of the defenders, who had added designations to the names of the indorsers, some of which were incorrect. The following is a copy of what now appears on the back of the note:

" James Dunlop,

" Provanhall, near Glasgow.

" Alexander Dunlop,

" Provanhall Toll, near Glasgo.

" James Hunter,

" Farmer, Carmedie, near Glasgo.

" William Hunter,

" Coalmaster, near Provanhall, by Glasgow.

" Andrew Dunlop,

" Dairy Seller, Port-Dundae.

" James King,

" Writer, Glasgow.

" Pat. and Wm. Creighton."

From the evidence subsequently taken at the trial, it appears, 1st, that although Alexander Dunlop is designed, Provanhall toll, near Glasgow, there is in truth no toll at Provanhall, but Dunlop, at the time the bill was indorsed, was tacksman of Drygate toll, which is three miles from Provanhall. 2d, The designation added to James Hunter's indorsation is, farmer, Carmedie, near Glasgow, whereas he resided at Harehouse, Lightburn, and was a tacksman of coals. 3d, William Hunter is designed coalmaster, near Provanhall, by Glasgow, whereas his proper designation is, farmer at Hollowglen or Howglen, near Shettlestone. 4th, After the pursuer's name there were at first added the words, "banker, Falkirk," but these were afterwards scored out, and the designation, "writer, Glasgow," which is admitted to be correct, was substituted.

Various proceedings having taken place upon the bill, as reported ante, Vol. XI. p. 216, 21st December 1838, and on 19th February 1839, the process being remitted to Lord Jeffrey, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

" 2d March 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the remit from the Court, of 19th February last, and whole process, and made avizandum, finds that the chargers have shown no sufficient cause for altering or recalling the interlocutor of Lord Fullerton, of 21st June 1838, reclaimed against, and therefore refuses the prayer of their reclaiming note; and of new sists this process until steps are taken to bring the previous suspensions, at the instance of James Hunter and William Hunter, to a conclusion.

" Note.—It is not necessary to justify a judgment sisting one process till the issue of another, to make out any legal incompetency in proceeding with that which is so sisted. It is enough that it appears highly reasonable and expedient that such a course should be adopted. It is merely a judicial order as to the order of proceeding, and prejudges in no degree the legal merits of the cause.

" Now, in this case it is admitted, that the former suspensions were discussed at considerable length, both before the Lord Ordinary and in the Inner-House; and that the special reason of suspension upon the validity of which the present case now entirely depends, was not the only reason relied on in the bill and expedite letters, and continued to be the leading reason in the revised reasons; but that it was upon the question of relevancy exclusively that the case was taken to the Inner-House, and ultimately remitted to the Lord Ordinary, and to the jury roll, for investigation. It is obviously more reasonable and expedient, therefore (at least, prima facie), that the question should be tried with the proper and original parties in those previous and prepared processes, than that the present suspender should be obliged to go over the whole discussion anew, and be at the expense, in relation to what is truly but a resulting interest of his own, of ascertaining whether these former suspenders had really a good ground for resisting the claim of the chargers.

"But the considerations which have weighed most with the Lord Ordinary, in this discretionary question, are these:—1st, That a judgment rejecting the objection to the charge in the case with the Hunters, will be res judicata to secure the present suspender's recourse upon those parties, if ultimately obliged to pay the chargers, upon an assignment of their diligence against those prior indorsers, while a similar judgment in the case with the present suspender would be res inter alios, and might be effectually resisted when he came, on the faith of that judgment, to seek his recourse against those prior obligants. 2d, The other consideration is, that as the present suspender's case depends on his making out that the chargers have, in point of fact, wrongly designed the Hunters in the warrants of their diligence, and consequently afforded them a good defence, both against their original charge, and his claim of relief, it is evident that he might be put to a disadvantage in proving facts, as to the history and condition of those third parties, which would not be experienced by them; and that it is more expedient, therefore, and more likely to bring out the real truth of the case, that the matter should be settled with those parties themselves, who are already in Court in previous processes, embracing, if not resting exclusively on this very ground.

"In such circumstances, the Lord Ordinary cannot listen to the surmise, that those previous suspenders, with whom the prejudicial question has been correctly raised, may not be so solvent as the present suspender. And as to the suggestion that they may not now choose to insist in this, their only original ground of suspension, or be ultimately successful upon some other, so as to make it unnecessary to give any separate decision on the merits of this, the Lord Ordinary can only say, that while he sees no ground for anticipating such a result, he apprehends that if it should, notwithstanding, occur, it will be competent for the chargers to proceed with the present case, and that any inconvenience which they may possibly suffer from following the course now proposed, must be less than would be imposed on the suspender by following any other. Under the words of the interlocutor, the Lord Ordinary understands that the chargers will be entitled to proceed with the present case as soon as it appears, in the cases with the Hunters, that the prejudicial question is not to be discussed or decided in those cases."

The defenders reclaimed, and the Court altered the interlocutor; after which the case returned to Lord Jeffrey, who remitted it to the jury roll by the following interlocutor:

"5th November 1839.—Having heard parties' procurators, remits this case to the jury roll." "Note.—It is generally very inexpedient to determine points of relevancy before the facts are ascertained. But where, as in the present case, the relevancy may depend on specialties or qualifications of the main fact averred by the suspenders, the objection to such a course of proceeding seems insuperable. The issue, it is understood, will not be the special one, whether the designations of the parties are false or incorrect; but, generally, whether the suspenders are resting and owing the sum charged for, which will leave every thing in law, as well as in fact, open at the trial."

Under this judgment, which reserved all matters of law entire, the case came on to be tried at Glasgow before Lord Ivory, in September 1840. On that occasion various witnesses were examined, and documentary evidence produced, after which the Dean of Faculty (Hope), for the pursuer, put in the following minute:

"On the part of the pursuer, James King, I consent that if the Court be of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled in law to the verdict, the Court shall pronounce judgment in the suspension for the chargers, without any further trial."

The following verdict was returned:

"At Glasgow, 3d September 1840.

"The jury find for the pursuer, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the questions of law arising out of the facts, as appearing from the Judge's notes and documents produced."

(Signed) "WM. CLERK."

The Court then appointed the minute, verdict, and notes of the Judge, to be printed and boxed, after which an interlocutor was pronounced ordering minutes of debate.

Pleaded for the pursuer—

That there was no legal protest of the bill, and, consequently, that the defenders lost all recourse both against the grantor and the indorsers. The protest sets out with a copy of the bill, and in that copy, while the names of all the indorsers, as they originally stood, are inserted, there are also added the erroneous and incorrect designations, by which the application of those names to the true owners of them is destroyed. There is, therefore, no protest against the parties whose names actually stand on the bill as indorsers; and in terms of the Statute, the defenders necessarily lost all recourse against the prior obligants in the bill. Farther, the same errors and blunders must be considered as fatal to the validity of the charge and diligence. The letters of horning are founded on the protest, and adopt the whole of its blunders. In the execution of the charge, there is an attempt to correct some of the errors in the previous steps of the diligence, but the execution thereby becomes disconform to the warrant; and the record being closed, it is now incompetent to turn the charge into a libel. The alteration of a bill without consent of the parties, and in any material part, such as the date, the term of payment, the sum, the names of the parties, and the place of payment, is fatal to its validity, independently of the Stamp Acts. In giving notice of dishonour, the pursuer must have followed the precise terms of the bill and protest, and must have sent his notices either to parties who did not exist, or to places where the real parties were not to be found. In either case his recourse must have been cut off, and the defenders are not entitled to demand payment from him, as if they were in a situation to deliver up the bill to him, with all his rights and remedies unimpaired. Under such circumstances, there can be no ground for doubting the materiality of the alterations in question.

Pleaded for the defenders—

That the pursuer was not relieved from liability in respect of the designations added to the names of the indorsers. Indorsers do not require to add their designations to their signatures. They are not of the essence of the indorsation. Without any designation at all, the bill would have been a sufficient warrant for proceeding against the parties by their real designations. And if they admitted their signature, no point could have been made by them on the want of designation. To make an alteration a vitiation, it must be in a material part of the bill, such as the date, sum, or term of payment. But the residence of the indorsers is altogether immaterial. No presentment of the bill is made there: so that the plea of undue negotiation cannot enter into the question. The addition is merely a memorandum for the holder, and if inaccurate, he might not obtain the benefit he expected from it. But in this respect he would be no worse than he would have been if there had been no designations at all; and if the identical indorsers were known or discovered, no disadvantage whatsoever could be sustained. The pursuer is not in a condition to plead injury to his recourse against the prior indorsers. He admits that he himself got notice; but he does not assert that on getting such notice, he gave notice to any of the prior obligants. The defenders were not bound to do this for him; and the consequent legal presumption is, that he did not mean to claim his recourse. He may have had no recourse to claim. Further, the defenders were not bound to have proceeded against any of the prior indorsers, and are not bound to assign over to the pursuer regular or complete diligence against them. But, the pursuer does not sufficiently distinguish betwixt the act and the instrument of protest. Even supposing that the copying of the designations into the instrument made it irregular, the bill was sufficiently negotiated when it was noted; and it will not be disputed that a protest may be extended, from the noting at any time within forty years, and that if a mistake is committed, it may be rectified by extending the instrument of new. It is said that the pursuer must have given his notice in terms of the designations, which could never have reached the parties, and would, therefore, have been nugatory and unavailing. But, he must be held to have known who the parties were, and where they were to be found, who were liable to him in recourse, or against whom he meant to keep up his right of recourse; and it would have been absurd for him to have taken the information, or to have asked the information, of indorsees subsequent to himself, and deriving title from himself.

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—The objection of the pursuer is, that after the note had been indorsed by him, and put out of his hands, incorrect designations were added to the signatures of some of the prior indorsers. But this is no vitiation of the note. The addition did not relate to any of the essentials which go to constitute a bill,—the parties, sum, date, or term of payment. It was merely a memorandum, and did not affect the features of the bill, or alter any thing contained in it, or the parties signing it. The inaccuracy of the designations might have injured the pursuer's recourse, by his notice not reaching the prior indorsers; but if he gave value for the bill, he must have known the parties with whom he transacted; and by adding his own indorsement, he was the more bound to know, or to have inquired who the prior obligants were. On receiving notice himself, he ought to have given it to the preceding indorsers; and there was nothing to prevent his doing so in the case of those whose designations were correct. It is said that the charger was bound to make over to the suspender valid diligence on receiving payment from him, but if he gave no notice, he cannot plead this. The parties do not deny their signatures, although the designations are inaccurate. The notary simply asks payment from the drawer or acceptor, and if refused, protests against all parties. When the charger intimated the dishonour of the bill to the suspender, he gave no notice to the prior indorsers; I conceive that the charger did all that he was bound to do.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the pursuer was the last indorser, but he says, that certain designations were added to the signatures of the prior indorsers, and that the bill was vitiated, and his recourse injured. Now, it is clear law, that if notice was given to the pursuer himself, the charger was entitled to proceed against him. The defence turns upon technical objections. In the first place, did the inaccuracy of the designations extinguish the recourse of the pursuer against the preceding indorsers? The designations are wholly immaterial to the bill as a document of debt, and might have been deleted. If an ordinary action had been raised, and the deletion explained, the action would have been effectual, notwithstanding the accident of a wrong designation. As to the errors in the instrument of protest, the act of protesting consists in the noting, of which the instrument is merely an extension. But taking the instrument of protest here, does it not state that this particular note had been duly protested? In the second place, if the errors in the designations did not exclude recourse, did they render diligence incompetent? This does not depend on the validity of the diligence used against Hunter and Dunlop, for there was nothing to prevent the extension of a new instrument of protest containing correct designations. These do not form part of the bill, and, as mere markings, cannot vitiate it. The authorities lead to this, that an inaccuracy in parts not material may be corrected. In the third place, if the errors put the recourse of the last indorser in peril, and he could have made out this defence, he might have had a good deal to say. But the charge is liable to no fault in itself against him, and the premises are awaiting to his plea; for, in my opinion, he is not entitled to executio parata.

Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Meadowbank concurred.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the said verdict ought to be entered up in favour of the defenders, and not for the pursuer, and ordain accordingly; and in respect of the said finding, they repel the reasons of suspension; find the letters orderly proceeded, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to the expenses incurred by them in this cause; appoint an account," &c.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 19.—DANIEL KING, Pursuer v. MARGARET PATRICK or KING, Defender.

Proof—Witness—Objection to Credibility—Malice—Extra-judicial Statement—In leading the proof allowed in a process of divorce, a witness for the pursuer was interrogated by the defender, whether, on a particular occasion, she had said she would be revenged against the alleged paramour? which she denied. On the cross-examination of a subsequent witness, the defender asked, whether, on the same occasion, she had heard the preceding witness make any statement relative to the paramour? The pursuer objected that the question was incompetent, as being an attempt to contradict what the previous witness had stated on oath. The commissioner allowed the answer to be taken down in writing, and sealed up; on appeal, the Court, holding it to be the object of the question to prove malice against the previous witness, repelled the objection, and allowed the packet to be opened; but under the reservation, that if, from the answer, it appeared that the question put did not apply to the identical occasion deponed to by the previous witness, the answer should be struck out.

This was a process of divorce brought in January 1839. The oath of calumny was emitted on the 20th February, and the record was closed on summons and defences, 5th March 1839. On the same day, parties were allowed a proof of their respective averments, and a remit was made to the Sheriff's Commissaries accordingly. A variety of objections were taken by both parties during the leading of the proof, and on appeals to the Court against the deliverances of the commissioner, were articulately disposed of by the Lord Ordinary, who at the same time decerned and declared in the divorce in terms of the conclusions of the libel. On a reclaiming note for the defender, the whole of the findings of the Lord Ordinary were adhered to, except the fourth, which related to an objection stated by the pursuer to a cross question put by the defender to a witness, called Susan Craig. Elizabeth Hamilton, a witness also for the pursuer, and who had been examined previously to Susan Craig, being interrogated for the defender,

"Whether the deponent recollects of being in the house of Mrs Cross upon one occasion, when a person named Samuel Cooper came there, and communicated some tidings respecting Mr Macfarlane?" (the alleged paramour) "Depones in the affirmative. Interrogated, and desired to say what were the tidings which Cooper communicated on that occasion? To which question it was objected by the counsel for the pursuer as being quite incompetent. Whereupon the counsel for the defender, without admitting the validity of the objection, proposed to remodel his question, and to put it as follows: Whether, in consequence of what was so communicated by Cooper, the deponent made any observation, and if so, what that observation was? To which question it was objected by the counsel for the pursuer, that as remodelled, it was, if possible, more clearly incompetent than as previously expressed. The counsel for the defender having still pressed the question, but without entering into argument in support of it, the commissioner allows the question to be put, reserving to himself, and to the counsel for the pursuer, still to interfere, in the event of the defender's counsel following up the question by any farther questions plainly irrelevant. Against which deliverance the counsel for the pursuer appealed to the Lord Ordinary. And the witness being called in, and the question being put to her, she depones, That she does not recollect of any particular observation which she made, either to Cooper or to Mrs Cross. Interrogated, Whether, in consequence of what Cooper communicated, the deponent stated that she would be revenged against the defender and Mr Macfarlane, or against one or other of them? Depones in the negative. Being specially interrogated, Whether, on that or on any other occasion, the deponent said, in presence of Mrs Cross and of Cooper, or in presence of either of them, that she would be revenged, and called God to witness that she would be so? Depones in the negative. Interrogated, Whether, at that time, or at any subsequent time, the deponent did not express feelings of revenge or hostility against Mr Macfarlane? Which question was objected to by the counsel for the pursuer, and the objection was answered by the counsel for the defender; whereupon the commissioner repelled the objection. Against which deliverance the counsel for the pursuer appealed to the Lord Ordinary; and the question having been put to the witness, she depones and answers, That she certainly did feel hurt by some expressions respecting her, which she understood Mr Macfarlane had used before the Presbytery, but the deponent never expressed any feelings of revenge or hostility against Mr Macfarlane."

At the examination of Susan Craig, the following proceedings took place. Interrogated for the defender,

"depones, That the deponent recollects upon one occasion of being at Mrs Cross's house, when she saw there the said Elizabeth Hamilton, and a man named Samuel Cooper. Depones, That on the same day on which the deponent saw Elizabeth Hamilton and Cooper at Mrs Cross's, there had been a meeting of the Relief Presbytery regarding the said Rev. John Macfarlane. Interrogated, Whether the deponent heard Elizabeth Hamilton make any statement relative to Mr Macfarlane upon that occasion; to which question it was objected by the counsel for the pursuer, that it was incompetent to prove the extrajudicial statements of a witness, in order to contradict or discredit her evidence in causa; to which it was answered for the defender, that the object of the interrogatory was to prove that Elizabeth Hamilton, upon the occasion in question, had expressed vindictive feelings towards Mr Macfarlane, and had declared that she would be revenged upon him on account of a statement which he had made, or was understood to have made, at the meeting of presbytery; that the fact thus proposed to be proved was of the most vital importance in considering the evidence adduced by the pursuer in this case; and that the witness, Elizabeth Hamilton, had been specially questioned on the subject, as appeared from the proof, pp. 80 to 85, both inclusive. The commissioner having heard the counsel for the parties, is inclined to think that the rule of not inquiring into extrajudicial statements of witnesses for the purpose of discrediting their evidence, is not strictly applicable to the present case, where the fact is in dispute, whether or not the witness, Elizabeth Hamilton, had used the vindictive expression referred to from page 80 to page 85 of the proof. At the same time, from deference to the opinion of the learned Judges who presided at the trials in the cases of Walker, 13th July 1836, and of the Hercules Insurance Company, 26th and 27th July 1836, the commissioner resolves that the question may be put to the witness in the meantime, and her answer to the same to be taken down on a paper apart, to be sealed up, and to lie in retentis until the point in dispute be decided by the Lord Ordinary."

The Lord Ordinary, in the fourth finding of an interlocutor which he pronounced on 23d February 1841, disposing of the whole cause, sustained the objection, and refused to allow the sealed packet to be opened. In a note previously issued, the Lord Ordinary expresses himself to the following effect, in reference to this objection:

"4. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the objection stated by the pursuer on p. 113 of the proof, to a cross question put by the defender to Susan Craig, is well founded, and ought to be sustained. The object of that question is, to prove by this witness, that Elizabeth Hamilton, the principal witness for the pursuer, expressed herself before the Relief Presbytery in a vindictive manner towards Mr Macfarlane, the alleged paramour. But as Elizabeth Hamilton herself was examined specially as to her statements on that very subject, and gave explicit answers, (see proof, p. 82, &c.,) the only object of the defender's cross question must be to contradict what Elizabeth Hamilton had stated on oath. As the law stands, however, such a proof is not admissible in ordinary cases, and the Lord Ordinary does not see that there is any ground for making an exception of the present case."

At advising the reclaiming note presented by the defender,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There are points of considerable nicety involved in the fourth finding of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. They arise thus: When Elizabeth Hamilton was examined, certain questions were put to her with a view to get an avowal by her of uttering vindictive expressions against the alleged paramour of the defender. This she denied; and in the cross-examination of another witness, the defender tries to establish the fact. Three questions arise here: 1st, Supposing the expressions proved a vindictive purpose or feeling against the paramour, is it sufficient to affect the credibility of the witness? 2d, Supposing an inquiry into such a purpose to be competent and relevant, must it be made out by the witness herself, or may it be proved on the cross-examination of another? 3d, Has the question been put to the witness herself with sufficient precision as to satisfy the law that the question put on cross, related to the same expressions, and to the same occasion? As to the first point, I am of opinion that it is a relevant objection to the credibility of a witness, that she avows a purpose of being avenged against a person whom she considers to be the paramour. Objections to credibility are much broader than those entertained against the admissibility of witnesses. Any feeling or purpose which may prompt to a false or exaggerated representation of facts, and which it can be made out that the witness is under at the time, is sufficient to affect credibility. If the hostility be entertained against the defender in the process, it will be relevant, though general; but if against the paramour, I apprehend it must be in relation to the cause. In regard to the second point, whether the expressions must be made out by the examination of the witness herself only, or may be proved by the evidence of others, it is not proposed to contradict the evidence given in causa by Hamilton, but to establish her hostility. It is not competent to prove the extrajudicial statements of a witness in order to contradict her evidence on oath. It is not competent to examine the witness herself with such a view, as was held in the case of Hardie. And if the evidence of Susan Craig were adduced to contradict Elizabeth Hamilton's evidence in causa, it would be excluded to that effect. But still it might be admitted as substantive evidence of enmity and malice; Mackay, 4 Mur. 283: For evidence may be competent for one purpose, though not for another. One competent mode of proving enmity, is by proving expressions of hostility. It is necessary to examine the witness herself, that she may give an explanation of her feelings; but her denial cannot exclude the proof of malice, as of a fact, by others. It is not competent to discredit a witness in initialibus; Dickson, Mur. 1. p. 43; and the pursuer cannot, by the order in which he examines his witnesses, affect the right of the defender to establish his objection to her credibility. If Susan Craig had been examined first, still the defender was entitled to get at his objection: nor was he limited to one species of evidence. He might do it partly by the witness herself, and partly by others. He must examine the witness herself, as her explanation of her feelings is material; but if she fails him, he cannot, by giving her an opportunity for explanation, cut himself off from establishing his objection. The third point, and one of the greatest consequence, is, whether the question put to Susan Craig was the same as that put to Elizabeth Hamilton? The greatest care must be taken that the question is the same and identical; for if the witness referred to a different occasion, her answer would go for nothing. In this case, I am humbly of opinion that the questions put were substantially the same. The objection to the question was taken at the first; and it seems to have been the understanding of all parties that the defender had satisfied the identity of the questions at the time. The objection to the identity, if there be any, ought to be stated before those to the competency. But although the understanding of the commissioner and the counsel be apparent, it is quite essential that the witness understands the question in the same way, and that it relates to the same identical occurrence and occasion. This can appear only when her evidence is taken; and if there be any doubt attending it, the Court will reject her evidence. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that we must alter the fourth finding in the interlocutor.

Lord Meadowbank.—I concur in the opinion delivered, and have nothing to add to the general observations which have been made. But there is one point on which I would not wish to give a decided opinion, because we are not called upon to do so; and it is this, that if Susan Craig had been examined first, it would have been competent to put the question to her, in the same way as when she was examined subsequently to Elizabeth Hamilton. That is a point which has not yet been ruled, and it is not necessary for us to determine it here. The expressions used being indicative of malice, are an exception to the general rule applicable to the extrajudicial statements of a witness. The questions put to Elizabeth Hamilton and Susan Craig are identical. If there were a discrepancy, I would make a distinction; but it is sufficient that the counsel and commissioner understood them to be identical, to warrant us in at least opening her evidence to see what it is. As to the more general question asked Elizabeth Hamilton, whether, on any occasion, she had said she would be revenged,—I would not have admitted the same general question to be put to Susan Craig.

Lord Moncreiff.—The point raised is one of very great importance, in so far as it is of general bearing, and I concur in the opinion, and in nearly all of the observations delivered by the Lord Justice-Clerk. I think the question, as put, must be admitted, to the effect of looking at the written answer. However much we may admire the law of England, our practice is in one point very different. Where a witness, on oath, denies that he ever did say otherwise than he has done on his oath, by our law we cannot call other witnesses to discredit him. And if the whole object of the question put to Susan Craig was to prove that Hamilton had not spoken the truth when she denied having used expressions of malice, we could not have admitted the question. But here the question relates to substantive evidence of feelings, which it is not necessary should be sufficient to exclude the witness as incompetent, but merely to affect her credibility. The objection to the question was overcome in the case of Mackay v. Macleod (4 Mur., 283), where Lord Cringletie brings out the distinction. In the first place, the enmity is not cherished against the defender, but the paramour. The objection, however, does not go to the admissibility of the witness—only to her credibility; and the paramour and defender are involved in the same charge. In the second place, if the question could not be put without having been put also to Hamilton,—I say nothing of what would have been the effect if Craig had been examined first,—was it put with precision to Hamilton as to time, place, and occasion? On this point I have great difficulty. There was a vagueness in the question, and a want of precision as to the persons to whom she made the statement. If Craig had been mentioned, it might have revived her recollection, and she might perhaps have been able to explain. No doubt the pursuer's counsel and the commissioner assumed the questions to be identical; but this Court will protect the witness and party notwithstanding. A general question would not have been enough to warrant the question put to Craig. We may look at the answer; but if it does not sufficiently show the identity of the questions, it must be struck out.

Lord Medwyn.—I consider this a very important case, and had made out notes of my opinion; but as I concur with those which have been delivered, I shall not go over them. I rather, however, concur with the opinion of Lord Meadowbank, that it is not necessary we should determine here what would have been the effect of the pursuer's having examined Susan Craig first.

The Court altered the interlocutor as to the fourth finding, repelled the objection, and allowed the sealed packet to be opened.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 20.—MARGARET BRYSON or TORRANCE, Pursuer,
v. JAMES BRYSON, Defender.

Title to Sue—Executor—Process—One of three executors brought an action in her own name, against one of the other co-executors, for her share of a debt due by him to the defunct. The summons libelled that the third executor refused to concur in the action, and there was no averment that any debts of the deceased remained to be satisfied—Held, in the circumstances, that she was entitled to pursue the action.

By a codicil, dated 17th January 1837, the deceased Mrs Cunison bequeathed to James Bryson, the defender, Charlotte Bryson and Margaret Bryson, the pursuer, and to Ann Bryson, now deceased, the residue of her whole moveable estate, share and share alike. The summons in the present action sets forth, that James Bryson was owing to the deceased at the time of her death a sum of £500: That the pursuer is one of the executors of the deceased Janet Bryson or Cunison, decerned to her qua nearest of kin, conform to decree-dative of the Commissary of Glasgow in favour of the pursuer and the said James Bryson, defender, and his sister Charlotte Bryson—the latter of whom refuses to concur in this action; and under the foresaid codicil the pursuer is entitled to one-fourth part or share of the foresaid debt, for payment of which restricted sum the summons concluded.

The defender pleaded, inter alia—That the pursuer being only one of several co-executors, has no right to pursue the present action without the concurrence of the others.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“22d June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the closed record, and thereafter considered the process, In respect that the object of the present action is to constitute and realise the share of a specific fund, alleged to have been intromitted with, or still due by one of the next of kin of a party defunct, to another of the next of kin,—that it is specially averred in the libel, that the other next of kin now in life refuses to join in the suit, and that no ground is stated for inferring that creditors or third parties other than the next of kin have now any interest in the succession of the defunct, Repels the first defence and plea in law urged on record for the defender: And appoints the cause to be enrolled in the motion roll quam primum, that parties may come prepared to state whether they have any farther evidence to adduce on the merits on either side, and in what form such proof shall proceed; reserving the question of expenses till an ulterior stage of the cause.

“Note.—The Lord Ordinary is not aware of any principle in law, or of any authority in our books, for holding that an action by one of the next of kin of a party deceased against another relative in the same degree, who is said to have had a super-intromission with, or drawn a larger share of the funds of their common ancestor than he ought to have done, under such circumstances as are here averred, should be pronounced incompetent. The case of a stranger debtor being sued by one only out of several co-executors, is obviously a very different suit from the present, as third parties may plead that, without a title, they may be exposed to a second accounting at the instance of others interested. The object of the present action, if the pursuer's libel can be substantiated, resolves into this,—to constitute the right of one of the successors of a defunct to a rateable share of a particular fund, said to have been wrongously intromitted with, or appropriated by others of the next of kin, to the exclusion and prejudice of the pursuer. The Lord Ordinary is unable to conceive any ground, in law or in form, on which such an action of accounting and payment can be objected to.”

The defender reclaimed, and argued—

If the pursuer sues as beneficially interested in the executry, she must sue the executors; for a beneficiary cannot sue the debtors to the estate directly. She may pursue as executor, but the summons is not libelled as executor; and she is only one of three executors. The office of executor being one and indivisible, one out of several is not entitled to sue against a stranger debtor; Stair, p. 591; Inglis, M. 16,115. Where any of the executors refuse to concur, the remedy is, to sue the executors to recover, or to institute a process to have them ordained to concur; or by a process in the Commissary Court to have them excluded; Young, M. 3380. In the case of Rogerson, 11 Shaw, p. 569, some of the executors, pursuers, were divested during the progress of the cause by disposition omnium bonorum; but the whole were originally parties to the suit, and the remaining four were allowed to proceed. The defender is a co-executor; but he is a debtor to the deceased, and is in so far a stranger. This is not an accounting, as the Lord Ordinary assumes, between two co-executors, when all other parties have been satisfied. The defender here is entitled to a proper discharge; and this the pursuer could not grant, being only one of several executors. No doubt, when a debt has been constituted by decree at the instance of all the executors, each is entitled to recover and discharge his own share. In the case of Mactargat, 12th May 1829, two co-executors raised a multiplepinding in name of the debtor, and called all the executors, and in this way obtained decree for their share.

Answered—

The general rule does not apply here; for in order to meet the difficulty, it is set forth in the summons that the debt is due by one of the co-executors, and that the other refuses to concur. The conclusion also of the summons is restricted to one-fourth share of the debt. The only ground of objection stated is, that the defender may be liable in second payment to other parties; but of that there is no risk, as only one-fourth is sued for, and the defender can't say that any other party has claims upon the executry; Stair, III. 8, § 59. In the case of Inglis, M. 16,115, the payment was found not legal, only in so far as it exceeded the proper share of the executor. The remedies proposed involve a multiplication of litigation, and are unsuited to the forms of modern pleading.

Lord Medwyn.—The general rule is, that the executors must pursue the creditors to the estate, and that legatees cannot. But if the executors, thinking the claim unjust, or if acting capriciously they should refuse to concur, Stair mentions a remedy adopted in the case of Young, where he was secluded from office, and the other executors allowed to go on. Here one of the executors raises an action, libelling the refusal of another to concur against the third, who is the debtor, and who cannot be expected to concur. It is stated in the summons that the sister refused to concur; perhaps it would have been better to have called upon her to concur, or to state the cause of her refusal by protest. I do not lay much stress upon the case of a voluntary payment to an individual executor. In the case of Rogerson, two out of six executors having been divested by disposition omnium bonorum, the remaining four were allowed to carry on the suit to the extent of their own shares; and it is of no consequence that the process was originally in the names of the whole. In Mactargat, the executor raised a multiplepinding, and brought all into the field; but the action was held relevant for recovering his own share. I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, that the instance is good, and that the discharge would be good.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am also clear for sustaining the interlocutor. This is a special case, and not that of a stranger debtor. In Hope's Practices there occur some important observations which I shall read—(reads p. 147, and p. 180). Charlotte Bryson is set forth in the libel as refusing to concur; and it is not averred that there are debts of the executry for which this money may be required. The case of Mactargat is explicit, and is an express judgment on the very point.

Lord Meadowbank concurred.

No. 21.—MISS MARY COWIE and OTHERS, (Lovie's Trustees), Pursuers, v. GEORGE DUNCAN, Defender, —Et à contra.

Sale—Misrepresentation—Sub-lease—Reparation—Damages—The seller of a lease found liable in damages to the purchaser for concealing the existence of a written sub-lease which he had previously granted of part of the lands, though that sub-lease was defeasible at the pleasure of the landlord.

James Lovie, tenant of the farm of Fortree of Esslemont, on the 9th March 1838, entered into a minute of sale with George Duncan, in which he acknowledged to have sold to Duncan his lease of the farm, and “all right and title which I and my heirs have to the possession and occupation” thereof, “with the houses and pertinents,”—“with the whole stocking and other effects of every description at present thereon, including cattle, horses, and farming utensils, turnips and fodder.” He further engaged “to prepare the land for the ensuing crop 1838, and to afford grain and grass seeds, and to sow the same at my own expense, and to conduct the whole necessary farming operations until Whitsunday next, in case the said George Duncan shall not have taken up his residence on the farm before that time.” Duncan, on his part, engaged, besides relieving Lovie of all prestations under the lease, to pay to him the sum of £560 at Whitsunday 1838, with interest till payment, and penalty in case of failure.

Duncan entered into possession, and paid £260 of the price at the stipulated term, but he refused to make any further payment till compensated for certain articles of furniture which he alleged to have been removed from the farm contrary to agreement, and also for the damage which he sustained by a part of the farm, extending to about eighteen acres, being withheld from him by a crofter of the name of Rainnie, to whom Lovie had, in 1833, granted a written sub-lease at a rent of £4. 10s. Lovie's trustees denied that any furniture had been improperly removed, and alleged, that when the minute of sale was entered into, Duncan was perfectly aware of Rainnie's possession, and understood that no deduction was to be made on account of it from the stipulated price. After Lovie's death counter actions were raised,—the one by his trustees, concluding for payment of the balance of the price,—and the other by Duncan, concluding for payment of £124, “being the difference of value for nine years' rent between the actual worth of the subjects sublet, and the elusory rent of £4. 10s.,” and also for payment of £17. 3. 6., being the value of the articles removed improperly from the farm.

A proof was led, in which one of Duncan's witnesses deponed, that he had visited the farm at Duncan's request, for the purpose of inspecting it previous to the purchase of the lease; that Lovie, in pointing out the boundaries, included Rainnie's croft in the farm, and said that “Rainnie was a tenant at will, and had no lease,” but was a useful man about the farm; that to the best of his recollection, the price which Lovie asked for the farm was £600.—John Duncan (the party's brother) deponed, that he was present at the inspection of the farm with the previous witness; that Lovie “included Rainnie's croft within the boundaries of the farm,” and said that Rainnie “was merely a tenant of will, and that my brother could remove him whenever he liked,” and that “Rainnie had no lease.” That Lovie also said, that “my brother would find Rainnie a very useful man about the farm;” and “at this time asked £600 for the lease.”—Duncan's witnesses valued the rent of Rainnie's possession from 15s. to 20s. per acre, but other witnesses thought the actual rent enough.—Mr Brebner, factor on the estate, deponed, that Lovie had no power to sublet, but that he, on the proprietor's behalf, had consented to the sublet to Duncan; that the minute of sale was made out under his direction; that to the best of his recollection, Lovie never mentioned to him that he had sublet any part of the farm; that he was confident he never mentioned that any part of it was let on a written sub-lease, otherwise he would have caused notice to be taken of it in the minute of sale; that a summons of removing was prepared by him, and executed against Lovie, in order to give Duncan a free entrance to the farm, and that this summons was meant to extend to the whole farm of Fortree; that Lovie never applied for leave to sublet Rainnie's croft; and that if leave had been asked, he does not think he would have given it.—William Rainnie, the crofter, deponed, “I consider the rent I pay a sufficient rent.” “I have paid my rent to Mr Duncan since he became tenant of Fortree.” “He never asked me to remove.” “Since Whitsunday last, Mr Duncan desired me to ask £40 for the croft.” “I asked £40, but Mr Duncan did not offer me that sum.” “I would give up my croft for £20,”—“I mean the £20 for the ground alone, exclusive of the value of the houses and dung.” “Mr Duncan bade me seek for the croft; and I said, What will I seek? Will I seek £20?” Mr Duncan said, “I might ask more than that, as he would give me more than that.”

Lovie's trustees pleaded—1. The defender having purchased the lease in the full knowledge of the existence of the sub-tack, cannot pretend afterwards to retain any part of the purchase price on the ground of not having obtained possession of the whole subjects sold. 2. It was the duty of the defender, in purchasing the lease, to inform himself as to the state of the possession; and, without an averment of fraud and deception on the part of Lovie, no ground of damages on his part would exist. 3. The defender having brought forward no objection during Lovie's lifetime, but, on the contrary, made payment, without objection, of a large part of the purchase price, and promised payment of the rest, cannot now retain any part of the balance on the ground of not having got possession of all he bargained for. 4. The claim of deduction for articles removed is unfounded, in respect the defender got delivery of all the articles sold to him, received the articles without objection, and only brought forward his claim of deduction about six months thereafter.

Duncan pleaded—1. The sale of a lease implies, at common law, warrandice from fact and deed. 2. In the circumstances of the case, the deceased James Lovie was bound to place the defender in the full right of the lease sold to him, in the same manner and to the same effect as he (Lovie) held the same from the landlord; and the pursuers are still bound to do so before exacting payment of the stipulated price; or failing this, they are bound to give a deduction from the price, so as to indemnify the defender from the loss he sustains by part of the subjects contained in the lease being under a sub-lease to the foresaid William Rainnie for the remaining years of the principal tack. 3. In the circumstances of this case, the foresaid sub-lease, granted for the whole period of the principal lease, having been fraudulently concealed from the defender at the time that he purchased the principal lease from the said James Lovie, he is entitled to retain the price to the extent of the damage occasioned through such fraud. 4. In the case of moveable property, a purchaser is not bound to pay for articles sold to him, but not delivered.

The Lord Ordinary decided in favour of Lovie's trustees in both actions. His Lordship's note in the action in which Duncan was pursuer, is as follows:

"The grounds on which the Lord Ordinary, after again considering this case, continues to think the claim of Duncan is not well founded, either in law or in substantial justice, are these:—

"1st, It is proved by witnesses on both sides, that Duncan, before concluding his agreement with the deceased James Lovie, knew that William Rainnie was possessing a croft. Two witnesses swear that Lovie told Duncan that Rainnie was a tenant at will; but that communing was confessedly some days before the final conclusion of the bargain, and at a time when Lovie was asking £600 for an assignment of the lease. It was subsequent to that period that Duncan concluded a bargain with Lovie for a transfer of the lease at the diminished price of £560, which diminished price may have been struck in consequence of the set of Rainnie's croft.

"2d, In the missive that passed between Lovie and Duncan, no notice was taken of Rainnie's croft; and no stipulation was made for Rainnie's removal, though the purchaser then knew that he possessed a croft. On the contrary, other stipulations were made which show that Rainnie was to retain his possession. Thus, it was provided that Lovie was to prepare the whole land for the ensuing crop, which the purchaser was to possess, and to sow it out at his own expense, &c.; but Duncan saw that no such preparation was made of Rainnie's croft. Notwithstanding which Duncan accepted of and entered into possession without any complaint made at the time (Whitsunday 1838) that he had not got such possession as Lovie himself previously enjoyed, and had agreed to give over to Duncan.

"3d, It is established by the testimony of Mr Brebner, that he got from Lovie and Duncan jointly, soon after the transaction was concluded, in the spring of 1838, a note of the crofters, against whom a summons of removing should be served at the landlord's instance, in order to clear the possession for Duncan's entry prior to Whitsunday 1838. That writ is produced (No. 28 of process); and while it contained a conclusion for removing Lovie himself and Alexander Milne and James Marr, it did not include the crofter William Rainnie. Though Mr Brebner did not know the reason for this omission, it shows plainly that both Duncan and Lovie had previously agreed that Rainnie should not be removed.

"4th, There is no evidence that there was any objection made by Duncan to the sublet of Rainnie's small croft till after Lovie, the person who could best explain the transaction, was dead. But the Lord Ordinary holds that it was then too late for the pursuer to object, and to retain possession of the subjects which had been given and accepted of by him at Whitsunday 1838, in the same manner as Lovie previously held possession. It must be presumed that Duncan, on taking possession at Whitsunday 1838, knew well by that time on what terms Rainnie was actually possessing his croft, as he did not get the natural possession of that part of the lands. Notwithstanding which the pursuer contentedly took such possession as was then given him, without protest or objection of any sort. Possibly he might have thrown up the bargain if he laboured under any mistake as to Rainnie's croft. But he made no objection when Lovie was alive. On the contrary, he took payment of one or more terms' rent from Rainnie, and thus led that individual, as long as he lived, to suppose that the purchaser acknowledged the transaction to have been of the same nature and import as Lovie understood it. The advancement of such a claim after Lovie's death, is sufficient of itself to raise an inference against the pursuer's claim.

"Lastly, On the proof as it stands, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the evidence, when fairly weighed, does not show that the pursuer suffers any real loss or damage by the sublet of this trifling croft. Two apparently respectable and extensive farmers swear, that the rent paid is the full value of the croft, and that only five acres are really worth retention by the subtenant; and although the pursuer has certainly called various witnesses, who put a higher valuation on the subject, yet the testimony of Alexander Rainnie and William Rainnie (witnesses whose views should rather be in favour of than against their surviving landlord), goes far to throw great discredit on the whole claim, pleas, and statements of the pursuer. At all events, even if the proof as to damage were nearly balanced, the Lord Ordinary conceives that the facts deponed to by the Rainnies ought, ceteris paribus, to turn the scale in favour of Lovie's heirs."

Duncan reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I have not a favourable opinion of Duncan's claim. I don't say I agree with every thing contained in the interlocutor and note of the Lord Ordinary; but if the claim is to be sustained, it must be to a very limited extent. In the first place, it is clearly proved by the oath of Rainnie, that he did not put a higher value on his sub-lease than £20; and I see very good evidence, as far as Rainnie's testimony affords it, that he was prompted and advised to ask a larger sum. He says to Duncan, "what will I seek? Will I seek £20?" Duncan's answer is, that he might ask more, as he would give more. What construction can be put on this conversation but this, that Duncan wanted to enhance the value of the damages, and show that he was claiming no more in his action than he was entitled to receive. It is said that Rainnie's sub-lease is useless, because not sanctioned by the landlord. Certainly this sanction has not been given, and it does not appear that Duncan has ever made any application to the landlord on the subject. Possibly, if he were to apply, the landlord would put an end to the question at once. The claim is undoubtedly made in circumstances not calling for any favour, though the concealment of the written sub-lease by the other party, is far from creditable. On the whole, if damages must be awarded, I am clear that their amount ought not to exceed £20, and that we ought not to give any expenses.

Lord Gillies.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, and on similar grounds. I cannot refuse credit to the two witnesses who deponed that Lovie said there was no regular lease, and therefore, I think that some damages must be awarded. But then the sub-lease is in this curious situation. Mr Brebner, the factor, depones that Lovie had no power to sublet without the landlord's consent. The landlord, therefore, can put an end to Rainnie's possession at once, and the sub-lease would go for nothing. What Lovie said was thus true in law, but not true morally. There was, strictly speaking, no sub-lease; and Mr Brebner says he is confident, if leave to grant a sub-lease had been asked, it would not have been given. It may therefore be said, that as Duncan, by applying to the landlord, might in all probability get Rainnie removed, he has not sustained any injury. Still, however, there was a misrepresentation; for it is sworn that Lovie said there was no written lease. On the other hand, the conduct of Duncan, in endeavouring to enhance the amount of his loss by urging Rainnie to ask a larger sum for it than Rainnie thought it worth, is most reprehensible. I am satisfied, therefore, that we must alter the interlocutor, and find some damages due; but we ought to restrict them to the smallest possible amount. They ought not to exceed £20. Witnesses have been brought to put a much higher value on the damage; but it is ridiculous to value such land as Rainnie's, consisting chiefly of Aberdeenshire moss, at 20s. per acre.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. I do not see how we can disregard the evidence which goes to show that Lovie made a statement not consistent with truth, viz., that Rainnie had no sub-lease, and only possessed during pleasure. The sub-lease thus said not to exist, had been written for a considerable time before. But unless we disbelieve that the false statement was made, we must award some amount of damages. I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in presuming that the falsehood, if made, had been confessed and retracted before the minute of sale was concluded. This is not proved, and cannot, in the absence of proof, be presumed. That being the case, a wrong has been committed, and there must, to the extent of the injury sustained by it, be a good claim of damages. It is objected to the action, that it amounts to the plea quantum minoris. I don't see this. For the action evidently proceeds on the warrantice in the sale, and the seller under it is bound to deliver the subject unencumbered, in the same way as a borrower is bound to purge an encumbrance in the case of granting an heritable bond. I am clear there is no incompetency in the action as a claim of damages founded on the warrantice. But there are other points to be considered. The first is, whether any damage has been sustained at all; and the second, whether, if damage has been sustained, there is not a good defence on the ground of personal exception. The odd manner in which Duncan has proceeded almost amounts to this. The sub-tenant does not put any high value on his possession. He says the rent is a fair rent. He is not very reluctant to quit; but Duncan goes to him and asks him to put a larger value on the sub-lease;—in other words, does every thing he can to induce him to stay, and so keep up the injury of which he complains. If in this way he really caused the injury, there can be no doubt that he lies open to a personal exception. I don't see, however, this is the case; for though the tenant puts little value on his croft, it is pretty obvious that he will not be disposed to quit it for nothing. Some small sum of damages must therefore be given. Twenty pounds are certainly the outside of it. I would rather say less. It is plain that the sub-lease is bad, and it is said that there is no damage sustained in consequence of it, as the landlord may put an end to it at pleasure. No doubt he may; but he is not bound to put an end to it; and we don't know that he will, as he has not done it. Mr Duncan is not able to do it of himself, and therefore something must be given to him in name of damages; but the amount ought to be a minimum.

Lord Fullerton.—I am very much of the same opinion. It seems impossible to get over the evidence which goes to prove that Lovie asserted there was no sub-lease; and I see no ground for the presumption adverted to by the Lord Ordinary. The only question then is, the amount of the damages. On this head there is a good deal of contradictory evidence,—some of the witnesses saying that the rent paid is far below the true value, and others, that it is quite enough. The most decisive evidence is that of the tenant himself, who is willing to take £20. The probability is that the value is less, but it certainly cannot exceed it.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Alter the interlocutors complained of: Find the said George Duncan entitled to the sum of £20 Sterling of damages, in respect of the sub-lease of Rainnie's croft; and decern against the said George Duncan, in terms of the conclusions of the libel against him at the instance of the trustees and executors of James Lovie, under deduction of the said sum of £20: Find no expenses due to either party, and decern.”

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 22.—JAMES HENRY HOUSTON'S EXECUTORS, Pursuers, v. JAMES DUNCAN (Scougall and Company's Trustee), Defender.

Bankrupt—Dividend—Trustee, Liability of.—Held that no part of the expenses incurred by the trustee and the general body of creditors in unsuccessfully litigating a claim, can be charged or allocated so as to affect that claim; and that the trustee, having once had sufficient funds to answer the claim, is liable, first as trustee, and then if necessary personally, for its amount.

The estates of Richard Scougall and Company were sequestrated on 17th November 1814, and Boyd Dunlop, merchant in Glasgow, was appointed trustee. The bankrupts had had large dealings with the house of Fraser, Houston and Company; and in August 1815, the executors of James Henry Houston, who at the time of his death was sole partner of that house, intimated to the trustee that their claim against the bankrupt estate amounted to £23,497. 14. 2., independently of some claims of relief. The intimation was entered in the sederunt-book, but the trustee refused to admit the claim, because it was believed that certain assignments of cargoes which the claimants had received from Scougall and Company, shortly before the bankruptcy, were reducible under the Act 1696, and if reduced, would throw the balance the other way. In November 1816, the claimants presented a petition to the Court, praying that the trustee should be ordained to rank their claim. On the other hand, the trustee, under the authority of the creditors, commenced proceedings for the reduction of the assignments. Accordingly, a protracted litigation took place, both in the Court of Session, where the question of undue preference required to be tried, and also in the Court of Chancery in England, where the proceeds of the cargoes assigned were payable. In the latter Court a remit was made, with consent of parties, to one of the Masters of Chancery, who reported, that the amount appearing due to Houston's executors amounted to £21,940. 14. 1. In the Court of Session, judgment was given against the trustee, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal. In November 1815, and in September 1816, two dividends, each of 8d. per pound, was paid from the sequestrated estate. Neither of them was paid to Houston's executors, but the amount which the dividends would have produced on their claim, was entered in the sederunt-book on the footing of its being a disputed claim.

Boyd Dunlop, the trustee, having died, was succeeded in his office, in April 1823, by James Duncan. Dunlop was greatly indebted to the estate at the time of his death; but as he had previously become bankrupt, the amount could not be recovered. Action was afterwards raised against his cautioners (Houston's executors sisting themselves as parties), but the cautioners were assoilzied, on the ground that the loss sustained was to be ascribed to the negligence of the creditors, who had failed duly to superintend the trustee's conduct. Subsequent to the appointment of James Duncan as trustee, funds had been recovered to the estate to the amount of above £4300; but, after paying £2300 of dividends on admitted claims, and expenses consisting chiefly of those which had been incurred in the unsuccessful litigations with Houston's executors, the sum recovered was so much reduced as to leave in the trustee's hands a balance of only £200.

In these circumstances Houston's executors brought the present action against James Duncan, the trustee, concluding that he should be decreed to make payment to them of the two dividends of 8d. per pound effeering to their claim of £20,337. 10. 10., with legal interest from the terms at which the same were declared payable, or at least that he should be decreed to pay to account of their claim,

"such sum as, upon a just and fair accounting, shall appear to be the amount of the funds of the said sequestrated estate realised by the said defender, but without deduction therefrom of the expenses disbursed or incurred in the litigations and other proceedings aforesaid, taking place between the pursuers and the said sequestrated estate and the trustee thereon, or of any other charges or expenses not properly falling on the pursuers; or otherwise, to set apart, consign, and deposit in bank, the said sums on account, and for behoof of the pursuers, as executors foresaid, that the same may be drawn by them in payment of their just and true claim as creditors on the said sequestrated estate."

In support of the action the pursuers pleaded—1. The defender having personally realised funds of the sequestrated estate sufficient to pay the dividends due on the claim of the pursuers, then under discussion, was bound to perform the statutory duty of depositing in bank a sum equal to the amount of these dividends, in order to meet the claim if sustained; and having failed to perform this statutory duty, the defender is liable to make good the amount of the dividends to the pursuers. 2. At all events, the defender, as trustee in the sequestration, is bound to account for, and to pay to the pursuers, the dividends in question, out of the funds of the estate actually realised by him, so far as these funds will go; and in this accounting he is not entitled to deduct, as in a question with the pursuers, the expenses of the litigations with themselves. The defender was not entitled to appropriate and divert the funds of the estate to the prejudice of the pursuers, by litigating with the pursuers for the benefit of the other creditors; and, as in a question with the pursuers, he must look for relief of those expenses to the creditors under whose instructions he acted. 3. In either view, the pursuers are entitled to make good the dividends pursued for, by effect being given to the conclusions of the present action, or one or other of them. 4. The defender, by his own previous proceedings and admissions, has excluded himself from objecting to the amount of the debt due to the pursuers. At any rate, the pursuers are entitled to have this ascertained; and in the meantime, to have an order on the defender to deposit in bank the amount of the dividends appertaining to the claim. 5. The pursuers are entitled to interest on the dividends sued for, not less than to the principal thereof; and are, at all events, entitled to bank interest, such as would have accrued had the dividends been duly deposited in bank, until the time when they fell to be paid, and to legal interest thereafter.

The defender pleaded—1. The proceedings referred to having been carried on by the defender under the instructions of the creditors, they ought to have been called as parties to this action. 2. In the special circumstances of this case, the pursuers are barred from making any such claims against the defender as those now advanced by them. 3. The defender being bound to obey the instructions given by the creditors at their general meetings, duly called in terms of the Statute, and the resolutions of which were not complained of, but allowed to become final, is entitled to be indemnified, out of the funds of the sequestrated estate, of all expenses incurred, or other consequences resulting from such resolutions. 4. The dividends referred to by the pursuers ought to have been lodged in the bank by Mr Dunlop, and allowed to remain there till their claims were finally disposed of, and the pursuers ought to have seen that this was done; and having, in consequence of their own negligence in this respect, failed in their claim against Mr Dunlop's cautioners for these dividends, their claim for the same now lies exclusively against Mr Dunlop's estate. 5. The claim of the pursuers has not yet been satisfactorily adjusted or liquidated, and till this shall be done, no claim for interest can lie at their instance.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"24th June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, repels the defences: Finds that the two dividends effeering to the claim of the pursuers, amount to £1355. 16. 8: Finds that, in reference to this sum due to the pursuers, no part of the funds expended in the litigation with them can be charged, or allocated so as to affect their claim: Finds that, if this principle be acted upon, the defender, as trustee, has, or ought to have, and quoad the pursuers must be dealt with as still having, a sufficiency of funds to answer the above claim; and that, if he has not, he is liable personally to make it up: Therefore, finds the defender liable, first as trustee, and then, if necessary, personally, for the foresaid sum, for which decerns; reserving to the parties to be hereafter heard as to interest, on which point they have not yet spoken, and reserving to the defender any recourse which he may have against all or any of the creditors: Finds the defender liable in expenses: Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—It is unnecessary to decide as to the conclusion for setting aside a sum to meet the pursuers' claim; because, if the pursuers be right in their demand to have the expenses of the litigation with them struck, in so far as they are concerned, out of the accounts, enough will be still in the trustee's hands, or must be in law held to be so, to satisfy their debt.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, in dealing with the pursuers, no part of the £2000, or whatever the sum may be that was spent in litigating unsuccessfully with them, can be charged or allocated, so as to diminish the sum otherwise due to them. It is as firmly fixed as any point can be, by positive and repeated decisions, that a creditor who has been successful in a law-suit with other creditors, is not to have any of the costs laid on his dividend, or on the fund out of which this dividend is to be paid. If such costs have been charged against the general fund, then, quoad him, this charge must be corrected, and he must be dealt with as if the money was still in hand.

"The defender's plea, that he spent that money under the directions of the creditors, whose resolutions were not complained of, will not do. For, 1st, The creditors did not, in point of fact, give any direction which the trustee ought to have held as ordaining him to infringe the legal right of the opposing creditor. They merely told him to proceed with the litigation. But this could only have reference to the funds liable to defray the cost of that litigation; i. e. such funds as remained after satisfying the pursuers' claim. Their order to go on did not surely imply that the trustee was to go on at another man's expense. 2d, The creditors could not lawfully give any such order. No creditors can lawfully direct a trustee to violate one of the clear and positive directions of the Statute; the 30th section expressly ordains the trustees to leave in the bank money sufficient to answer unsettled claims. The defender had a sum here which had been left by his predecessor, and he had the unsettled claim of the pursuers; yet, instead of leaving enough of this sum for their debt, he spent it; and is it any defence to the injured creditor to say that his opposing brethren bade this be done? 3d, It is true that the pursuers did not complain of the creditors' resolution. How could they? Could they petition the Court against a resolution by their opponents in a law-suit to appeal to the House of Lords? Could they hinder their adversaries from going on with their own cause? If the trustee saw that there were no free funds out of which the costs could be paid, he ought to have declined to proceed, unless they had agreed to furnish him with the means of going on.

"The defender pleads, that it is not against him, but against the creditors, that the pursuers should have recourse. The Lord Ordinary does not think so. In the eye of the law the trustee still has money enough in his hands to pay their dividend; for, quoad them, his books must be cleared of all the expenses by which the disappearance of the fund is accounted for. It may be true that, after this is done, the trustee may, de facto, not have the money; but, in dealing with the pursuers, he must be held to have it. And if it is in consequence of obeying directions of the creditors that he has it not, it is he, and not the injured creditor, who must have recourse against these creditors.

"The defender says that in no case has any trustee been found personally liable for such loss. This is probably true, because in no case has their personal liability been necessary. Can any case be produced where a trustee, who has spent a creditor's share of the funds in unsuccessful litigation with that very creditor, was not bound to replace the money, though out of his own pocket in the first instance, where this was necessary, for the creditor's redress?"

Duncan reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Gillies.—I have come to be of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded. It is admitted that the creditors themselves would have been liable for the dividend, without deduction of the expenses, and that they are not entitled to carry on a litigation, especially an unsuccessful one, with the money of their antagonist. It does not necessarily follow that the trustee is personally liable. That is the sole question before us. To make him personally liable, he must have been guilty of misconduct or gross negligence,—as for example, any departure from his duty under the Statute. I do not think mala fides necessary, and it is not alleged. The only question is, whether he was guilty of such negligence as to subject him in personal liability? As to this I can have no doubt. The clear duty of the trustee is, to set apart a sum sufficient to pay the dividends on a disputed claim. It is said the former trustee uplifted the sum in bank. Then the duty of the present trustee was clearly to replace it. The terms of the Act are imperative: "In case any of the debts claimed upon shall be objected to in whole or in part, a share of the fund corresponding to the utmost amount of the sums or dividends to which the disputed articles may be entitled, shall be left in the bank till all such questions are determined." This provision bears reference to no particular time. During the whole of his management, it is his duty to see that the money is lodged as soon as recovered. Having failed to do so, I think he must be held to be personally liable.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. There are here two points. One of these has been given up, namely, that the claim of this creditor has been lost altogether by his own neglect, which, it is said, relieved the cautioners of Dunlop, the former trustee, of all liability for the sums which had been deposited, but afterwards uplifted by him. This point does not now seem to be seriously insisted in. The funds were lost more by the negligence of the other creditors than of this party; and therefore, I have no difficulty on that point. I agree with Lord Gillies, that when the trustee made recoveries, it was his duty again to set aside a sufficient sum to meet the dividends on this creditor's claim. His not having done so cannot make his situation better. While matters so stood, a majority of the creditors directed the trustee to carry on a law-suit against this creditor. The result of the action having proved that they were in the wrong in that, the question is, whether the trustee was warranted in paying the expenses of the litigation out of the fund applicable to the payment of this person's dividends? I think he was not. It is said that he was bound to obey the orders of the creditors. Perhaps so. But did that imply a power to take the trust-funds applicable to other purposes, and expend them in the litigation? Certainly not. The creditors gave him no direction to do so. If there had been an express minute ordering him to apply the trust-funds in the litigation, and this creditor had due intimation of this intention, and had not complained, there would have been some pretence for this plea. But there was no such minute; there was no warrant for this use of the funds, which I consider illegal. The sum must be held as still in his hands. It is said that the conclusion of this action is to make the trustee personally liable. But the same might be said of every accountant who discharges himself by a wrong item; and here the trustee attempts to discharge himself by entering these expenses in this account, which I do not think he is entitled to do.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. The case lies within a narrow compass. It is admitted, that if there be a litigation between an individual creditor and the body of creditors, in which the former is successful, his dividend of the estate cannot be burdened or diminished by the expenses of that litigation. It follows, that if the dividends have been lying in bank, and if the trustee uplift them and apply them in defraying the expenses of the litigation, he will be liable to the creditor in repetition. And even although he may have been ordered by the majority of the creditors so to apply the money, he cannot plead that order with effect in a question with this individual creditor. Indeed, it seems to be admitted, that if the present trustee had found in bank a sum of money deposited by the former trustee to meet this creditor's dividends, he would have been liable to make repetition if he had paid the expenses with it; and the defence is put entirely upon an alleged distinction between that state of matters and the present. Take the case that no money was left by the former trustee,—the defender admits that he recovered more than sufficient to meet the pursuers' dividends; but his argument is, that though he would not have been entitled to take the money out of bank, he was not bound to put it in. I think this a narrow ground. And even though the Statute were worded as it is said to be, I should entertain doubts as to the distinction. It would be a very strained interpretation of the Act to give effect to it. But the words of the Statute themselves remove all doubt. It contains no provision for setting apart. All that is enacted is, that there shall be a permanent keeping for the creditors' security. If a particular sum had been set aside, and expressly appropriated to the creditors' dividend, the trustee could not have drawn it from the bank. But this is not what is provided. The Statute merely enacts, that when a creditor's claim is disputed, the funds in bank shall not be reduced below such a sum as is necessary to meet his dividends. Now, the defender here recovered money enough to pay these dividends; and there is no question as to his liability to place it in bank. Under the Statute, the trustee was bound to place all that he recovered in bank. He could only have £50 in his hands at a time. Is it then possible to contend, that the obligation to keep a sum to meet this creditor's dividends did not apply as much to the defender as to the original trustee? And because he violated this duty, is he therefore to be free from his obligation to account to the creditor? He ought to have always had enough to satisfy the dividends; and he either has these dividends now, or must in law be held to have them. Unless the proposition could be made out, that by Dunlop's mismanagement this creditor's claim was lost to him altogether, the defender has no case. But such a proposition cannot be supported. The obligation to keep funds is as strong on Duncan as it was on Dunlop. I presume it is unnecessary to notice the defence founded on the proceedings in the action against Dunlop's executors.

Lord President.—Upon very full consideration of the whole circumstances of this case, I am of the same opinion as the rest of the Court. I can see no grounds for altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The first litigation against Dunlop's cautioners cannot affect the question. That was not an action for behoof of Houston. The litigation was for some time in dependence before any appearance was made for Houston, and even then, it was made merely because it was thought that he was in a more favourable situation than the other creditors to try the question with the cautioners. Now, if the sum had been recovered in that action, it must have been deposited in bank, and kept free from the expenses of the litigation. But the new trustee made additional recoveries, and before the payment of the second dividend a claim was given in for Houston; and by the Statute, a fund is directed to be set aside to await the discussion of such a claim. Was that not sufficient certification to the trustee? Here was a large claim, which the creditor said he would make good in due course, and for which he called upon the trustee to rank him. There was no misleading here; the matter was just in the ordinary situation,—the claim having been made in a formal manner, and the trustee having thus been warned of his duty to lay aside the dividends, I do not enter into the question, whether this trustee received any funds from his predecessor. It is admitted that, posterior to his own appointment, he recovered more than £2000, which was more than sufficient to meet this creditor's dividends. Now, keeping in view that he was duly certified of the claim, and that he was directed by the Statute to lay aside funds to meet it,—was he entitled, even if he had received the most direct instructions from the creditors, to take the funds so recovered and spend them in litigation? I apprehend not. No trustee, whether on his own responsibility, or by the directions of the creditors, is entitled to go on spending in litigation the whole funds which should have been kept for this creditor's dividends. But there were no special directions of the creditors to use the dividends in conducting the litigation. And is it enough to free the trustee from responsibility for those dividends, to say that he so spent them? Although, therefore, I admit that this is a direct action of personal responsibility against the defender, I cannot find any legal grounds for relieving him from it. He was bound to square his conduct by the Statute under which he acted. It was his duty to have called the attention of the creditors to the fact, that there were no funds to meet the expenses of the litigation, except those provided to meet the dividends. He should have said that he could not go on without encroaching on those funds; and he should have asked the creditors if they were ready to provide him with the means of conducting the litigation. I think it impossible not to adhere to the interlocutor.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Maitland, Penney; John Court, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Rutherford, More; Andrew Howden, W.S., Agent.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

25th November 1841.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 23.—DAVID PRENTICE and COMPANY, Pursuers and Respondents, v. JAMES COCHRAN, Defender and Advocate.

Process—Statute 1579, c. 83—Prescription, Triennial—A party raised an action on an open account within three years from the date of its last item: the action was dismissed by the Sheriff, and in consequence a second action was brought, but not until after the lapse of the three years—Held incompetent to sustain the conclusions of the action, except by the writ or oath of the defender.

On the 24th July 1839, the pursuers raised an action against the defender in the Sheriff-court of Glasgow for the sum of £23. 11. 6., being an account for newspapers terminating 26th September 1836. The Sheriff dismissed the action, on the ground of its being brought in the name of David Prentice and Company, the company firm, without having conjoined with it the names of any of the individual partners. In consequence, the present action was brought; but the summons is dated the 16th of December 1839, more than three years from the date of the last item in the account. The defender pleaded prescription; and a record having been made up, the Sheriff decerned in terms of the libel.

The defender advocated, and pleaded—That the plea of prescription was not obviated or elided by the former action or judicial demand which the respondents allege had been made against the advocator,—in respect, (1.) That the said former action was utterly incompetent, and had accordingly been dismissed as such by a final and unchallenged judgment of the Court in which it was brought. There had truly, therefore, been no former action or judicial demand at all: And, (2.) That as the present action,—being the one in which the alleged claim is attempted to be made effectual,—had not been brought within the prescriptive period, it was irrelevant and incompetent to found on any other or former action which had proved abortive: Vide McLaren v. Buick, 27th February 1829; Shaw, Vol. VII. p. 483.

On the other hand, it was maintained by the respondent—That there is no good defence against the claim at the instance of the respondents, on the ground of prescription,—inasmuch as (1.) the prescription pleaded was, in the circumstances of the case, inapplicable; (2.) It was, at any rate, interrupted by the summons raised against the advocator on 24th July 1839, the execution of that summons on the same day, and the judicial proceedings which followed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with note annexed:

"6th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause: Repels the plea of prescription; and before farther answer, appoints the respondents, within eight days, to produce excerpts taken from their books, at the sight of the Sheriff, of all entries relative to the matter in dispute, and all discharges relative thereto; and appoints the party in possession of the letter referred to in the note by the Sheriff-depute, of 3d March 1841, and there described as No. 23, to produce that letter also within eight days; and directs these writings to be added to, and to form part of the proof; and reserves all questions of expenses.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that the shorter prescriptions cannot be interrupted; and though certain dicta seem to have been thrown out obiter on the point in the case of McLaren, 27th February 1829, what the Court did in that very case was inconsistent with this plea; because, instead of deciding at once, that interruption did not apply to the triennial prescription, they went into a discussion as to the validity of the action said to have been interrupted, and decided on the ground that the interruption did not take place because that action had been incompetent.

"If the action on which interruption is pleaded here had been raised at the instance of an incompetent party, or of a party incompetent as set forth in the summons, the Lord Ordinary would have been inclined to the opinion, that such an action could not interrupt. He would have been so inclined, on the principle on which it has been settled, that interruption is not affected by an action before an incompetent Court. The objection of incompetency in the party, as set forth, seems to him to be about as strong as that of incompetency in the Court.

"But the action here was at the instance of a competent party properly set forth. To be sure the Sheriff erroneously decided the opposite way, and dismissed the action; and instead of advocating his judgment, a new action (the present one) was instituted. But although the Sheriff's erroneous judgment be final and conclusive, quoad dismissing that action, the Lord Ordinary does not think that it must necessarily receive effect when the correctness of that action is maintained, to a different effect, in a different process, before a different Court. If that action was properly brought, he does not think that effect can be withheld from it, as an interruption of the prescription, because the Sheriff took a different view of it in another process.

"The Lord Ordinary orders the additional writings to be produced ex proprio motu. The books are referred to in the proof, and their contents are referred to by the witnesses, and, therefore, as the best evidence, they ought clearly to have been exhibited. The letter, No. 23, was perhaps properly rejected by the Sheriff, when it was only sought to be added to the proof as res noviter, though, considering the fire, this is not without doubt. But it is not properly new matter recently discovered: It is a piece of new evidence, the production of which is required by the justice of the case. The right of the one party to have it disclosed, or of the other to keep it concealed, may be questionable. But it is within the power of the Court to order it to be added to the proof."

The advocator reclaimed and argued—

That there is a manifest distinction between the long and the short prescriptions. The long prescription is founded on the presumption of dereliction, and is interrupted by any solmen act overcoming this presumption; whereas the triennial prescription proceeds on the presumption that the debt is paid. The abortive process could not interrupt the running of the prescription; for the Act 1579 ordains that all actions of debt for house-rents, &c., shall be pursued within three years, otherwise the creditor shall have no action, except by writ or oath of party. In M'Laren, the first action was brought before the Sheriff, and was dismissed as incompetent,—the nature of the action being maritime. A second was raised before the proper Court, but not until the years of prescription had elapsed. It was held that prescription had taken effect—the dismissing of the previous action being considered equivalent to there having been no action at all.

Answered—

That the first action was raised within three years from the closing of the account libelled. The summons was competently raised in name of the company firm, and before the competent Court. Though dismissed, and that wrongly, it was of the nature of a judicial demand, and was very different from the case of M'Laren, where the action was brought before a court having no jurisdiction. In Douglas, 26th November 1784, M. 11,127, it was found that the production of bills in a process of ranking and sale interrupted prescription, so as to allow of a separate process being instituted upon them, after more than six years had elapsed from their date: Sloane, 1st June 1827; 5 Shaw, p. 742, and National Bank, 5th December 1837, show that a judicial demand, although made in processes which may turn out ineffective, is sufficient to interrupt prescription.

Replied—

The first action raised was dismissed, and the judgment acquiesced in by the party. We cannot now inquire into the grounds of the judgment; but there is no distinction between this case and that of M'Laren, unless we go into the merits of the Sheriff's judgment, and hold that M'Laren's action was rightly dismissed, and that the present action was wrongly dismissed. If the party was dissatisfied with the Sheriff's judgment, he ought to have brought it under review by advocacy, and kept alive his right of action. The cases referred to do not apply. The production of the bills in the ranking and sale was regular and competent, although, from the failure of funds, other steps might be necessary to complete recovery. The case of Sloane was an action of count and reckoning, in which it was said one item of the accounts had prescribed; but the action was brought in time, and the Court found that the account was produced in time. The case of the National Bank was a multiplepinding, in which a claim was lodged; but an ordinary action was instituted to constitute the debt, and decree was ultimately obtained under the multiplepinding.

Lord Medwyn.—The triennial prescription proceeds upon the presumption of payment, and unless the action be pursued within three years, nothing can elide it but the writ or oath of the party. The long prescription, on the other hand, is founded upon dereliction. The present case is ruled by that of M'Laren, where the first action raised was abortive, from its being brought before an incompetent Court; but there is no difference between such a case and one in which the action, though competently raised, was dismissed. I differ, therefore, from the views of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I cannot distinguish this case from that of M'Laren, which proceeds upon the principle that the short prescription rests upon the presumption of payment, and the long prescription upon dereliction. What is to be the effect of the doctrine contended for? Is an incompetent action to keep alive the right of pursuing for other three years, or for forty years? The Sheriff dismissed M'Laren's first action on incompetency, but we cannot go into the merits of the Sheriff's judgment here; the pursuer acquiesced in it, and it has become final. He should have brought an advocacy or reduction, and so stood upon his original action. Instead of this, he acquiesced in the dismissal, and then brings another action beyond the years of prescription. I have looked into all the cases, and think none of them apply.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of the same opinion, and rest entirely upon the Statute, which explicitly declares, that "all actions," &c., be pursued within three years, otherwise the creditor shall have no action. Now, has the present action been pursued within the three years? It is brought beyond the three years. The Statute makes no mention of prescription. It is a statutory declaration, that there shall be no action unless pursued within three years. I see no prescription, and no opening for interruption. It is of no consequence whether the former action was competent or incompetent. If it was competent it ought to have been followed forth: if incompetent, it cannot preserve the right of action.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor complained of; sustain the plea in defence founded on the Act of Parliament 1579, c. 83: Find it competent to the pursuers to sustain the conclusions of the action by the writ or oath of the defender; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly; reserving all questions of expenses hinc inde."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 24.—ROBERT BEVERIDGE, Suspender, v. ROBERT HENDERSON, Charger.

Bill of Exchange—Proof—Circumstances held sufficient in themselves to prove that the acceptor of a bill, bearing to be for rent of grass-parks, was not the true debtor in the bill, but that the acceptance was for the accommodation of the drawer, deceased.—Observed, That the proof of verbal statements made by the drawer to the bank-agent and to his own trustees, acknowledging that the bill was for his accommodation, was irrelevant and inadmissible.

Vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 142, also relative case, p. 139.

In terms of an interlocutor pronounced in this case, 19th December last, a proof was taken and reported. A minute also was lodged for the charger, in which he admitted the averment contained in the ninth reason of suspension, viz., "that the entry, 'Mr Monro, £65,' contained in the 'state exhibited (in pencil) by Mr Colville at his meeting with Messrs F. and J. at signing the minutes,' referred to in that article, refers to the bill charged on;" "and also that the gentlemen alluded to in that state are Messrs Ferrie and Jamieson, W.S., Colville's trustees and agents, and the minutes referred to are those which were made out as expressive of the footing on which they had accepted the trust, and entered on the management."

The first witness for the suspender was Mr Ferrie, who deponed,

"That in consequence of repeated conversations with Mr Colville, the deponent's impression was that Mr Beveridge was not the real debtor in the bill, and this was one of his reasons for not proceeding against Mr Beveridge." Being interrogated, "What were the other reasons for not proceeding against Mr Beveridge besides the one stated? Depones, That he did not consider Mr Beveridge in such circumstances as that the debt could be recovered." "Interrogated, and requested to state particularly what the conversation was which led the deponent to the understanding above mentioned, and whether Mr Colville on that occasion stated to the deponent, that the bill in question had been granted for his (Colville's) accommodation? Depones, That he cannot condescend more particularly than he has done upon that conversation, but he could not say that Mr Colville in so many words said it was an accommodation-bill, or an acceptance not for value." The result of another conversation was, "if not to convince the deponent that it was an accommodation-bill, at least to induce him not to commence proceedings against Mr Beveridge."

Mr Thomson deponed, that at a meeting

"where at least Mr Colville and Mr Ferrie were present, the deponent remembers a good deal of conversation taking place about the above-mentioned bill in Monro's hands: That Mr Colville, on some of these occasions, told Mr Jamieson or Mr Ferrie that Mr Monro was likely to do immediate diligence on that bill, and that it must be taken up; and he told Mr Jamieson or Mr Ferrie that the bill was for his own debt, and that they must not trouble Robert Beveridge about it, nor even write a letter to him on the subject." Being examined for the charger, "depones, That he thinks that statement was made at a meeting in Ferrie and Jamieson's office, a short time before the bill was paid, and he thinks the admission was addressed to Mr Ferrie; and he is not sure if Mr Jamieson was present. Depones, That the statement was made most explicitly by Mr Colville, who requested that Mr Beveridge should not be written to, as that would just set him upon him (Colville) to annoy him; and it was no matter of inference on the deponent's part: it was an explicit statement of Colville's."

Mr Steele, agent for the Western Bank of Scotland in Kinross, during the years 1834 and 1835, being shown excerpts from the books of the bank, deponed,

"That he knows, from the remarks which he now observes in the said paper of excerpts, opposite to the entries of the bill in question, that he must have been told by Colville that he (Colville) was the true debtor in the bill." "And being desired to state the particular occasion on which Mr Colville told him that the bill in question was granted for his (Colville's) accommodation? Depones, That it is impossible for him to tell on what occasion, from the multiplicity of Mr Colville's transactions, and the number of bills that pass through the hands of a bank-agent: That, as stated before, he infers from the remarks which he sees in the excerpts, that Colville told him that he was the true debtor in this bill, and he has no precise recollection of Colville's conversation about this particular bill, although he remembers well that Colville told him that Beveridge had accepted several bills for his accommodation."

Mr Jamieson, who was examined for the charger, deponed, That he does not remember

"any specific allusion to the bill charged on, on the part of Mr Colville; but, from casual remarks, the impression upon the deponent's mind was, that the bill was a debt really due by Mr Beveridge to Mr Colville, and that it was not Colville's proper debt. Depones, That he is quite certain Mr Colville never told him that it was his (Colville's) proper debt, and nothing ever occurred to lead the deponent to infer that it was Colville's proper debt, and Colville never said any thing to Mr Ferrie, in deponent's presence, that would lead to such an inference." "Afterwards, being desired to say why no diligence was done against Beveridge upon the bill in question? Depones, That he never heard Colville give any other reason, except that he considered Beveridge worth nothing, and at the same time, he, Colville, hoped he might effect some arrangement with Mr Beveridge's brother for its payment." "Depones, That no steps were ever taken to get Mr Beveridge's brother to pay Beveridge's debt: That that was mooted between the deponent, Colville, and Ferrie, but Colville did not wish it to be done from his friendship for Beveridge, the suspender."

The proof being reported, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with the note annexed:

"20th March 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the proof adduced since the remit from the Inner-House, and on the whole cause—Makes avizandum with the same to the Lords of the Second Division; and appoints the said proof, with such relative exhibits or documents as the parties may think fit to annex, to be printed and boxed to the said Lords at the second box-day in the ensuing vacation, in order to be reported; and grants warrant for then enrolling in the Inner-House rolls.

"Note.—As the proof was allowed before answer, and only to a limited extent, by a judgment of the Inner-House, after deliberations, with the full tenor of which the Lord Ordinary cannot be acquainted, and which were differently represented by the parties, he has thought it best at once to report it for their consideration.

"The case, in his view of it, is attended with no little difficulty. On the one hand, the evidence of the bank-agent and of Ferrie is very strong in favour of the suspender's allegation, that the bill was for Colville's accommodation; and this is very powerfully corroborated by the fact, that no steps were taken against the suspender by any of the parties concerned for so very long a time. But it is remarkable that neither of these witnesses can swear positively that Colville ever made any such direct statement in their hearing, and the omission of any proceeding against the suspender is partly accounted for by the opinion which seems to have been generally entertained of his inability to meet the demand. The witness, Thomson, indeed swears positively enough to Colville's direct and repeated admissions of the bill being for his own accommodation. But his testimony (in so far as it is within the commission) is discredited, and, indeed, substantially contradicted, by that both of Ferrie and of Jamieson; even after making all due allowance for the general preponderance of positive over negative evidence. It is something, too, in favour of the suspender, that Colville, who is represented by all parties as much more ready to exaggerate his means than his liabilities, is yet proved to have been uniformly averse to any prosecution or molestation of the suspender for this bill. But the effect of this, again, is a good deal taken off by the evidence of his having been a great personal favourite.

"If this, however, had been all the evidence in the case, the Lord Ordinary (holding the question of its competency to be finally settled) would probably have thought it sufficient for the suspender's purpose. But it is most materially altered by the testimony of Jamieson—the only acting trustee of Colville, and the party, accordingly, whose motives for omitting to proceed against the suspender it was of most importance to ascertain. Now, he not only swears that he never heard any thing from Colville which led him to believe that the bill was not a proper debt of the suspender's, but he materially shakes the credit of Ferrie—especially as to what took place at the roup of the grass-parks in 1835.

"There is a fact, however, connected with that last transaction, which, when taken along with the express and peculiar tenor of the bill in question, weighs more with the Lord Ordinary against the suspender than any thing else in the case. In all questions of this kind, the written acknowledgment of the party in the document under suspension, even where it is allowed to be impeached by opposite testimony, is yet always to be regarded as very strong evidence against him;—and not to be got the better of, except by very conclusive and satisfactory proof. Now, in this case, the bill bears to have been granted not only for value, but for value in rent of grass-parks; and it seems clearly established, 1st, That at the time of granting it, the suspender was really a tenant of grass-parks belonging to the drawer, the rent of which must have been nearly of the amount of the sum in the bill; and, 2d, That he has not attempted to prove, or indeed specifically to aver or explain, how this rent was ever paid or settled, otherwise than by granting this bill. It is possible that the importance of these facts might not have been seen when the record was prepared, or the proof allowed; and that the Lord Ordinary now presses them too hardly against the suspender. But if they are as he takes them to be, he inclines to think that they add so much to the evidence afforded by the tenor of the bill itself, as to make it outweigh both the circumstantial proof, and the indirect and somewhat conflicting testimony which is set up against it."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—The proof in this case was allowed on account of the distinct averment, that Colville had acknowledged to his own trustees that the bill in question was for his accommodation, and the Court thought it right to see the evidence of this before answer; but it never was intended to relax the ordinary rule of law, that the acceptor of a bill must prove that it was accepted for accommodation by the writ or oath of the drawer. The soundness of this principle, if ever there was raised a doubt of it, receives ample confirmation from the present case. The acknowledgments were alleged to have been made to persons naturally interested, and who might be supposed to recollect them: yet the proof is most unsatisfactory. The bill falls due on the 21st January 1834, and was retired by Monro in February. Colville subsequently puts his affairs under trust, and among his liabilities, includes this bill in the hands of Monro. Monro applies for payment, and receives a letter of authority to draw payment from Ferrie and Jamieson, the trustees. Colville lives two years thereafter, and makes no demand. I do not think the case mended by the proof; and I was just as much inclined to draw the inference before as after the proof, that it was Colville's debt. No bank-agent would have given up the bill as Colville's debt, except upon Colville's own authority. I leave the proof out of view; but looking to the fact that the bank-agent gives up the bill as Colville's debt,—that he himself includes it in his list of debts, and orders payment,—that neither he nor his trustees ever attempt to recover—I am led to the conclusion that he was the true debtor. If he had made a claim in his own lifetime, Beveridge could have proved by his oath that the bill was for his accommodation.

Lord Meadowbank concurred.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. Colville is now dead, but he survived two years after the bill fell due, and made no claim against Beveridge. It is all the more improbable that he should let it lie over, when he was cautioner to the bank for Thomson, their agent, to the extent of £5000, and some time after accepted another bill to Beveridge, which he paid. The executors take the bill out of his repositories, after neither he nor his trustees had made any claim. The proof is most unsatisfactory; and I do not think we should go into it, because the other circumstances lead to the presumption of unfair dealing with this bill, and that Colville was the true debtor.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The proof here is taken before answer, and the Court had great difficulty in allowing it. Now, what is proposed to be proved? The verbal statements of the drawer, that the acceptor was not the true debtor. In my humble opinion, this is altogether irrelevant and inadmissible. Nor can I draw any distinction between such statements being made to the bank-agent or the trustees, and any other person. A written statement cannot be so cut down. I don't touch the case of Macdonald, 23d December 1836, where fraud was alleged. Laying aside the proof, is there enough in the circumstances of this case to stay diligence? The document of debt is a bill on which diligence might be used. Delay in such a case is material. At maturity, the last indorser pays and retires the bill; he takes no assignation, and makes no demand on the acceptor. Before this the drawer had fallen into difficulties and executed a trust. His trustees pay on his order, and take no assignation, or make any demand on the acceptor. They act as if it were Colville's debt. They continue in the management of the trust for two years thereafter, and the present demand is made by another man of business. Would not the circumstances have protected the trustees from liability in not demanding payment? much more must they protect the acceptor. Such conduct and circumstances show that it was Colville's debt. I am therefore for suspending the charge.

The Court suspended the letters simpliciter, with expenses, under deduction of those incurred in taking the proof.

No. 25.—JOHN HARVEY, Suspender, v. ADAM FORREST, Respondent.

Process.—Jurisdiction.—Burgh.—Small-Debt Act.—Public Officer.—Found that the proceedings in the Small-Debt Court, held by the magistrates of a burgh as justices of the peace, must be regulated by, and in conformity to, the provisions of the Statute 6 George IV. cap. 48: 2. That the warrant and decree in an action before the said Court being signed by the depute town-clerk instead of by the clerk of the peace or his depute, the proceedings were incompetent and invalid.

On the 18th September 1838, Adam Forrest, tailor, Leith, presented a complaint "unto the Honourable the Magistrates of Leith, Justices of Peace for the town of Leith and liberties thereof," against John Harvey, concluding for payment of the sum of £1. 4s., being the amount of an account for attending in Court four days to be examined as a witness and party relative to objections lodged by Harvey to his right to continue on the roll as a voter for a member of Parliament. The claim and warrant of citation was signed by Alexander Hay, who was the depute of the town-clerk, Mr Anderson. The citation and service of the complaint was made by John Mackay, officer; and the judgment decerning for the modified sum of 16s., with 2s. 5d. of expenses, was signed by Mr Hay.

During these proceedings a minute was lodged by Mr Harvey, declining the jurisdiction of the Court; and, besides presenting the present suspension, he raised also an action of reduction of the decree.

In the suspension it was pleaded—That the Magistrates were not entitled to hold courts in the capacity of Justices of the Peace, under the 6th Geo. IV. c. 48, which was passed in regard to counties and stewartries: Farther, supposing them entitled to hold courts as Justices of the Peace under the Statute, they did not conform themselves to the requirements therein enacted, in respect, 1st, That the complaint was not addressed to the Bailies as Justices of the Peace of any county or shire, as required by section 3 and schedule A of the Act: 2d, That the complainer was cited to appear before the Magistrates of Leith, and not before the Justices of any county or shire, as is required by the said section and schedule: 3d, That the person who signs the warrant of citation was not the clerk of the peace of the county of Edinburgh, or a deputy by him appointed, as is required by the said section, or a clerk appointed by section 22: 4th, That the copy citation did not bear that the complaint and warrant had been served upon the complainer; and lastly, That the judgment pronounced does not bear to be by one of the Justices of the Peace of any shire or county, as is required by the said section 3 and schedule.

On the other hand, it was pleaded by the respondent—That the Magistrates of Leith had been in the actual and uninterrupted exercise of the powers and jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace under the Small-Debt Acts for a long period of years. By the charter granted to the city of Edinburgh by Charles I., dated 23d October 1636, the Provost and Bailies of the city of Edinburgh, and their successors, are made and constituted “Justices and Commissioners of our Peace within our said city of Edinburgh, ports of Leith and Newhaven,” &c. By the Dock Act, 39 Geo. III. c. 44, § 16, it is enacted, that the Magistrates of Leith for the time being, “shall have and enjoy the same powers and jurisdictions in and over the town of South Leith and harbour thereof, and the aforesaid dock or docks, and other works and houses contiguous thereto, in all actions and causes that may come before them, as are competent to the Lord Provost and Magistrates within the royalty of Edinburgh.” By the Parliamentary Burgh Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 77, § 30, it is enacted, “that the Magistrates and Town-council to be elected for the said burghs or towns (comprehending Leith) under the authority of this Act, shall have such and the like rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdictions as is or are possessed by the Magistrates and Council of any royal burgh in Scotland.” And by the Commission of the Peace, dated 23d February 1838, the Provost and Magistrates of Leith for the time being are nominated and appointed special justices “to keep our peace in the city of Edinburgh, and the liberties thereof.” It was further pleaded, that any alleged irregularity in the appointment of the clerk to the Magistrates qua Justices, or any irregularities in the form of procedure, would not void the procedure, or render the present suspension competent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“8th July 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process—Sustains the respondent's plea, that the suspension is incompetent: Dismisses it, and decerns: Finds the suspender liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in; and, when lodged, remits it to the auditor to tax and to report.

“Note.—The suspender insists that the Justices' Small-debt Statute, and even the schedules, though these last be given as mere examples of forms, shall receive the most literal and judicial construction—a construction so rigid as to render the Act worse than useless. For example, the Statute directs the citation and the service of the complaint to be by a ‘constable or peace officer.’ It was done in the present instance by an officer; but because the schedule happens to say ‘A B constable,’ and the officer here was not a constable, it is maintained that this vitiates the whole proceedings. Some encouragement has perhaps been given to this hypercriticism by one or two judgments; but though the Statute no doubt must be interpreted fairly and legally, quibbles which destroy its practical usefulness are entitled to no favour.

“The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the Magistrates had jurisdiction to decide the cause as Justices; that the objections, taken to the regularity of the proceedings are all groundless; and that, with one exception, they are all frivolous.

“This exception, which forms the only difficulty in the case, relates to the clerk.

“The Statute provides that the warrant to cite, and the judgment, shall be signed by ‘the clerk of the peace, or any depute by him appointed.’ Considering that the object of the Act is to give cheap and speedy justice to poor people, in poor causes, it would not have been unreasonable to hold that these suitors were entitled to rely that the clerk de facto was the clerk de jure; and that if they found a person in the office, and recognised by the public and the Justices as entitled to be so, they were safe in dealing with him, especially when there was nobody else to whom they could resort as more truly the clerk. But in the case of Cumming, 19th November 1833, the Court found that a secret flaw in the appointment of the acting clerk nullified the whole proceedings. This decision seems to have made the history of the clerk's appointment, with the view to discover a blot in it, a subject of inquiry with all parties seeking for grounds for suspending small-debt decrees. There is another case of the kind before the Lord Ordinary.

“The objection taken here is, that those who appointed the clerk had no authority to do so; and the facts are, that the Magistrates, as Justices, had appointed Mr Anderson, and that Anderson had given a deputation to Mr Hay, by whom the papers in this case were signed. Now, it is said that the ‘clerk of the peace’ means the ordinary Justice of Peace clerk for the county, or at least a clerk who can only be named by the Crown.

“If this be correct—and if it be true that the Magistrates, acting as Justices, cannot appoint their own clerk to officiate within their own town—then the Lord Ordinary does not see how his judgment on this point can be maintained. But it appears to him that the Magistrates can make such nominations, and he believes that they have been in the general and inveterate practice of doing so. The case of Edinburgh is disputed by the parties, but it does not seem to be disputed that this has been the practice at Leith since ever the Magistrates there acted as Justices.

“All that the suspender says about the case of Mabon, 15th November 1836, and about the constitution of the burgh court at Leith, is inapplicable to any thing that occurs here. The Magistrates of Leith are in the commission of the peace, and they have not decided beyond £5, and therefore we have nothing to do with their magisterial history or constitution, or any alleged extension of jurisdiction.”

The suspender reclaimed. At the advising of the cause on 5th March 1841, the Court were unanimously of opinion that the Magistrates of Leith had jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment complained of as Justices of the Peace, and that the proceedings before them, in that capacity, were sufficiently formal and regular, provided the objection stated to the appointment of the clerk of court should not be held to be a fatal objection; upon which last point minutes of debate were ordered.

From the minute of the suspender it appeared, that in the year 1821 the Magistrates of Leith first resolved to hold their Small-Debt Court agreeably to the then subsisting Small-Debt Act, and on the 5th of July following they expressly, qua Justices of the Peace, appointed Hugh Veitch, town-clerk of Leith, to be justice of peace clerk of Leith, with the usual powers attached to the office. In consequence of the death of Mr Veitch, a meeting of the Town-council was held on the 21st January 1837, at which the Provost, Magistrates and Council, appointed Mr Anderson town-clerk of Leith, “with the usual rights, powers and principles of the office.” In virtue of the power to appoint deputies, Mr Anderson, on the 22d of April 1838, nominated Mr Alexander Hay to be his deputy in the said office of town-clerk of Leith. By the Act 1685, c. 17, Justices of the Peace were authorised to nominate their own clerks at their first meeting; but this Act was repealed in the following session, and the nomination of the clerk to the Justices of the Peace was declared to be a right and privilege belonging to the Secretaries of State. It was contended—

That the provisions of the Small-Debt Act demonstrates, that the clerk of the peace so appointed, or his deputy, is the officer to officiate under that Act. Section 3 provides, "that all such causes shall proceed upon complaint agreeable to the form, in schedule (A), subjoined to the present Act, stating shortly the origin of debt or ground of action, and concluding against the defender; and the clerk of the peace, or any deputy by him appointed, or in case he shall fail to appoint one, the clerk to be appointed within the district as hereinafter provided, shall adject to the said complaint, and on the same paper, a warrant signed by him agreeable to the form, in schedule (A), subjoined to the present Act. The provision for the appointment of an interim clerk is contained in the 22d section,—“In case the clerk of the peace shall fail to attend, either personally or by a sufficient deputy, in any of the said districts, at the meetings appointed by the said Justices, of which the said clerk of the peace has had due notice, the Justices who shall attend at such district meeting or meetings, shall, and they are hereby empowered to name an interim clerk for that district, who shall be removable by any subsequent Quarter-sessions, and another clerk may then be appointed by the said Quarter-sessions from time to time as they shall see cause.” The clerk of the peace for the city and liberties of Edinburgh is Mr Callander, who holds his commission, dated 12th April 1837, from the Secretary of State, and in these terms,—“by himself or his deputies to sit and officiate as clerk in all meetings of the Justices of the Peace, or courts holden by them within the said city and liberties.” The case of Cumming v. Monro, 19th November 1833, is perfectly decisive, that a summons subscribed by a person not duly authorised to exercise the office of clerk, is an absolute nullity. And it is moreover conclusive, that such nullity may be challenged in the form of a suspension.

It was argued by the respondent—

That the clerk of the Magistrates was truly the clerk of the peace, quoad hoc. There is a distinction between what may be called “Charter Justices,” and Justices nominatim appointed in the usual commissions of the peace. The appointment in burghs must be regulated by the terms of the charters, and by the usage following thereon. By the charter of the city of Edinburgh, the Magistrates are appointed Justices of the Peace; and up to the year 1827, when a commission from the Secretary of State was for the first time granted in favour of Mr Callander, as clerk of the peace within Edinburgh and its liberties, the town-clerk of Edinburgh and his deputies invariably officiated as clerks of the peace in the courts held by the Magistrates as Justices, without any other commission or appointment than their appointments and deputations as common clerks of the burgh. Not only in Edinburgh, but in every other royal burgh, the town-clerk acts ex officio as the clerk in every court held by the Magistrates, in virtue of all jurisdictions conferred on them by their charters, or failing to be exercised by them ex officio; and the burgh fiscals in the same way, with equally general appointments, act as fiscals in these various courts. But if the Magistrates of Edinburgh are, by their charters and immemorial usage, Justices of the Peace, with the right and privilege, by electing a common clerk of the burgh, of entitling him to be at the same time clerk of the peace within the liberties,—the Magistrates of Leith, according to the Statutes, have the same jurisdiction in Leith, with the same concomitant right as to the appointment of their clerk. Consuetude alone can confer jurisdiction as Justices of the Peace, and, according to the institutional writers both of England and Scotland, can give to them a jurisdiction in matters not expressly committed to them by the Statutes: much more then must it be sufficient to confer the power of appointing their own clerks, even if that appointment would otherwise have belonged to the Secretary of State as a privilege of his office, which, so far as regards royal burghs, it never appears to have done. It is said, that because the schedule annexed to the Small-Debt Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, bears, “the clerk of the peace for the shire of _____ grants warrant for summoning the said defender to compare before the Justices of the Peace for the said shire,” therefore the clerk of the peace mentioned in section 3 of the Act, must be the clerk of the peace for the shire appointed by the Secretary of State, and that no such warrant, unless granted by him or his deputies, is to be held legal. But this argument goes a great deal too far, for it strikes at the root of the jurisdiction itself, which has already been held to be good. The third section of the Act says, that the warrant of citation is to be issued by “the clerk of the peace, or any deputy by him appointed.” But the Act does not say that the clerk of the peace, here referred to, must be a clerk appointed by the Secretary of State. In truth, the denomination of “clerk of the peace,” is in terminis applicable to the town-clerk of Leith. He was the clerk of the peace in Leith, so far as the Magistrates had jurisdiction as Justices before the passing of the Small-Debt Acts. There is nothing in these Acts to imply that, while the jurisdiction of the Magistrates as Justices was to continue, his right to act as the clerk of the peace in their courts was to cease. The objection taken by the suspender is, not that the clerk who granted the warrant of citation was not the clerk of the peace for the city of Edinburgh and its liberties, but that he was “not the clerk of the peace for the shire of Edinburgh, or a deputy appointed by him.” But the jurisdiction of the Magistrates under the charters, and the commission of the peace for the city of Edinburgh and its liberties, was, and is altogether separate from, and independent of the jurisdiction vested in the county Justices; and the clerk of the peace for the county of Mid-Lothian has nothing to do with the appointment of the clerks in the Justice of Peace Courts of the Magistrates of Edinburgh and Leith. The object of the commissions of the peace for the city of Edinburgh and its liberties, was to add a number of other Justices who might act along with the Magistrates within the city and its liberties; and, accordingly, since these commissions were issued, “two other Justices in the commission of the peace for the county of the city have usually been applied to to sit along with the Magistrates in these courts.” In consequence, it became safe and expedient, if not strictly necessary, that the clerk who was to act under these new Justices, should have a commission from the Secretary of State like the clerks of other Justices appointed by commission. The present case is very different from Cumming v. Monro, which was the case of a summons subscribed by a person without any authority from the principal or deputy-clerks, who alone were known to the Court. Here there is no question that the person who subscribes the warrant of citation is the authorised clerk of Court under the only appointment which exists, and that the recognition of that appointment as sufficient, both by the Court and the public, is coeval with the existence of the Court itself. The respondent holds a decree unobjectionable, except in so far as it is alleged that the clerk of Court de facto was not the clerk de jure,—an objection which is submitted to be groundless in itself, and not to be relevant, even if it were well founded, to void the proceedings.

At advising,

Lord Meadowbank.—This is a suspension of a decree pronounced by the Magistrates of Leith, sitting as Justices of the Peace under the Small-Debt Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, and the ground of suspension is, that the warrant of citation was not signed by a clerk of the peace, or any deputy appointed by him. The words of the Act of Parliament in regard to this officer are quite precise. By the 3d section it is provided, “that all such causes shall proceed upon complaint agreeable to the form in schedule (A); and the clerk of the peace, or any deputy by him appointed, shall adject to the said complaint a warrant signed by him, agreeable to the form in schedule (A).” The 22d section provides, “That in case the clerk of the peace shall fail to attend, either personally or by a sufficient deputy, in any of the said districts, at the meetings appointed by the said Justices, of which the said clerk of the peace has had due notice, the Justices who shall attend at such district meeting or meetings, shall, and they are hereby empowered to name an interim-clerk for that district, who shall be removable by any subsequent Quarter-Sessions, and another clerk may then be appointed by the said Quarter-Sessions from time to time as they shall see cause.” In the first place, therefore, it appears that the Statute requires that the warrants of citation be signed by the clerk of the peace or his deputy. And in the second place, it appears that if the clerk shall fail to attend at district meetings, the Justices are empowered to appoint an interim clerk, removable by the Quarter-Sessions. In the case of Cumming v. Monro, 19th November 1833, it was decided, that although the clerk of the peace had a right to appoint a deputy, his deputy had no right to appoint a substitute. On the same principle, if, on evidence of the failure of the principal clerk, the Justices, as empowered, appointed an interim clerk, he would have no right to appoint a deputy. The Justices may exercise their discretion in selecting a person to perform the duties of the clerk of the peace; but this power is not communicated to others. Now, what takes place here,—assuming that the Justices of the Peace for Leith have the powers of proper Justices of the Peace for the shire, and that there was evidence, of which truly there is none, that the principal clerk had had notice, and failed to attend, either personally or by a sufficient deputy,—Mr Veitch is first of all appointed clerk by the Magistrates: he dies, and there is no nomination of any individual in terminis thereafter as Justice of Peace clerk. Mr Anderson was appointed solely as town-clerk; but suppose his appointment to embrace also the office of Justice of Peace clerk, all that is done is to constitute him interim clerk on the absence of the principal clerk. He holds no deputation himself, and yet he grants a substitution to Hay. By the case of Cumming v. Monro, the warrant requires to be signed by the clerk of the peace or his deputy: here it is signed by Hay the substitute of an interim clerk. He is a person unknown, and his warrant worth nothing. As in the case of Monro, I think, therefore, that there is here no process. I am for suspending the decree.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. At the advising of the case on 5th March 1841, we were all of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of Leith, as Justices of the Peace, to pronounce the judgment complained of, was made out; and I concurred in that opinion for the following reasons: 1st, The Magistrates of Edinburgh are ex officio Justices of the Peace for the city of Edinburgh and its liberties, which comprehend Leith: 2d, The Dock Act, 39 Geo. III. c. 44, § 16, enacts, that the Magistrates of Leith shall have the same powers and jurisdiction in and over the town of South Leith “in all actions and causes that may come before them, as are competent to the Lord Provost and Magistrates within the royalty of Edinburgh:” 3d, The Burgh Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 77, § 30, gives the same powers more broadly, and enacts, that the Magistrates to be elected under its authority “shall have such and the like rights, powers, authorities and jurisdictions, as is or are possessed by the Magistrates of any royal burgh in Scotland:” 4th, In the special commission for the city of Edinburgh, and the liberties thereof, the Provost and Magistrates of Leith are mentioned in express terms. But although their jurisdiction may be made out, their power to nominate a clerk of their own may not. There is no incompatibility between their own appointment as Justices, and their being attended and served by the clerk specially nominated by Statute. The express rule of the Statute is, that the warrant shall be signed by the clerk of the peace, and the schedule is conform to the enactment. The clerk of the peace holds his commission from the Crown; and there is a special commission to Mr Callander to be clerk to the Justices of Peace of the city of Edinburgh and the liberties,—comprehending, among the number, the Magistrates of Leith. Now, it is to be observed, that the jurisdiction given to Justices of Peace under the Small-Debt Act is entirely the creature of Statute. Whatever other powers the Magistrates of Leith may have as Justices, in this matter they had only power under the Statute. Anderson was not the deputy of the clerk of the peace: he was nominated by the Town-council, and not by the Magistrates, who only are Justices. The 22d section of the Act confers a power to nominate an interim clerk; but although Anderson had been so nominated, he could not have appointed a deputy. The explanations given by the respondent of the occasion of Callander's appointment, makes the matter still clearer. The object of the commissions of the peace for the city of Edinburgh and its liberties, it is said, was to add a number of other Justices who might act along with the Magistrates; and in practice, two of these Justices are usually applied to, to sit along with the Magistrates in their Justice of Peace Courts. It became necessary, therefore, that the city clerk should have a commission from the Secretary of State, like the clerks of other Justices appointed by commission. But if it is admitted that Mr Callander or his deputy is the proper clerk to act when the Magistrates choose to sit along with any of the commission Justices, it is clear that he must be the proper clerk; for the clerk cannot be made to change, and depend on the Justices sitting. I am therefore of opinion that the warrant is a nullity. The case of Cumming v. Monro is precisely in point, and is of great authority. The judgment was pronounced by Lord Corehouse, and was afterwards adhered to by the Court. If the warrant be illegal, the practice cannot support it when challenged. I don't say any thing of the effect of such warrants upon decrees which have been already implemented; but the sooner such a practice is stopped the better.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with the opinions delivered, although I conceive the question to be one of great difficulty. I argued the case as counsel at the bar, but could not satisfy myself of the soundness of my argument, although it appears to have satisfied the Lord Justice-General, as I find from the notes of an opinion which he had written upon his papers. Still, however, I think the objection insurmountable. The jurisdiction under the Small-Debt Act is statutory; and if the clerk of Court be described in terms applicable to one officer only, and that officer not the town-clerk, then he cannot act with the Magistrates sitting as Justices under this Act. Perhaps he might officiate along with them in their other actings as Justices, although I do not say that a town-clerk is one of the clerks of her Majesty's peace. It is said that the respondent found the person who signed the warrant clerk de facto, although not de jure; and reference is made to the case of Hardie, under the commission of Oyer and Terminer in 1820. I acknowledge the value of the principle laid down in that case. When a party holds the only and proper office for performing certain duties, his actings may be valid, notwithstanding some defect in his appointment; but the objection here taken is, that a party holding an altogether different office from that pointed out by the Statute, has nevertheless put his hands to certain acts required by it. There seems to be some confusion in the argument drawn from the jurisdiction of the Magistrates. They may sit as Justices of the Peace under the Small-Debt Act, but it does not follow that they are to sit exclusively. If other Justices may sit along with them, then there is an end of the claim of the town-clerk to be clerk of the Small-Debt Court. He cannot be clerk where other Justices are entitled to sit and may choose to appear. But although the town-clerk be not the proper clerk, it does not follow that the Magistrates may not sit as Justices, and hold a Small-Debt Court. District courts are appointed by the Statute, but they must be held as prescribed. The Court here was either a district court or it was not. If it was not, the Magistrates were not entitled to a clerk different from the clerk of the peace. If it was, they ought to have appointed an interim clerk as provided. The Magistrates do not carry into the commission any peculiar or distinctive character. The law gives them, as Justices, a clerk of the peace, and they are not entitled to nominate another party for the performance of his duties. Looking to the special clauses in the Statute, the town-clerk cannot claim the office either of clerk of the peace or of interim clerk; he does not answer the description given of either. I am not moved by the course of practice, or that the proceedings will be vitiated. If the officer acted without authority, the nullity of his proceedings will not be obviated by the practice. We are here in a suspension of a decree not yet executed; and I do not say that the same ground of objection will avail in the reduction of decrees already implemented, or against any proceedings not timeously challenged, or in any action of damages against the town-clerk. I do not consider Edinburgh to be a separate county of itself, as some cities are in England; and I do not think it would be competent for the Crown to erect it into one. The Crown may appoint Justices for a particular part of the county; but these would only be authorised to act with the others, holding a commission over the whole shire. The decree sought to be reduced, proceeds upon a warrant signed by Mr Hay, and it humbly appears to me that as he had no authority to act as a Justice of Peace clerk, the proceedings following upon the decree cannot be sustained.

Lord Medwyn.—If I were satisfied that I am not bound to go farther back than the 6th of Geo. IV. c. 48, I would arrive at the same opinion as your Lordships. But I feel constrained to go back to 39 Geo. III. c. 46, which was merely an extension of the powers of the Magistrates sitting in the ten-merk court, and which did not call upon them to appoint any other clerk than what they had been in use to employ. The 6th Geo. IV. was a continuing of the Act of Geo. III.; and if the town-clerk who acted in the ten-merk court acted also under that Statute, and has continued to do so hitherto undisturbed, I do not see how his actings can be invalid. The case of Cumming v. Monro was a null appointment, and could therefore not be homologated; whereas, the origin of the appointment of the town-clerk was a legal origin. I had prepared notes to enable me to illustrate and enforce these views, but seeing that I differ from the whole of your Lordships, my confidence in my opinion must be much shaken, and I shall not enter into farther detail.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Alter the interlocutor complained of: Find that the proceedings in the Small-Debt Court, held by the Magistrates of Leith as Justices of the Peace, must be regulated by, and in conformity to the provisions of the Statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 48: Find that the warrant for summoning the claimer, John Harvey, to appear in the action raised at the instance of the respondent, Adam Forrest, in the Justice of Peace Small-Debt Court held at Leith, and also the decree in said action, of which suspension is sought, were signed by Alexander Hay, the depute town-clerk of Leith, acting as, and in character of clerk to the said Justice of Peace Court, in respect of his office as town-clerk of Leith, or the depute of such town-clerk: Find that the town-clerk of Leith, or his depute, is not entitled, under the above-mentioned Statute, to act as clerk to the said Justice of Peace Court, and cannot be taken to be in terms of the said Statute the clerk of the peace, or depute-clerk of the peace: Find that the proceedings complained of were therefore incompetent and invalid, and of no force or effect in law: Suspend the letters simpliciter, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses, subject to modification; and before such modification, appoint the account to be lodged,” &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 26.—DR ANDREW FYFE, Pursuer, v. JOHN CARFRAE and SON, Defenders.

Prescription—Bill—Reference to Oath—Circumstances in which an oath was held negative of a reference that a prescribed bill was resting-owing, though the bill continued in the drawer's possession, and the deponent (an acceptor) could not specify in what year it was paid, or whether it was paid "in cash, or by an order on the bank, or how."

John Carfrae and Son, booksellers in Edinburgh, having purchased from Dr Andrew Fyfe the remaining stock of his “Compendium of Anatomy” at the price of £188, granted him in payment their four acceptances for £47 each, dated 7th August 1830, and payable respectively at four, six, nine, and twelve months after date. It was admitted that the first three bills were paid; but in August 1839, Mr M'Innes, Dr Fyfe's agent, made a demand on Mr Carfrae, junior, the only surviving partner of the firm of John Carfrae and Son, for payment of the last bill which remained in his possession, and which he alleged was still due. In support of the demand he referred to a correspondence relative to that bill in 1831. The correspondence commenced 15th September 1831, with a letter from Mr Mitchell for Mr M'Innes, reminding Mr Carfrae that his bill to Dr Fyfe for £47 had fallen due on the 7th August, and requesting him to retire it “to-morrow or Saturday.” Mr Carfrae replied, that he understood Dr Fyfe had consented to a renewal, and begged that the arrangement might still be gone into. Owing to Mr M'Innes's absence from town a short delay took place. Afterwards, on the 2d November, he wrote as follows:

“Mr M'Innes begs to inform Messrs Carfrae and Son, that their bill to Dr Fyfe for £47, due 10th August last, will be presented for payment on Saturday next, when it is expected the bill will be paid.”

Mr Carfrae again replied:

“Messrs Carfrae would feel greatly obliged if Mr M'Innes would allow Dr Fyfe's bill to stand over till the end of this month, when it will be paid with many thanks. There is another bill of Dr F.'s due on the 10th current, which we will be ready for.”

The next letter contained the above demand for payment, dated 28th August 1839. Mr Carfrae, in reply, assured Mr M'Innes that he had paid the bill. The present action was raised to enforce payment. Mr Carfrae pleaded prescription, and on a reference to oath deponed, that the whole set of bills for £47 each were paid in Mr M'Innes's house:

“That he himself paid one which was not delivered, and his late father stated to the deponent that he had paid another bill to Mr M'Innes, of the set of bills aforesaid, which likewise was not delivered up: That he thinks it must have been the bill due on the 7th and 10th August 1831, from the circumstance of the deponent's having written to Mr M'Innes the aforesaid letter of 2d November 1831, and from the tenor of Mr M'Innes's letter, to which the deponent's was an answer: That he does not recollect whether any interest was demanded. Interrogated, Whether the bill which the deponent did not get up was paid to Mr M'Innes himself? Depones, That he thinks it was paid to one of his clerks. Interrogated, What was the reason why the deponent did not get up said bill?

Depones, That he was told it was not at hand. Interrogated, Whether he did not ask for an acknowledgment or receipt for the amount paid to Mr M'Innes's clerk as aforesaid? Depones, That he did not, and that occasionally he has paid bills without either obtaining them up, or any acknowledgment for the amount, in consequence of the bills not being at hand. Interrogated, Whether he recollects if the bill was paid in cash, or by an order on the bank, or how? Depones, That at this distance of time he cannot tell how the bill was paid. Interrogated, In what year the said bill was paid by the deponent to Mr M'Innes's clerk? Depones, That he cannot say when, but he still thinks it was the bill due on the 7th and 10th August 1831; and adds, that the said bill is marked paid in the deponent's bill-book, but the bill-book does not show at what time the bill was paid, although the cash-book would. Interrogated, If the cash-book corresponding with the period referred to has gone astray? Depones, That it has; and adds, that upon the dissolution of the late firm of Carfrae and Son in 1836, his late father and partner applied for the business-books of copartnery by letter, and he got three cash-books, containing, as the deponent believes, all the entries relative to the said bill,—the said three cash-books being those particularly wanted by his father: That these cash-books were never returned to the deponent, and as he did not require them for the conducting of his business, he never applied for them." "Interrogated, Whether the debt libelled is resting-owing? Depones, That it is not: it was paid; and adds in farther explanation, that no demand for payment of the bill libelled for was ever made upon him until he raised an action in 1839 against the pursuer for payment of a contra account which was incurred several years after 1831: That the pursuer had also stated to the deponent more than once that he had received payment of all the bills from Carfrae and Son; and farther, that on the dissolution of the copartnership of Carfrae and Son in 1836, notice was inserted in the Edinburgh Gazette of 31st of May in that year, calling on the creditors of the concern to lodge their claims in the deponent's hands, but no claim was then lodged by the pursuer."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, with the oath emitted by the defender under the pursuer's reference, and heard parties' procurators.—Finds the original constitution of the debt proved by the said oath; but on the other hand, finds that the oath does not instruct that the debt is resting-owing: Therefore, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the libel; but, in the circumstances of the case, finds no expenses due to either party, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary, though by no means satisfied with the oath in this case, has been unable to draw any sufficiently marked line of distinction between it and the case of Robertson, 26th May 1830, to entitle him to disregard the judgment there unanimously pronounced by the Court. But for that judgment, however, he should have felt the greatest possible hesitation in deciding as he has done. For with the original constitution of the debt admitted,—the bill itself still remaining in the creditor's hands,—and no payment alleged to that creditor himself, but only to some unnamed and (for ought seen) unauthorised person, 'thought' to be a clerk of his agent's,—the defender being unable to state 'in what year,' or whether 'in cash, or by an order on the bank, or how,' and not even venturing to say positively that it was the individual bill here in dispute,—for he only 'thinks it must have been the bill due on the 7th–10th August 1831,'—the Lord Ordinary does confess that he entertains serious doubts how far there is not enough here to overthrow the legal presumption of payment implied in the doctrine of prescription, and to throw back the defender on his original liability, as still remaining undischarged.

"Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary's first and very strong impression of the case,—following the principles laid down in Hay, 21st June 1786 (Dict. 13,220); Smith, 26th November 1807 (Baron Hume, 462); Allison, 10th March 1841 (Fac. Coll.), and others of the like class,—was, that the pursuer was entitled to decree. Nor does he even now feel by any means sure that the case of Robertson runs so entirely on all-fours with the present, as completely to bear out the judgment that has been given. At the same time, there being here a total and unexplained cessation of demand for many years after the most pressing and repeated demands of payment in the outset,—the pursuer not having lodged a claim on the estate of the company, his original debtor, notwithstanding its dissolution, and the relative notice and call upon the creditors in the Gazette,—but, on the contrary, according to the oath, having even 'stated to the deponent more than once that he had received payment of all the bills,' while, combined with this, all the said bills stand regularly marked in the defender's bill-book as 'paid,'—there being no impeachment of the authenticity of this marking, the Lord Ordinary believes that he has only substantially followed the spirit of the decision in Robertson in deciding as he has done.

"It is not thought, however, that this is at all a case which entitles the defender to his expenses. The pursuer, from the slovenly manner, to say the least, in which the alleged extinction of the bill by the defender was gone about, has not only lost his original debtor, but has got no one fixed with the debt instead,—neither Mr M'Innes nor his supposed clerk being in any degree affected by the result of the case upon the defender's oath."

Both parties reclaimed,—the pursuer on the merits, and the defender against the refusal of expenses.

At advising,

Lord President.—I have no difficulty in finding with the Lord Ordinary, that the debt is not resting-owing. A reference was made to oath, and we must judge of its purport. In doing so, little assistance can be gained from decisions, unless it could be shown that the oath in the present case is in all respects identical with those to which the decisions refer. This is impossible. Every particular oath must stand by itself. We must look at it and give it fair play. Now in the present case, though the defender admits that he was once liable for the debt, and is not able at the distance of ten years to give a very particular account of the circumstances connected with the payment of it, he is clear that he did pay it to some person acting for the pursuer—he believes to his agent's clerk. There is nothing in the correspondence inconsistent with this deposition, but the contrary. It appears that Mr M'Innes, the avowed agent of Dr Fyfe, makes a demand for payment shortly after the bill fell due. Mr Carfrae replies, that he understood Dr Fyfe had agreed to a renewal, and asks that this may still be done. He is again pressed for payment, and replies, that if the bill is allowed to lie over till the end of the month, it will be paid with many thanks. This was in 1831, and nothing more is heard of the matter till 1839, notwithstanding of the dissolution of the copartnership of Carfrae and Son, and (what is a most important fact in the case) an advertisement in the Gazette, calling upon those to whom the firm stood indebted to lodge their claims. Every thing goes to confirm the deposition that the debt was paid. The Lord Ordinary, however, while finding for the defender on the merits, has refused him his expenses. I confess it does not appear to me that the grounds of refusal are sufficient. In the first place, I lay no stress on the cases quoted, for I see no principle in them which can be applied so as to rule the present case; and as to the suspicion which his Lordship entertains, I cannot enter into it. If any claim had really existed, the advertisement in the Gazette could hardly have failed to make it be lodged. I would therefore adhere to the interlocutor on the merits, but alter as to the expenses.

Lord Gillies.—I concur entirely. The Lord Ordinary is right on the merits, but I cannot participate in his doubt. No claim is free from doubt; but here the oath distinctly proves that the debt is not resting-owing. The defender depones not merely that the debt is paid, but that the pursuer himself acknowledged that it was paid.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer seems to think it a sufficient ground of suspicion that the document of debt is in the hands of the pursuer. But is not this the very thing which the Statute itself supposes? Where the document has been delivered up, there is no room for the plea of prescription—the delivery being sufficient to presume payment; but the object of the Statute was to provide for the case in which it had not been delivered, and it accordingly enacts, that after a certain period, supposing the document still to remain with the creditor, resting-owing must be proved by the writ or oath of the debtor. Here the reference is made, and resting-owing is negatived in the most marked manner. Mr M'Innes had written to say that the bill would be presented on a certain day for payment. Mr Carfrae asks delay, and begs it may lie over till the end of the month. It was thus to lie without being presented, and the deposition is, that he called at Mr M'Innes's office with payment; that Mr M'Innes chanced not to be present, and that he paid the amount to his clerk, without receiving delivery of the document. I think it highly probable that this account is true. Cross questions were put, and I don't find fault with the questions; for I do not hold that when a party depones on a reference, he is entitled to shelter himself behind a non memini of facts which he must know. When in the Outer-House, I felt myself entitled to disregard the conclusive part of the oath, if inconsistent with the deposition as a whole. But that is not the case here. There is no ground to presume a mistake on the part of the defender, and I think the pursuer has completely failed to prove resting-owing. Besides, he does not offer any explanation of the delay. My only doubt is, whether he ought not to have been called upon to explain, and whether his judicial declaration ought not to have been taken for that purpose.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur. I see no ground for altering on the merits, and I see still less ground for the scruple which has led the Lord Ordinary to refuse expenses. The action is not raised till ten years after the date of payment, and in circumstances which strongly discountenance the claim.

The Court adhered on the merits, but altered as to the expenses.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 27.—ARCHIBALD CONNELL (Common Agent in Locality of Moffat), v. THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH.

Teinds, Valuation of.—Proof—Evidence held insufficient to prove that the teinds of certain lands were included in the valuation of other lands of a different name, belonging to the same proprietor.

In the locality of Moffat, the common agent having held that the teinds of the lands of Woodfoot, a farm belonging to the Duke of Buccleuch, were unvalued, an objection was taken for the proprietor, and a record was made up by condescendence and answers. It appeared that in 1637, by a decree of valuation at the instance of the Marquis of Queensberry, the twenty-pound land of Pocornell was valued for teind at 8 bolls meal, and for vicarage at 27 lambs, 3 stone 6 lb. wool, and 13 stone 8 lb. cheese. For the Duke of Buccleuch it was contended, that this valuation included the farm of Woodfoot, and in proof it was averred, that the twenty-pound land of Pocornell consisted of the three separate farms of Crofthead, Craigbeck and Woodfoot, and had long been possessed, and were now commonly known by these names. It was further averred, that unless Woodfoot was held to be so included, there was no other designation in the titles of the Buccleuch estates to which the possession of it could be ascribed, as the only other lands in the parish of Moffat belonging to the family, were the lands of Newton and Pasgilfoot, which were separately valued, and formed no part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell. It was also stated, that in two former localities, the one in 1794 and the other in 1810, the teinds of Woodfoot were held to be included in the valuation of 1637.

The common agent, while admitting this to be the fact, averred that they had been so included without discussion, and per incuriam; and in support of his allegation, that the teinds of Woodfoot could not be included in the valuation of those of Pocornell, stated, that the farm of Woodfoot was not adjacent to lands acknowledged to be included in Pocornell, but was separated from them by interposed lands belonging to other proprietors; and, moreover, according to the averment of the proprietor himself, part of the farm of Woodfoot was situated in a different parish; that in the cess-books of the county, the lands of Crofthead and Craigbeck, which undoubtedly formed part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, are entered without any mention of Woodfoot; and that in the old rental-books of the Annandale estates—the earliest in date being 1707, and the latest 1724—the teinds of Woodfoot are entered by themselves at 20 lb., and those of Pocornell, Redacres, Craigbeck and Crofthead, at 110 lb.

The Lord Ordinary appointed “the Duke of Buccleuch to state in a minute the grounds on which he maintains that the lands of Woodfoot are comprehended under the lands of Pocornell or Portcornell, in the decret of valuation of 30th June 1637, and the common agent to answer the same.”

His Lordship afterwards pronounced the following interlocutor:

“17th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having advised the record, minute of debate for the Duke of Buccleuch, and revised answers thereto for the common agent, with the writings produced, Finds that it is not proved that the lands of Woodfoot, belonging to the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, formed part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, or were included in the valuation 1637; therefore appoints the Duke to condescend on the rental of the lands of Woodfoot by the second box-day, and the common agent to answer the same by the first sederunt-day in November next, if he shall see cause.

“Note.—In pronouncing this judgment, the Lord Ordinary considered it an important fact, that the lands of Woodfoot are admitted to be disjoined from the other lands belonging to the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, and it is not denied that the interposed lands of Breckonside and Woodhead, belonging to the heirs of Dr Rogerson, were valued in 1747.”

The Duke of Buccleuch reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I am inclined to adopt the view taken by the Lord Ordinary. The question of fact is, whether the farm of Woodfoot forms part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, and was included in the valuation of the teinds of that land in 1637. It is admitted, that besides this twenty-pound land, the Duke of Buccleuch is possessed of other lands in the parish of Moffat; viz., the lands of Newton and Pasgilfoot; and it seems also to be admitted that the lands of Crofthead and Craigbeck constitute part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, though it is not alleged that they are included nominatim. It is, therefore, not incompetent to show, that the lands of Woodfoot, though not mentioned by name, may also be included in the same twenty-pound land; but it is obviously incumbent on the proprietor to make this out by proper evidence. Now, in the first place, though it is said in the condescendence, that the twenty-pound land of Pocornell has long been possessed by the Duke of Buccleuch and his predecessors as three separate farms, known by the names of Crofthead, Craigbeck, and Woodfoot, it is not stated that in any lease, ancient or modern, the farms are so described. A clause to this effect might have been important, but it does not exist; and the valuation of teinds applies only to lands described in the decret, as "the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, whereof James Johnston of Corehead is tenant of one twenty-merk land." In the second place, the farm of Woodfoot does not adjoin the lands which are admitted to form part of the twenty-pound land of Pocornell; but is separated from them by intervening lands belonging to other proprietors; and what is more, a portion of that farm is actually situated in another parish. This is a most material fact. In the third place, the cess-books of the county furnish evidence tending to show that the farm of Woodfoot is a separate tenement from the lands of Pocornell, for it is admitted that these lands are there valued at £400, and entered under the names only of Craigbeck and Crofthead. Lastly, The state of the ancient rental-books of the Marquis of Annandale, furnish strong collateral proof to the same effect; for in the rental of the teinds, Woodfoot is stated at 20 lb., and is entered by itself apart from the teinds of Pocornell, Redacre, Craigbeck, and Crofthead, which are set down at 110 lb. Taking all these facts into view, and considering that the burden of proving that the teinds of Woodfoot are included in the valuation of Pocornell, I am satisfied that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a correct conclusion.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur with your Lordship, and for the same reasons; particularly for this one, that when a valuation of teinds has taken place, it is incumbent on the proprietor to produce evidence specifying the particular lands to which it applies. Now, the best that can be said here is, that the evidence is not strong on either side. There is nothing but conjecture; and all we can say is, that the lands in question may have been included in the valuation, or they may not. Considering the uncertainty, I am not surprised that the proprietor has attempted the proof; but I am satisfied that he has failed.

Lord Gillies.—I am of the same opinion. I don't consider the proof clear on either side, and there is still room for doubt. There is something in the fact, that on one occasion, in a locality of the parish, the old valuation was held to include the farm of Woodfoot; but there appears to have been no discussion, and it is probable that it passed per incuriam. The proprietor, at the best, has produced only negative evidence, and I therefore concur in the view taken by the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur in the proposition, that in every case of this nature, it is incumbent on the proprietor to prove by sufficient evidence that the lands in question were included in the valuation; and in no case is this more necessary than as regards this particular farm. For, in the first place, the name does not correspond with that of the lands in which it is said to be included; and in the second place, it is distinctly admitted that it lies at some distance from other lands included in the valuation, and is separated from them by lands belonging to other proprietors. These facts are not sufficient to prove absolutely that the farm was not valued; but they are sufficient to lay on the proprietor the burden of proving by the clearest evidence that it was. Instead of this, however, we have no evidence at all, unless we are to give this name to the negative presumption founded on the statement of the proprietor, that unless the farm of Woodfoot is included in the twenty-pound land of Pocornell, there is no other designation in his titles to which his possession of it can be ascribed. I am afraid, before we could adopt that statement as conclusive, it would be necessary to have the Duke's charter-chest before us, and make a thorough investigation of its contents. It is impossible to attach any importance to the fact that this valuation, which was made in 1637, was assumed, in the locality of 1694, to include the lands in question. Had the locality been of an older date, or had there been repeated localities in which this was assumed, it might have been something; but this one locality, in the absence of other proof, is altogether insufficient. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The Court adhered, with expenses from the date of the interlocutor.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 28.—ROBERT KILPATRICK, Raiser, v. THOMAS KILPATRICK AND OTHERS, Claimants.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Partnership—Proof.—A joint lease of a farm is not per se a proof that the tenants are joint proprietors of the crop and stocking.

In this process of multiplepointing the raiser, Robert Kilpatrick, in his condescendence of the fund in medio, credited himself with one-half of the free proceeds of the crop and stocking on the farm of Coates, in which he was joint tenant with his late father, and in support of his claim pleaded, that "being, under the formal contract of lease, a joint pro indiviso tenant along with his father, and joint pro indiviso proprietor of the stocking and crop, and in possession of the same, it is not competent, in this process, to call his right as tenant and joint and equal proprietor of the stock and cropping in question."

His brother and sisters, the other claimants, averred, that "at the date of the lease the pursuer had no capital, funds, or effects of any description; that the whole stock upon the farm, furniture in the dwelling-house, and every thing else on and connected with the farm and premises, belonged to his father; that the crop of 1837 had been manured, laboured, and sown at the pursuer's father's expense, and the crop itself was the property of the latter, who paid the servants' wages, expenses of reaping, and every other expense connected therewith, as well as the rent when it fell due;" and pleaded—"The pursuer cannot claim to have been joint proprietor along with his father, of the stock, household furniture, and other effects on and connected with the farm, without legally proving an assignation or transference to a share thereof in the pursuer's favour. No such assignation or transference is legally implied in the pursuer having a joint interest in the lease."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"30th June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, Finds that the objectors (the sisters of the pursuer) are not precluded by the lease in favour of the pursuer and his deceased father, jointly, or by anything else that as yet appears in this process, from showing by evidence, that, notwithstanding the joint lease, the crop and stocking of the farm belonged exclusively to the father; and with this finding appoints the case to be enrolled, in order that the parties may say how the cause is to be farther proceeded with.

"Note.—The pursuer, in accounting with his sisters for the property of their deceased father, maintains, that being the joint tenant of a farm along with his father, the law implies equality of share in the crop and stocking. Now, assuming this to be the general rule, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this is but a legal presumption, which it is competent to rebut by evidence; and that the averments put upon record by the sisters, who maintain that the whole belonged to their father, if proved, are sufficient to rebut it. He refers particularly to their answer to article 4 of the condescendence, and to their own statements, articles 2 and 3. According to them, the son's name was put into the lease merely to give him a vote in the county elections, while the father retained everything—the whole previously being his—beyond the mere admission of his son's name into the lease.

"Considering the relationship of the parties, and the smallness of the sum in dispute, is it not a case for extrajudicial arrangement?"

The raiser reclaimed; but the Court held that the fact of joint tenancy could not of itself prove joint property in the crop and stocking, and, without calling on the respondents, adhered.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

NO. 29.—ALEXANDER DOWNIE, Suspender, v.
CHARLES PEEBLES, Respondent.

Process—Calling—Decree in Absence—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5.—One of two defenders in a process before the Sheriff, advocated the cause on a decree being pronounced finding him primarily liable in the account sued for. The note was intimated to the co-defender, but his name did not appear in the partibus, nor in the calling lists, and no appearance was entered for him in the Supreme Court. Ultimately judgment was pronounced, as before, in favour of the original pursuer, the respondent in the advocacy, but reversing the order of liability between the two defenders as fixed by the Sheriff. The decree having been extracted, and a charge thereon given to the absent defender found primarily liable, a bill of suspension was presented, and passed simpliciter, without consignation of the expenses decerned for, in terms of the 1st and 2d Vict. c. 86, § 5.

In the year 1832, Mr Downie entered into a transaction with Messrs James and Alexander M'Gregor, merchants in Glasgow, under which he received from them an ex facie absolute disposition to certain property belonging to them at Kelvin Haugh, near Glasgow; and on the other hand, granted them a back-bond or deed of obligation, binding himself to reconvey the subjects on payment of a certain sum of money therein mentioned, and of all other sums which might be due to him by Messrs M'Gregor, either for goods or cash advances. Peebles and Orr, writers in Glasgow, were employed on the part of Mr Downie in carrying through the transaction, and in 1837, an action was raised before the Sheriff-court of Glasgow, at the instance of the respondent, against Mr Downie and the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the Messrs MacGregor, concluding against them, conjunctly and severally, for the sum of £148. 0. 4½, being the amount of the account incurred to them in negotiating the transaction of 1832. After considerable litigation in the Inferior-court, the Sheriff pronounced two several interlocutors altering the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, decerning against the trustee on M'Gregor's estate for payment of the account as taxed, and for the expenses of process, and decerning also against Mr Downie as subsidiarie liable therefor, and that after the trustee had been discussed. The suspender acquiesced in this judgment, but Mr Johnston, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the Messrs M'Gregor, advocated it to the Court of Session. The advocacy bears to be—"Note of Advocacy for William Johnston, accountant in Glasgow, trustee on the sequestrated estate of James and Alexander M'Gregor, formerly power-loom manufacturers at Kelvin Haugh, near Glasgow, against Charles Peebles, writer in Glasgow." The note, however, was intimated to the suspender, and the following docket, subscribed by his agents, was put on the service copy produced in process:—"Glasgow, 2d January 1840.—We hereby hold this note of advocacy as duly intimated to us. (Signed) CHAS.

PEEBLES."—"MacLachlan and Steele for Mr Downie." But the name of the suspender neither entered the partibus, the calling list, nor the rolls of Court. Additional notes of pleas in law were lodged for Mr Peebles and Mr Johnston, but no appearance was entered for the suspender in the process. After considerable discussion, the Lord Ordinary, on 16th March 1841, pronounced an interlocutor, as before, finding both parties liable to the respondent; but in respect of the special circumstances of the case, finding the complainer, Mr Downie, liable primarily, and M'Gregor's trustee subsidiarily, and accordingly decerning against them in this order, for the amount of the account sued for, together with the respondent's expenses of process both in the Inferior-court and in the Court of Session. The accounts of expenses having been taxed, the Lord Ordinary, on 16th July 1841, pronounced final decree, giving effect to the previous judgment. The respondent then extracted the decree, and gave a charge to the suspender, who thereupon tendered payment of the principal sum and interest contained in the account, but he declined to pay the expenses of process, as they were incurred in a process to which he had never been made a party. The tender being refused, a note of suspension was presented, praying alternatively, to suspend the charge, and whole grounds and warrants thereof; or at all events, on consignation in the hands of the clerk of the sum decerned for in name of expenses, to repon the complainer against the said charge; or to do otherwise in the premises as shall seem just.

The Lord Ordinary having considered the note of suspension and answers, and heard counsel thereon, passed the note on consignation of the expenses decerned for, in terms of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5.

The suspender reclaimed, and prayed the Court to remit to the Lord Ordinary to pass the bill simpliciter. The suspender admitted that the note was duly intimated, and was thus in the same situation as a summons duly executed, but it was contended that the calling is as requisite as the execution (Erskine, IV. 1, 8), to make the summons a depending process. No extract could legally be given out against the suspender, whose name was not in the partibus (Dar. p. 168), and therefore the 1st and 2d Vict. c. 86, § 5, could not contemplate the payment of expenses of process as a condition of being reponed against a decree in absence pronounced in circumstances such as the present.

It was answered by the respondent, that although the decree might be liable to reduction, yet if the party sought his remedy under the Statute, he must observe the conditions it prescribes.

Lord Meadowbank.—The object of the Statute was to diminish expense, and to admit of a party being reponed against a decree in absence by means of a suspension. But here the suspender was no party to the suit, and a decree might as well have been pronounced against any one in this Court as against him; and is he to have no remedy but by paying the whole expenses incurred by other parties? The Statute, in my opinion, never could contemplate this.

Lord Medwyn.—Is this a decree in absence according to the meaning of the Statute? It is plain that it could only mean the payment of expenses incurred by the absence of a party who was bound to be present, which in this case he was not.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion, that this is not a decree in absence in the sense of the Statute. There was a process in the Inferior-court, and with the decree pronounced in it the suspender was satisfied; but another party, also a defender, brings an advocacy,—the principal burden being laid upon him. Intimation was made to the suspender, but he had no occasion to move, not being called, and his name not appearing in the partibus. Can one party go and ask decree against another who is cited but not called? The judgment is altered, and then it is attempted to be enforced, unless the suspender pays the whole expenses;—is that just? There was no process in which decree in absence could be pronounced against him.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In order to obtain a valid decree in absence, the process must be regularly in Court against the party who does not choose to appear.

The Court altered, and passed the bill simpliciter.

No. 30.—PATRICK MILNE, Advocator, v. CHARLES MELVILLE, Respondent.

Jurisdiction.—Burgh.—Dean of Guild.—A party pulled down and proceeded to rebuild in a certain form a gable between his own premises and those of his neighbour, both situated within burgh. The neighbour instituted a process against him before the Bailie Court, and obtained a decret ordaining him to restore the gable, as far as practicable, to its original state.—Held that the Court of the Magistrates was competent to entertain the action, and that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild was not privative.

The advocator is proprietor of a house situated within the extended royalty of Dundee. The respondent is proprietor of the immediately adjoining house; and the gable which divides the two houses is alleged to be mutual.

In the autumn of 1837, the advocator having had occasion to increase the height and breadth of his house with the view of enlarging an extensive flax-spinning mill, took down the old gable; but in the course of rebuilding it, having made certain encroachments upon the property of the respondent, an application was presented to the Magistrates of Dundee, praying for interdict against the advocator's "interfering farther with the petitioner's property, and building on it, or on the site of the gable wall taken down as aforesaid," and to have the advocator ordained "to rebuild the said gable wall and chimney-tops, and in general, to put the petitioner's house in the same state in which it was previous to the operations complained of," reserving all claims of damages.

After various proceedings, the Magistrates, on 24th March 1838, ordained the advocator to restore the wall as nearly as possible to its original state, and remitted to Mr William Scott, superintendent of public works, to see this done at the advocator's expense. The remit not having been executed to the satisfaction of the respondent, was afterwards recalled, and the Magistrates, 11th July 1838, decerned generally against the advocator to restore the wall, as far as practicable, to its original state. On the 16th July, a second application was presented to the Magistrates, on which a record was made up and a proof led, after which the Magistrates pronounced the judgment now under advocacy, the result of which is to find that a portion of the foundation of the new gable has been made six or eight inches thicker than the foundation of the old gable, which additional thickness the Magistrates hold would be an encroachment on the respondent's cellars if he should ever excavate them, and therefore, that this extra thickness must be removed; that in building the side-walls, which form the extension of the breadth of the gable, the advocator has encroached at the one end upon ground which is to be presumed to belong to the respondent, and that at the other end, the advocator's wall interferes with the respondent's eaves-drop, and, therefore, that the advocator must take down the whole building complained of; and interdict is at the same time granted against the advocator as craved, and the advocator is found liable in expenses.

The advocator brought the judgment under review by a note of advocacy; and it having occurred to the Lord Ordinary that the application by which the present action originated, ought to have been presented to the Dean of Guild of Dundee, and not to the Magistrates, additional pleas, and afterwards minutes of debate, were ordered upon that point.

By an Act passed on the 31st August 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 66, § 6, 7), for extending the royalty of Dundee, it is provided (§ 6), that the Magistrates and Council of the burgh should have the same

"jurisdiction, powers, and authorities over the enlarged territory, as are at present, or might have been enjoyed or exercised by the Magistrates and Council, ordinary and extraordinary, of the ancient burgh within the same, whether at common law or under any Act or Acts of Parliament, local or general, royal charters, or otherwise." (§ 7), "That the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild over the territory annexed to the ancient burgh, shall not be privative or exclusive of the jurisdiction of any Court of law, now competent to exercise jurisdiction over the same, and nothing herein contained shall be construed to compel any party or parties to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for leave to make alterations on property within the next territory, or for any other object or purpose connected with the same."

Pleaded for the advocator.—

That the question between him and the respondent was one peculiarly calculated for the cognizance of the Dean of Guild. That if, as the respondent alleges, he ought to have had a warrant from the Dean of Guild Court before commencing his operations, this would only make it the more clearly competent and proper for the respondent to have complained to the Dean of Guild that the advocator was proceeding illegally, and without a warrant. The only point admitting of discussion, therefore, seems to be, whether the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild in the matter referred to, was exclusive of, or merely cumulative with, the jurisdiction of the Magistrates? The words of Lord Bankton are,—“This Court has likewise the sole jurisdiction in regulating buildings within borrows, whether in repairing or taking down and rebuilding old buildings, or erecting new ones,” in doing which they are to take care that neither the streets be obstructed, “nor the property of neighbouring heritors encroached upon.” And the words of Mr Erskine are,—“It belongs to the Dean of Guild to take care that buildings within borough be agreeable to law, neither encroaching upon private property nor on the public streets.” The authorities, it was contended, are to the same effect, while those relied on by the respondent belong to one or other of the following classes: 1st, They are cases in which it is not stated whether there was a Dean of Guild in the burgh or not, and in which no question of jurisdiction was raised: Or, 2d, They are cases in which there lay some personal exception to the Dean of Guild, as not being a suitable and disinterested judge.

Pleaded for the respondent.—

That the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, as now exercised, is entirely consuetudinal. No doubt he had originally a statutory jurisdiction by 1593, c. 180, in certain mercantile and maritime cases, but that has long since gone into desuetude, and been entirely lost. He is more properly an executive officer charged with the duty of enforcing the regulations of a certain department of police, than a judge appointed to hear and determine disputes relating to private and individual rights and interests. In this respect, his powers and duties are similar to those of the Roman edile. At the same time, it is not denied that, independently of his edile powers, he has been also in the use of exercising a jurisdiction in certain matters of private right. Thus, where a private individual is about to erect a new building, or to pull down an old one, or to make serious repairs or alterations on any existing erection, it has been the practice, before commencing such operations, to apply for the necessary warrant and authority to the Dean of Guild. And if the respondent, in his application to the Magistrates, had asked for any warrant of lining betwixt his and the advocator's subjects, or had he asked for a warrant of building, or of pulling down, or of altering, or of repairing, or, in short, if he had asked for a warrant of any description, whereby and in virtue of which his own or his neighbour's state of possession could be inverted or affected, it might perhaps have been contended that he was bound to apply to the Dean of Guild. But truly he applied for no warrant; all he asked and obtained, was a judgment to the effect that the advocator was not entitled to proceed with his unwarranted operations, and was bound to restore the state of possession to what it was before these operations had been commenced. In a matter so purely possessory, the court of the judge ordinary, that is, the ordinary Bailie Court within burgh, was the proper court in which to apply for redress. At any rate, the Dean of Guild has no privative or exclusive jurisdiction in such a question as the present, and it was equally competent for the respondent to apply to the Magistrates in their ordinary Bailie Court. The Dean of Guild is himself just one of the Magistrates of a burgh, elected along with the others, and having certain duties allotted to him. The inherent and radical power, however, is in the Magistrates generally. Accordingly, the ancient brieve of lining was directed, not to the Dean of Guild, but generally to the provost and bailies of the burgh. In the case of the Magistrates of Stirling v. the Sheriff-depute of Stirlingshire, where it was decided that the Dean of Guild had a jurisdiction in questions of neighbourhood within burgh, exclusive of the Sheriff, the action of declarator was brought, not at the instance of the Dean of Guild alone, but at the instance of the Dean of Guild, Magistrates, and Council generally of the burgh. From the report it would appear that the action concluded to have it declared, not that the jurisdiction pertained to the Dean of Guild alone, but to the pursuers generally, "and their successors in office;" and so accordingly the Lords found. From the reported cases, it will be found that such questions have been indiscriminately brought in the Dean of Guild Court, in the Court of Session, in the ordinary Burgh or Bailie Court, and in the Sheriff Court; and were it otherwise, it would lead to very singular results; for it is matter of notoriety that in several of the burghs—for example, in the important burgh of Dumfries—no Dean of Guild Court has ever been known to exist. Neither the Sheriff nor the Magistrates can determine a question of heritable right or property, but they are competent to regulate the interim possession. On the same principle, and assuming that the Dean of Guild can alone grant a warrant for building or pulling down, repairing or altering, that can never derogate from the power of the Magistrates, in their ordinary Burgh Court, to stop operations which have been commenced without a warrant, and to ordain that the state of possession shall not be inverted or illegally encroached on.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"8th June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the revised minutes of debate in the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of Dundee, in the process now under advocacy,—in respect of the importance and general application of the question in practice in the different burghs in Scotland, in which there are Dean of Guild Courts established—Makes avizandum with the case to the Lords of the Second Division, and appoints printed copies of the revised minutes, original petition to the Magistrates, and of the record in the Inferior Court, and of the principal interlocutor of the Magistrates under advocacy, dated 13th May 1840, to be printed and boxed quam primum, in order that the case may be reported.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has taken this case to report, in order that the opinion of the Court may be obtained as speedily as possible on a question of great importance in practice. It relates to the competency of instituting and carrying on actions relative to the proper boundary and position of party-walls in houses in the course of rebuilding within burgh, before the Court of the Magistrates, when there is a Dean of Guild, to whose jurisdiction questions of this sort are generally held exclusively to belong.

"In the process in which the present question occurs, there has been a proof, and a most voluminous litigation before the Magistrates of Dundee; but, of course, if the Court be incompetent, all this must go for nothing. As the Lord Ordinary, therefore, entertained very serious doubts of the jurisdiction of the Magistrates in cases of this description, and was apprehensive that the parties might be turned round on this objection, even at a later stage of the proceedings, he thought it most expedient for all interested to have the competency of the original action ascertained before further expense is incurred in discussing the merits in this Court. He accordingly directed the question of jurisdiction to be argued in minutes, which are now submitted to the consideration of the Court.

"The revised minutes present a brief but very clear and satisfactory exposition of the authorities applicable to the point at issue. From the first, the Lord Ordinary has had a strong impression, that if Deans of Guild have any peculiar or privative jurisdiction at all, a question such as that now at issue must belong to that Court. The sole question here was, whether the defender (advocator) was entitled to pull down and rebuild, in a certain form, a gable between his own premises and that of his neighbour, the pursuer. Now, though there are many cases in which the line of distinction between questions peculiar to the Court of the Magistrates and that of the Dean of Guild, may be but slenderly marked, yet the present cannot be viewed as a case of that nature. If the Dean of Guild has any peculiar jurisdiction at all over buildings within burgh, it seems difficult to suppose, a priori, that the present should not fall within it.

"The foundation and origin of that jurisdiction are not very clearly traced. Lord Stair does not allude to it; but almost from the time of his Lordship downwards, the books are filled with cases showing that all new buildings within burgh, and alleged encroachments thereon, are peculiar to the Dean of Guild Court in towns where there is such a Magistrate. The Act 1698, c. 8, restraining the height of houses in Edinburgh, refers to the Dean of Guild as the only Magistrate in use to grant warrants for buildings; and the authority of Bankton and Erskine, quoted in the papers, is explicit to the same effect.

"There is no doubt some apparent fluctuation or conflict in the authorities, which will be found to arise from one or other of the following circumstances:—1st, In many burghs of Scotland there is no Dean of Guild, and that accounts for the decisions in the cases of Kirkcudbright and Nairn, referred to in the revised cases. 2d, In other burghs the Dean of Guild has by custom lost, apparently non utendo, his peculiar jurisdiction over buildings, and that may explain the decision in the late case from Ayr, quoted in the papers. In the report of the municipal commissioners on the burgh of Ayr in 1835, it was stated, that 'there is a Dean of Guild Court held occasionally within burgh, but it is not imperative on persons building within the town to apply for a warrant from the Dean of Guild; and it is only when disputes arise that a court is held.' 3d, In sundry cases, particularly in small burghs, the Dean of Guild has been disqualified, from an interest in the suit, from giving judgment. 4th, In questions occurring in extended royalties, such as in those relative to operations in St James' Square and West Maitland Street of Edinburgh, the Sheriff's jurisdiction, from the nature of the annexation, is not excluded. Accordingly, in the present case, from the clause in the Statute annexing the district in which the advocator's property is situated to the royalty, the previous jurisdiction of the Sheriff was undoubtedly reserved (see clause in minute for Charles Melville, p. 18), though the ordinary Magistrates could not claim any, unless they would have possessed it in a similar cause within the ancient royalty. Lastly, In a few cases the objection to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates seems to have been waived or overlooked per incuriam.

"Apart from these peculiarities, the great bulk of our authorities, for above 150 years, do, it is thought, very clearly establish that all questions as to the right erection of buildings and boundary-walls within burgh are peculiar to the Dean of Guild. It is sufficient to refer to the cases reported in the Dictionary under the head of 'Jurisdiction' of Dean of Guild, 'Property,' and 'Public Police.' In addition to the cases quoted in the minutes, reference may be made to the early cases of Wilson in 1688, and Hall in 1698, reported in the Dictionary voce 'Property,' p. 12,775, to show that the Dean of Guild was the Magistrate to whom such questions as the present were there held appropriate.

"It deserves consideration, however, whether there be any weight in the specialty founded on by the pursuer in support of his action—that the complaint here was to enforce a previous decree of the Magistrates respecting the gable in dispute. But if the objection now raised to the jurisdiction be well founded, the same doubt would occur as to the competency of the former process before the Magistrates which has been urged against the present action. Again, if the decree of the Magistrates in the first suit was entitled to effect, it may be questioned if it should not have been produced in a complaint to the Dean of Guild, and his interference demanded to enforce the erection of the gable, in conformity with the rights of parties, as ascertained by the prior decree, if that was pronounced in a competent process.

"The Act annexing the territory in which the buildings are situated to the burgh of Dundee certainly provides specially, 'that nothing herein contained shall be construed to compel any party or parties to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for leave to make alterations on property within the annexed territory.' That enactment clearly exempts parties in the extended royalty of Dundee from the necessity of applying for warrants, if they keep strictly within their own boundaries, and that clause of the Statute also may meet a part of the complaint of the pursuer against the advocate, that he commenced operations here without a warrant; but it conferred no new jurisdiction on the ordinary Magistrates of the burgh, and did not authorise an application to a different jurisdiction than the Dean of Guild, if any neighbour thought the party proceeding to build without warrant was erecting a wrong wall beyond his own boundary. As the Dean of Guild would have been the only burghal Magistrate competent to take up such a complaint in the ancient royalty, the Lord Ordinary does not at present see on what ground or authority the other Magistrates acquired any jurisdiction over such cases in the extended royalty."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—This is a question of jurisdiction, as to whether the application by the respondent was properly made to the Magistrates of Dundee, or ought not rather to have been made to the Dean of Guild. By the 6th section of the Act passed for extending the royalty of Dundee, the same powers are conferred upon the Magistrates and Council over the enlarged territory, as they had exercised over the ancient burgh. But the 7th section provides, that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, whose powers were extended along with those of the Magistrates and Council, he himself being one of their number, should not be privative against those of the Sheriff. In 1837, Milne takes down a gable said to be mutual; the continuous proprietor presents an application to the Bailie Court, and obtains decree ordaining Milne to restore the gable as it was, and a remit is made to the superintendent of public works to see this carried into effect. The interlocutor seems to have been misunderstood; and on a second application by the respondent, the remit was recalled, and the decret on the first process pronounced. Melville, conceiving that the advocate was proceeding in defiance of the judgment of the Court, presented a second petition with the view of having it determined whether Milne had obeyed the former decret. Milne said he had acquiesced; but the result was the pronouncing the interlocutor under review. The advocate says that he was entitled to proceed with his alterations, in terms of the 7th section of the Act, without applying to the Dean of Guild for a warrant; and no doubt he might if he did not interfere with the property of his neighbour; but he could not touch a mutual gable without an application to the proper authorities. If he had made such an application, then the respondent would have had an opportunity of answering, and any difference would have been settled before the operations began. A good deal of discussion is introduced into the respondent's minute, as to the origin of the office of Dean of Guild. Questions of this sort formed no part of his original jurisdiction. By the Act 1593, c. 180, he was constituted judge "in all actions and matters concerning merchands; betuixt merchand and merchand, and betuixt merchand and mariner, quibilk actions aught not nor suld not byde delay; Bot be expedie be the Deane of Gild and his counceill summarilie, as men chosen and appoynted zierlie be the counceill of the burgh, maist apt and able to judge and decerne in all actiones concerning merchandes, as said is." The Act 1594 gives power to the Provost and Bailies to order the repair of decayed lands within burgh, "be ane condigne inquest of the neighbours thereof;" and the Act 1663, c. 6, anent ruinous houses in royal burghs, ordained the Provost and Bailies of the burgh to cause warn and charge all persons having right to buildings that have been waste three years, build or repair them within year and day thereafter, or else to sell them to others. The only mention made of the Dean of Guild in this Statute is, that purchasers of houses sold under the Act, and the owners of which were absent or unknown, are required to consign the price in the hands of the Provost, one of the Bailies or Dean of Guild. The brief of line was not addressed to the Dean of Guild, but to the Magistrates and Council; and in the case of Lermont, 1673, the power of the Council of Edinburgh to grant liberty to a proprietor to oversailzie his close, and cast a trans over it, was recognised. While I think that the Dean of Guild must take care that buildings within burgh be according to law, I don't think his powers can be extended farther. Erskine says:—"It belongs to the Dean of Guild to take care that buildings within the borough be agreeable to law, neither encroaching on private property, nor on the public streets or passages; and that houses in danger of falling be thrown down." These appear to be merely police regulations. As to the eaves-drop, in order to show that it is a branch of majesterial functions, where there is no Dean of Guild, Erskine says,—where it is not fixed by usage, the Dean of Guild, or other Magistrate who is charged with the police, appears to be trusted with a discretionary power of directing the buildings within burgh, subject to the review of the Court of Session. The only privative jurisdiction which I conceive the Dean of Guild enjoys, is the giving out judges and warrants. In none of the cases quoted was the objection taken to an application to the Bailie Court. In the late case of Alexander v. Cooper, 16th December 1840, the interdict was applied for from the Sheriff; and it was pleaded that the Dean of Guild was the only competent Judge; but this plea was repelled. The question here is, whether, the advocate at his own hand having proceeded to pull down a mutual gable, the respondent was excluded from applying for redress to the Burgh Court? Where such a wrong is done, I think it is not incompetent to apply either to this Court or to the Burgh Court; and I know of no case deciding that the Dean of Guild alone could give redress.

Lord Meadowbank concurred.

Lord Moncreiff.—I regret there should be a difference of opinion among us in this case; but after repeated consideration of it, I have come to be of the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, that there was no jurisdiction in the Bailie Court to entertain the application of the respondent. The point raised is, whether in the burgh of Dundee, where there is a Dean of Guild, the Magistrates can entertain such a question? In the first place, had they jurisdiction in the old royalty? In the second place, if they had not, does the Act extending the royalty give them jurisdiction over the annexed territory? As to the first question, I regret that the objection should have arisen in this form; but although it was not taken in the Inferior-court, now that it has arisen, I must say it is one of very great importance indeed. In the present state of the law, it is said that the Dean of Guild has no exclusive jurisdiction, except as to the giving out of judges and warrants. But on what authority does his privative jurisdiction in these matters rest, except upon consuetudinary law? The authorities go to prove that he has not only privative jurisdiction in warrants, but in the subject-matter of these warrants. Lord Mackenzie says in the case of Donaldson, that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is peculiar, and exclusive of other inferior magistrates in cases which fall under it. It relates, he adds, to questions of neighbourhood. Bankton says, this Court has likewise the sole jurisdiction in regulating buildings within borrows, whether in repairing, or taking down and rebuilding old buildings, or erecting new ones. They are to take care that the streets and passages of borrows be not thereby prejudiced or obstructed, nor the property of neighbouring heritors encroached upon. In these passages, the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction is described as peculiar, not with reference to the application for warrants only, but to the subject-matter of them also; and he may entertain complaints even against parties doing things without any warrant. The jurisdiction of the judge ordinary is talked of; but by the case of Stewart, the Dean of Guild was found to be judge ordinary in this matter. The interlocutor in that case, while it dismisses the action, "reserves to the pursuer to ascertain his rights in the tenement in question in the Court of the Dean of Guild as judge ordinary, according to the rules of law." This jurisdiction is not of very ancient standing, and in Stair's time did not exist,—hence the Burgh Court is necessarily spoken of when claiming jurisdiction as against the Sheriff; but the matter here is within burgh; and the question is, is not the Dean of Guild Court the proper Burgh Court for entertaining such applications? If, at the present day, such a petition were presented to the Magistrates of Edinburgh, they would say, go to the Dean of Guild, through whom we act. Questions have arisen between burghs and the Sheriff, as in the case of Stirling; but that was a very peculiar case. The Magistrates, the Town-council and Dean of Guild all came forward to vindicate their authority in the declarator, and the decree necessarily bore, that the power was in the Magistrates, Town-council and Dean of Guild; but it did not touch their authority among themselves. On this general ground I see no difficulty. If there be no peculiar jurisdiction in the Dean of Guild within burgh, then this is decisive; but I always understood that the reverse was the law. The case of Ayr settles nothing in a question between the Dean of Guild and the burgh. The application there was made to the Sheriff, and no objection was taken to his jurisdiction. Here the question arises as to the foundation of a party-wall, and is peculiarly under the cognisance of the Dean of Guild: it is a possessory process. The applying or not applying for a warrant cannot alter the jurisdiction: the subject-matter settles the jurisdiction. I come now to inquire, whether the Act of Parliament makes any difference in this case from the general law? The Act, in my opinion, confirms the general law, and leaves the matter entire. The 6th section—(quotes)—gives jurisdiction to the Magistrates, including the Dean of Guild, over the enlarged territory, as ample and in like manner as possessed by them within the ancient royalty, subject only to the provision in the 7th section, that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild over the territory annexed shall not be privative, or exclusive of the jurisdiction of any court of law now competent to exercise jurisdiction over the same. Is there not an implication here,—nay, is there not a declaration that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild was privative within the ancient royalty, and would have been so over the extended, but for this exception in favour of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff and others, to which alone it relates? This confirms his privative jurisdiction over every other but what was then existing over the territory annexed: "And nothing herein contained shall be construed to compel any party to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for leave to make alterations on property within the annexed territory, or for any other object or purpose connected with the same." Is it not implied by this, that the Dean of Guild had exclusive jurisdiction for other purposes than mere buildings; and is not the clause inserted in order that even in these his jurisdiction should not be exclusive of the Sheriff? If we had his jurisdiction privative against the Magistrates within the ancient royalty, can we so construe this clause as to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Magistrates in the annexed territory?

The whole clause assumes the privative jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild; and it was to prevent this in the extended royalty that the clause was inserted.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have again considered the opinion I had formed, and I lay aside entirely the Statute, which leaves things just as they were as to the state of the law within burgh. I shall only add, that upon the general question I agree with the opinion of Lord Medwyn.

The Court repelled the objection to the jurisdiction, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, reserving the claim for expenses till the issue of the cause.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 31.—ROBERT HENDERSON ROBERTSON and MANDATORY, Pursuers, v. JOHN RUTHERFORD, Defender.

Sale—Title—Reservations and Restrictions.—The proprietor of several feus disposed of them by a missive of sale, without specifying that his title contained a reservation of mines and minerals in favour of the superior, and also certain restrictions as to the kind of buildings to be erected on part of the ground.—Held that the purchaser was not bound to take the subjects with these restrictions.

Process—Record, Opening of.—After avizandum had been made with the debate, it was stated that the buyer actually knew of the existing limitations of the title at the time of the sale, but no such averment was on the record. On a reclaiming note, a minute was allowed to be lodged before answer, specifying what was averred and offered to be proved in support of the statement, in the view of opening up the record.

Vide ante, Vol. XII. p. 672. In obedience to the interlocutor pronounced on the 18th July 1840, the pursuer produced his titles, when it was found that they contained the following reservations and restrictions:

"Reserving always to me," (viz., Mr Hunt of Pittencrief, the superior,) "and my heirs and successors, the whole coal, and all other mines and minerals under the ground of the said lands, and full power to work, win, and away-carry the same at pleasure; and to make waggon or other roads, sink pits, drive levels, and do every thing necessary for the good of the same; upon payment of the feuar's damage above ground, at the sight of two neutral men to be mutually chosen," &c. "Declaring that the said John Kinnell" (viz., the original feuar) "and his aforesaid, shall not have on the front of the said feu any buildings whatever, other than dwelling-houses alienary; which, except the necessary entries, shall occupy the whole front, and shall be built in a straight line with the front of those already built on the line of street on which this piece of ground is situated: Nor shall the said John Kinnell, or his foresaids, be at liberty to erect, or have any nuisance whatever on said piece of ground," &c.

On the 18th March 1841, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, Sustains the fourth defence, viz., that the pursuer is not the owner of the subject sold, and cannot give a title to it; assoliszes the defender, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The objections taken by the defender to the title tendered by the pursuer, or rather, to the insufficiency of the title to convey the whole of the subjects sold, are, 1st, That the minerals do not belong to the seller: 2d, That the superior, by whom these minerals have been reserved, has a right to make roads, and to sink pits in the lands; 3dly, That there is restriction against building any thing but dwelling-houses along the front next the street. The facts on which these objections rest are admitted.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defender is not bound to take the subject with these restrictions; or in other words, that the only title which the pursuer can give, being one in which these restrictions are contained, does not convey the subject sold. There is no question here about any insignificant denomination of value, nor about the subject being affected by known burdens naturally attaching to it. The restrictions are essential; and not such as the purchaser was bound to be aware of. The only difficulty arises from the pursuer having offered 'my property,' and the offer being accepted in the same terms. But these words must be held to have been used only demonstratively, otherwise it must be held that the pursuer could have enforced payment of the price, whatever the restrictions might have been. There is no averment on the record that the defender knew of the existing limitations; and the price which he paid seems to render such knowledge improbable. But though the pursuer has no such averment in the record, he stated at the bar the day after avizandum had been made on the debate, that the defender did know of their existence. The Lord Ordinary put it to the defender, whether he would consent to the record being opened, but he refused; and whatever the Court may do, the Lord Ordinary does not think that, after a full debate and avizandum, he can totally change the complexion of the case by a compulsory alteration of the record."

The pursuer reclaimed, and prayed the Court

"to alter and recal the interlocutor complained of; to repel the defences which have lately been stated to the title of the pursuer to the property in question; or, at least, to allow the pursuer a proof that the defender was aware of the restrictions and reservations mentioned in the note of the Lord Ordinary, when he entered into the bargain libelled."

At advising on the 30th June 1841, the Lords, before answer, "Appoint the pursuer to lodge a minute, specifying what he avers and offers to prove in support of his statement, that the defender actually knew of the reservation of mines and minerals, with power to work the same; and also of the restrictions as to building contained in the pursuer's titles, when the defender purchased the property in question."

In terms of this interlocutor the pursuer lodged a minute, stating, that ever since Mr Hunt of Pittencrief, more than twenty-five years ago, began to feu out his lands in Dunfermline, he had uniformly inserted in all his feu-charters the same reservations and restrictions as those contained in the titles of the pursuer to the subject in dispute: That about one-third of the town of Dunfermline now stands on feus so acquired from Mr Hunt; and that the reservations and restrictions are as notorious in that place, as that certain parts of the town are held in burgage and not in feu: That, independent of the general notoriety, the defender had peculiar opportunities of knowing the terms of Mr Hunt's feus, in consequence of his late father having feued various pieces of ground from Mr Hunt: That in 1830 an action was raised as to the use of the water flowing through the subject in question, and the title-deeds of no fewer than thirty-seven of Mr Hunt's feuars were produced; and the defender took the chief charge and interest in the proceedings relative to the action: That the spinning-mill belonging to the defender, and situated on the same water, is held under the same tenure, and also the dwelling-house occupied by him: That before he set out for London in April 1839, the defender called on his agent, who happened also to be the agent for the pursuer, and inquired particularly as to whether the pursuer's title to the several feus was good and sufficient; and although the feu-duty, amounting to £31. 5s., was not mentioned in the missive of sale, no objection on that ground has been stated. In regard to the restriction as to any buildings except dwelling-houses being erected next the street, a wall had been built across the ground, separating that which was to be occupied for the use of the mill from that which was to be feued out for dwelling-houses, and it was plainly seen that no buildings for the accommodation of the mill could be extended to the street.

At advising of this date, the Court was unanimously of opinion that the facts and circumstances averred were not sufficient to bring home personal knowledge to the defender, and accordingly refused the reclaiming note, and adhered, with additional expenses.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 32.—ROBERT GENTLE, Nominal Raiser, v. GEORGE IZAT and ALEXANDER THOMSON, Claimants.

Bill of Exchange.—A competition between the drawer and acceptor of a bill for possession of the document, after payment by the acceptor, partly out of his own funds and partly out of a composition obtained from other bills ranked on the drawer's estate—decided in favour of the acceptor.

Bankrupt.—Sequestration.—Composition.—Observed, that after a composition has been carried through on the understanding that the debts were justly ranked, the bankrupt is not entitled to impugn the ranking on grounds which must have been known to him when the ranking was made.

George Izat, ship-owner, Kincardine, drew the following bill on his brother-in-law, Alexander Thomson, merchant in Leith :

"Kincardine, 17th July 1839.—£285 Sterling.—Two months after date, pay to my order at the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank in Liverpool, two hundred and eighty-five pounds Sterling value in account of shares in Manchester and Liverpool Bank."

Thomson accepted, and Izat discounted the bill with Mr Robert Gentle, agent at Kincardine for the Glasgow Union Banking Company. At this time Thomson was in the employment of Alexander Reid and Company, merchants, Leith, and the above bill, with many others on which Izat stood as drawer or acceptor, appears to have been for their accommodation. During the currency of the bill, the estates both of Izat and of Reid and Company were sequestrated. Previous to the sequestration, Reid and Company had indorsed to Thomson two bills, accepted to them by Izat,—the one for £360, and the other for £230. For these bills Thomson ranked as a creditor on Izat's estate. Izat at first objected to the ranking, but afterwards withdrew the objection, and wrote a letter expressly consenting to it. When the bill for £285 became due, Thomson was unable to retire it, and entered into an arrangement, by which he assigned to the Glasgow Union Bank the bills for £360 and £230, with his ranking on Izat's estate, and also twenty-eight shares of stock in the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank. The proceeds of these shares, amounting to £186 odds, and two dividends from Izat's estate, produced a sum, which, after paying the £285 bill, left a balance of £23. 1. 10. This balance was transmitted to Thomson's agent in Leith, but the bill still remained in Mr Gentle's possession. In these circumstances, Izat, after obtaining his discharge on a composition of 5s. per pound, brought a multiplepinding in Mr Gentle's name, and claimed 1st, "possession of the bill in question, to be retained by the claimant till he is fully indemnified by Mr Thomson for the foresaid payment made from the claimant's estate on account of the bill;" 2d, "payment of the said balance of £23. 1. 10. Sterling." He was afterwards allowed by the Lord Ordinary to alter his claim, by leaving out the words printed in italics, and substituting for them the following words,—"be enabled to follow out his claim of indemnification against Thomson or others."

Thomson claimed "that the bill for £285 be delivered up to him, and that the payment of £23. 1. 10., if still objected to, be sanctioned by the Court, at least that it be held as not competently questioned in this process." The object of the claimants was, to rank for the amount of the bill on Reid and Company's estate.

Izat pleaded—1. The acceptance in question not having been granted as an accommodation to the respondent, Mr Thomson's claim to it on that ground is altogether groundless. 2. This acceptance having been paid partly with funds drawn from the respondent's estate, while the acceptance was not intended or applied for the respondent's accommodation, the respondent ought, pro tanto, to be indemnified for such payment from his estate, and to have possession of the bill, in order to secure his indemnity. 3. Nothing has occurred in the respondent's sequestration inconsistent with this claim. 4. The nominal raiser is responsible for the sum of £23. 1. 10., and the respondent is entitled to payment of that sum in terms of his claim.

Thomson pleaded—1. The claimant's acceptance being an accommodation by him to the drawer, Mr Izat, and being now paid, ought to be delivered up to the claimant; and Mr Izat is not entitled to object to such delivery. 2. The claimant's acceptance being paid with funds provided by the claimant, and assigned to the bank for that purpose, ought now to be delivered up to the claimant. 3. The claimant being regularly ranked as a creditor on Mr Izat's estate, and Mr Izat's composition and discharge having been carried through on that footing, Mr Izat cannot now maintain any plea inconsistent with that ranking. 4. The composition from Mr Izat's estate on the two bills for £230 and £360, being drawn by the bank as assignees of the claimant, Mr Thomson, and applied by the bank, as directed by their assignation, in extinction of the bill for £285 then in its hands, the payment by Mr Thomson's debtor must be held equivalent to payment by the cedent himself, and the bill must be held to be virtually in Mr Thomson's possession, and any claim competent to Mr Izat would fall to be made not by way of reclaiming the bill itself, but of the sums drawn under the composition-contract. 5. The sum of £23. 1s. 10d. not being in the hands of the nominal raiser, cannot be the subject of competition in this process; and that sum has been properly paid to a person for behoof of the claimant.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"3d July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, allows the claimant, George Izat, to put upon the record a restriction of his claim as suggested by the Lord Ordinary, and in which this claimant expressed his acquiescence at the bar; and prefers the claim of the said George Izat as thus restricted, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses, under deduction of any extra expense which the opposite party can show to have been occasioned by the claim not having been sooner restricted; and remits the claimant Izat's account of expenses, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary thinks it right to say, that at present he cannot imagine what extra expense has been produced. Nothing was offered by the competing claimant at all."

Thomson reclaimed. At advising, the claim to the balance of the bill was reserved, and Izat offered still farther to restrict his claim, by confining it to the delivery of the bill, "till he is enabled to follow out his claim of indemnification against others," leaving out the words "against Thomson."

Lord President.—I think we ought not to accede to this limitation, but that we ought to alter the interlocutor, and prefer Mr Thomson. Here he accepts a bill for £285, and pays it by the sale of certain bank shares, his own property, and the composition paid by two bills, of which Izat was the acceptor. Izat expressly consented to the ranking of these two bills on his estate, and thus pledged himself to the Court and the public that they constituted just claims on his estate. The composition-contract was carried through on this understanding, and Izat cannot now be listened to when he seeks to impugn it. In the same way he might impugn all the claims ranked on his estate, and give a different complexion altogether to the state of his affairs, after having induced his creditors, on the faith of its accuracy, to accept of a composition of 5s. per pound. This would never do. We must hold that the ranking was good, and that Izat was truly debtor in the sum drawn by means of it from his estate. At all events, before he can claim delivery of the bill, he is bound to repay Thomson the £186 which he paid to account of the bill from his own property in bank shares. As to the effect of the ranking of the bill on the estate of Reid and Company, we cannot now decide; but I am quite clear that the ipsum corpus of the bill belongs to Thomson.

Lord Gillies.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, and nearly on the same grounds. If Izat's statement is true, Reid and Company were the true debtors in the bills ranked on his estate. It is true that, by accepting them, he was legally responsible, but after paying them, he was entitled to go against Reid and Company for the whole amount. Now, why was not this fact stated by Izat to his creditors? Instead of stating it, he writes a letter expressly consenting to the ranking of these bills on his estate. Was this fair to the creditors? The sum might have been of an amount that would seriously have affected the ranking, and shown that the composition was far short of what the creditors were entitled to receive. This attempt of Izat to deny the fairness of the ranking, cannot now receive any countenance. If he wishes to obtain delivery of the bill, let him first pay the proportion of it which Thomson actually paid out of his own bank shares, and then rank on Reid and Company's estate for the whole amount. What the effect of that ranking may be we are not now called upon to decide.

Lord Mackenzie.—I take the same view. Thomson appears to have paid the bill partly out of his own funds and partly out of a composition drawn from Izat's estate. This composition was drawn by virtue of two bills in which Izat was acceptor. This plainly and distinctly implies that Izat was the debtor in these bills. If he was not the debtor, why did he allow them to be ranked? If they were merely assigned in security of Thomson's debt, why were they ranked on Izat's estate as he were the proper debtor? We cannot open up that question now. Thomson has in this way paid the bill, and is entitled to possession of it. Whatever he may be able to make of it, or what effect it will have if he claims upon it on Reid's estate, and in a competition with Izat, is a different question, which we are not called upon to decide. In certain supposable states of the facts, very difficult questions may arise; but with these we have nothing to do at present. All we are called upon to decide is, whether Thomson is entitled to delivery of the bill; and I think he is.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. If Thomson has paid the bill, he is clearly entitled to delivery of it. We must here hold that he has paid it. The payment was made partly out of his own funds, and partly out of Izat's estate, as a composition on bills in which Izat stood acceptor, and must be presumed to be debtor. It was said that Thomson was bound to indemnify Izat for the amount drawn from his estate; but this point is now given up, for an offer is made to withdraw this claim of indemnification. Holding, then, that the payment made from Izat's estate is a good payment, there is nothing farther in the cause; for it is quite clear that the only pretext for raising the process of multiplepoinding was to make out a claim against Thomson. As to the effect of ranking the bill on Reid's estate, there is nothing in the record concerning it, and of course it is impossible for us to go into it.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against: Find that the claimant, Alexander Thomson, is entitled to the possession of said bill for £285, and prefer him thereto accordingly, and decern: Find the claimant, George Izat, liable in expenses, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 33.—WILLIAM BERRY, Pursuer, v. JAMES WILSON, Defender.

Process.—Jury Trial.—Application of Verdict.—Salmon-fishing.—It being found by the verdict of a jury, that A was possessed of the right of fishing for salmon, mooring the boats, and drawing the nets employed therein, "on or opposite, or adjacent to the lands of B," and that B had executed certain operations whereby the exercise of said rights was obstructed—Held that the issues and the verdict were conclusive as to the measure of the right, and that the operations must be altered or done away, so far as they cause any obstruction to the right of fishing and accessories thereof, as established by the general terms of the verdict.

Servitude.—Road.—Foot-Road, Public.—It being found that a foot-path between two public points, through the property of B and others, had been wrongfully shut up—Held that it must be again opened; that the right was in the land, and could not be limited in any part of the way to a passage along the top of a sea-wall.—Opinion, That it was within the powers of the Court to shift a public foot-road, if, when so altered, it was equally good and in the original line.

Process.—Jury Trial.—Application of Verdict.—Servitude.—Road.—It being found that A had "possessed or used a cart-road" through the lands of B, to a certain point—Held, in respect of the special terms of the verdict, that this was a private road, and subject to the regulation of the Court, and that A's right was sufficiently secured by a new turnpike-road, and a road from thence to the termination of the original road,—the new line being not more than twenty-two yards round.

The nature of the subject of dispute between the pursuer and defender, and the rights sought to be found and declared, will sufficiently appear from the following issues in the cause:

"It being admitted that the pursuer is proprietor of the lands of Tayfield, and also proprietor of the lands of Causewayhead, formerly the property of Robert Dalglish of Scotsraig, with the right of a salmon-fishing called Greenside, in the river or frith of Tay:

"1. Whether the pursuer, and his predecessors and authors, proprietors of the said salmon-fishing, have, for forty years and upwards, or for time immemorial, in the exercise thereof, been in the possession of the right of fishing for salmon, mooring their boats, and drawing their nets employed therein, on or opposite, or adjacent to the lands of Craighead, the property of the defender; and whether, during the years 1832 and 1833, or either of them, the defender executed certain operations on or near his said property, whereby the pursuer was obstructed or impeded in the exercise of his said rights, or any of them, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

"It being admitted that a foot-road existed from Newport to Ferry-port-on-Craig, through the property of the defender and others:

"2. Whether, during the said years 1832 and 1833, or either of them, the defender wrongfully shut up or obstructed the said foot-road, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

"3. Whether, for forty years and upwards, or for time immemorial, prior to the year 1832, the pursuer, or his predecessors and authors, have possessed or used a cart-road from Newport, through the said lands of the defender, to a point opposite Dryburghhole; and whether, during the said years 1832 or 1833, or either of them, the defender wrongfully shut up or obstructed the said cart-road, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Or,

"Whether the pursuer, or his authors, consented to, or acquiesced in the said operations on or near the said property of the defender?

"Whether the pursuer consented to, or acquiesced in the shutting up of the said cart-road and foot-road, or either of them?

" Damages laid at £500."

The jury returned the following verdict:

" 14th July 1838.—Find for the pursuer upon the whole issues, but find no damages due."

On the 29th February 1839, the Court disallowed a bill of exception presented by the defender, and also discharged the rule formerly granted to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted. Subsequently the verdict was applied, and a remit made to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause. On the 15th June 1839, he pronounced the following interlocutor:

" The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the remit from the Inner-House, before answer remits to Mr George Buchanan, civil-engineer in Edinburgh, to visit the subjects in dispute, and to report to the Lord Ordinary quam primum, in what manner the verdict of the jury ought to be carried into effect, with the least prejudice to the rights and lawful interests of the parties respectively; with power to him to hear the parties, and to call for such evidence as he may consider necessary."

From the testimony of the witnesses adduced and examined before him by the parties, Mr Buchanan reported that the pursuer's rights were only exercised at two points or stations on the shore, viz., Drybraehole, which is a high-water, and Craighead Rock, which is a low-water station. And proceeding upon this assumption, he proposed that at Drybraehole, either the wall erected by the defender should be levelled to the extent of eighteen yards, so as to admit of the nets being drawn, and the boats hauled up and moored, or that a bulwark should be constructed in the form of an inclined plane, and which would serve as a slip or shott for drawing and drying the nets, and mooring the boats. The second station at Craighead Rock, he reported, was noways affected by the defender's operations, but Craighead Bay, to the westward of the defender's house, had been used for mooring the boats. As the defender, however, offered to clear out the ground at Drybraehole, and make it equally convenient with Craighead for the launching of the boats and drawing them up; and as the situation is in other respects eligible, he was of opinion that if this were done, there would be no occasion for another station at Craighead. Should it be found, however, by the Court, that independent of these circumstances, the pursuer has still a right, from former usage, to a mooring station here; it would be necessary, in order to give effect to that finding, to lower in some degree about twelve yards of the sea-wall, so that the boats might be easily hauled over it, and then to set apart a space of twelve yards long by six yards wide, for mooring the boats and drying the nets. In regard to the foot and cart-roads, he proposed to take advantage of the turnpike-road from Newport to Ferry-port-on-Craig, as far as it is available, and forming, as proposed by the defender, a new road from this to the station at Drybraehole. Should the station at Drybraehole, he concludes,

" be found a sufficient mooring place, so as to render the one at Craighead unnecessary, then there is no occasion for any further access along the shore than this road to Drybraehole. But should it be held that a mooring station is required at Craighead, then an additional access will be necessary for it; and I am of opinion that a foot-path is quite sufficient, and that it may go either along the top of the defender's wall, westwards to his west march, where it joins the pursuer's property, or it may go up the bank along the present road, from the house to the turnpike. In regard to the obtaining of access to the shore as formerly at all points, this could not be done without demolishing the defender's walls, and otherwise throwing back the property into its original waste state; and I do not consider this to be necessary for the interests of the fishing, nor consistent with the terms of the remit."

A note of objections having been lodged by the pursuer to Mr Buchanan's report, a remit of new was made to him by the Lord Ordinary; and from his second report it appeared, that the access to Craighead, which he proposed should be by a foot-path along the top of the defender's walls, would not be very convenient, owing to the steepness of the rocks at Kempstane, and would not be passable at or near high-water.

The pursuer objected to this second report also, on the ground,—1st, As unjustly, in the face of the verdict, the rights of the pursuer, and practice, restricting the pursuer's right of fishing to two places only, in place of giving effect to that right as general, opposite the whole lands in question; and, 2d, As unjustly limiting the right of road along the coast, and excluding the pursuer, in the face of the right established by the verdict, from access along the coast, for the purposes of fishing, and for other lawful and necessary purposes.

" 22d June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties on the pursuer's objections to the second or supplementary report of George Buchanan, civil-engineer, and having resumed consideration thereof, and also of the original report of the said George Buchanan, with the objections thereto, productions and whole process,—Repels the whole of the objections to both or either of the said reports, and approves of the general tenor thereof, in all their articles and heads; and finds, in conformity therewith, that the pursuer is not entitled to any other cart or foot-road through the lands of the defender than is there provided or pointed out, nor to break through or level down any part of the said defender's sea-dyke or other enclosures, except as is therein allowed or directed, and herein-after provided: But finds, 1mo, That besides the particular stations at Drybraehole and Craighead Rock, the pursuer is entitled to carry on his fishings in Craighead Bay, or ex adverso of any other part of the defender's lands, in which he may find it eligible and possible to carry them on without farther interference with the enclosures, or grounds of the defender, than that to which he is hereby restricted: Finds, 2do, That he is entitled, if he shall require it, to have a place provided, at the expense of the defender, for hauling up or mooring his fishing-boats, and for spreading or drying his nets, as near to the place formerly used for those purposes in the neighbourhood of the bothy, also formerly used by the fishermen, as can be arranged without serious inconvenience to the defender; and for this purpose, to have a part of the said defender's sea-wall taken or levelled down, as described at the bottom of page seven of the said original report: But finds that the pursuer is to have no right to the bothy originally used by his fishermen, or to any similar structure, or to any farther encroachment in this quarter, within the enclosures of the defender: Finds, 3tio, That the pursuer is entitled to choose which of the two plans for improving the fishing station at Drybraehole respectively, described at pages four and five of the said original report, and delineated on the sketches marked 1 and 2, therein inserted and referred to, he would prefer to have executed at the expense of the defender; and appoints him, within ten days from this date, to state in a short minute for which of them he makes his election: But finds that he is, in either case, entitled to have the cart-road delineated on the said sketch, No. 2, from the turnpike down to the shore, executed and provided for him at the expense of the said defender: Finds, 4to, That the pursuer is in like manner entitled to have access to the mooring station in the bay, and near the offices of the defender, by either of the lines of foot-road specified on the last page of the original report, and more particularly described at page of the second or supplementary report, which he may select or prefer, and appoints him to state his decision upon this point also in the minute above directed, to be given in by him in ten days from this date; and, before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may state what decernitures may be necessary to give effect to those findings, and also to be heard on the question of expenses."

The pursuer reclaimed, and prayed the Court to recal the interlocutor,

"and to find that the pursuer is entitled to have the cart-road leading along the top of the sea-braes through the defender's property to Drybraehole, and communicating with the foot-path towards Ferry-port-on-Craig, kept up along the line of the said sea-braes, in such manner as may be least inconvenient for the defender in the said line; further, to find that the pursuer is entitled to free right of access along the banks of the Tay, opposite to the defender's property, at all times of the tide, and to the necessary and proper use of the said banks for the purposes of his fishings in said river, and that not only for hauling up or mooring his fishing-boats, or spreading and drying his nets, as found by the interlocutor reclaimed against, but also for the purposes of carrying on his operations of fishing generally; and to that effect, to have the defender's embankments and obstructions removed, in so far as inconsistent with the exercise of these rights."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Parts of the case require special attention. The action is a declarator containing three conclusions: 1st, A right of free access along the banks of the river for the purposes of fishing: 2d, The use of the bank for the fishers; and, 3d, A cart-road and foot-path through the property of the defender. We must be guided by the issues; for two remarks are to be kept in view: 1st, That when the issues are fixed, and have a distinct meaning, it is incompetent to go back upon the record for the purpose of explaining them even at the trial: 5 W. and S. p. 384. In this case, therefore, we must take the issues as framed. 2d, After a verdict has been returned and applied, it is equally incompetent to look into the notes of the Judge, in order to limit or restrain the rights established by the verdict. If no bill of exceptions had been presented in this case, the Judge's notes could not have been called for, nor was he bound to preserve them. When the verdict is applied, the matter becomes final. A party may always ask for a verdict to define his rights in distinct terms, and this is different from a special verdict. That not being done, and the verdict subsisting, the rights of the pursuer must be taken on the issues and verdict. The first issue is, whether he had a right of salmon-fishing "on or opposite, or adjacent to the lands of the defender?" Here the issue is quite general, and the verdict is equally so. It was competent to the defender to have objected that the verdict affirmed too much; but that is now excluded, and there is no longer a question in law as to the extent and measure of the pursuer's right of fishing, for the verdict finds it without any limitation. In the second place, it finds that the operations executed by the defender, obstructed the exercise of fishing, and thereby affirmed their illegality. The interlocutor is correct, in so far as it finds that the pursuer may exercise his rights any where, ex adverso of the lands of the defender; but in so far as it places the exercising of them under restrictions, it is limiting the verdict. The third finding is inadmissible. The pursuer is entitled to have the station at Drybraehole cleared of all obstructions: nor can any of his rights be limited to that station merely, for the convenience of the defender. The defender made the alterations complained of at his own hand. The value of the fishing we cannot enter into, but it is a right which is entitled to be protected as much as the proprietor's land; and the use of the shore belongs as much to the pursuer as to the defender. In regard to the foot-road, the issue admits that a foot-road existed between two public points, and it is not said that it belongs to the defender. The only question put to the jury was, whether that road was wrongfully shut up? We must not confound the right of access to the banks, implied in a right of fishing, with this foot-road. It is not an accessory of the fishing, but a public foot-road, to which the defender had no right, and over which we have no control. It must therefore be left patent: Mercer and Reid, 1st February 1840. As to making it go over the defender's sea-wall, the right was on the bank; and if that gave way, the right was still in the land, and must be maintained on dry ground, safe for women and children. When passing a villa, the Court, in its discretion, might allow an artificial line, if patent and convenient. In regard to the cart-road, it is a private road, and probably only of use to the pursuer, as subservient to his right of fishing; but the issue does not so put it. The possession and use is quite general. Still it is a private road, and we have power to regulate it in such a way as to be least burdensome to the defender, while it preserves the pursuer's right of access to Drybraehole. This, I think, is sufficiently secured by the plan proposed in the interlocutor. I am therefore of opinion, that we must recal the interlocutor, and find that all obstructions to the pursuer's rights of fishing, the mooring of boats, and drawing of nets, must be removed; that the foot-path must be again opened along the banks; and remit to the Sheriff to see these findings carried into effect. Something was said about evidence having been led before the reporter, and its effects; but this could not preclude the pursuer from standing upon his rights as ascertained by the verdict.

Lord Medwyn.—I concur with your Lordship as to shutting up of the cart-road, and in so far must approve of the interlocutor. In regard to the foot-road, I think the pursuer entitled to one also; but I differ as to the nature of his right. I don't know, and it nowhere appears, that this was a foot-road common to the public. I look on it as a servitude; and if this is preserved to the pursuer, we are entitled to regulate it so as to be as little burdensome as possible to the proprietor. The other and more material point is, as to whether the verdict be the measure of the right, and we can look at nothing else, so that every obstruction must be removed. I confess I feel some doubts as to this view.

Lord Moncreiff.—I don't think I differ materially on the general principle stated. The issues and verdict must be taken as conclusive, but I am not so clear that we must not look at the summons, beyond which the verdict cannot go. First, in regard to the fishing, it is a right of property, but the drawing of nets and mooring boats is a servitude on the adjoining lands, in which the pursuer has no right of property. As to the extent of the right of fishing, if the fact be, that though the pursuer has had the right without limitation, yet if there are only certain points where he could exercise it,—if he gets that, he gets all he is entitled to; and it would be in emulationem vicini were he to pretend to keep other points open, where clearly he could do so to no profitable purpose. I don't agree with the interlocutor in restricting his right to draw nets only to Craig-head. As to the second issue,—if the foot-road means a public foot-path unconnected with the fishings, it is true that we cannot shut it up, but we may regulate it so as to be as little burdensome to the servient tenement as possible. We may shift it (Kilkerran), if we do it so as to be equally good, and in the line. As to the cart-road, I think the pursuer gets enough if he gets the road proposed in the report and interlocutor.

Lord Meadowbank.—I concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk in thinking the foot-path public, and not limited to the fishings; and I don't know any authority for holding that this Court can alter such a foot-path.

Lord Medwyn.—The summons concludes for the use of this foot-path as a servitude, for the use of the pursuer and his tenants, and the occupiers of his lands.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor complained of: Find that the obstruction caused to the right of fishing for salmon, with the right to moor boats, and draw nets on, opposite, or adjacent to the lands of the defender, by the operations of the defender, must be removed, and that these operations must be altered or done away, so far as they cause any obstruction to the right of fishing, and the accessories thereof, as established by the general terms of the verdict: Find that the foot-road from Newport to Ferry-port-on-Craig, which the verdict finds was wrongfully shut up, must be again opened, and cannot be limited, in any part of the way from Newport to Craighead Bay, to passage along the top of the sea-wall; and with these findings remit to the Sheriff of Fife to inspect the ground, and to report in what way he would propose to give full effect to the verdict of the jury, and this judgment of the Court, without regard to any other matter or procedure in the cause,—the said Sheriff to have in view, that the pursuer is entitled to have access at all times of the tide along the shore or rocks; and also that if such access from Craighead Bay to Drybraehole is made sufficient, safe, and convenient for foot passengers, on the outside of any bulwark or wall which the defender may construct, the same may form the foot-road along that part of the defender's grounds: Quoad ultra, find that the pursuer is entitled to have a cart-road from Newport to Drybraehole, through the defender's lands; but in respect of the special terms of the issue and verdict as to this road, Find that the pursuer's right is sufficiently provided for by the plan of a cart-road delineated on the sketch, No. 2, by Mr Buchanan, from the turnpike down to the shore, to be executed and provided for him at the expense of the defender; and having considered the reclaiming note for the defender, refuse the same."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 34.—MRS THOMAS WATMORE, Suspendor and Pursuer, v. THOMAS BURNS, Charger and Defender.

Arbitration—Judicial Reference—Process—Observed by a majority of the Court, that the award of a judicial referee has the privileges of a decree-arbitral, and cannot be opened up on the ground of error.

In conjoined processes of suspension and count and reckoning, after a protracted litigation it was agreed "to refer the whole points at issue between the parties to Thomas Scott, Esq., accountant in Edinburgh, suggested by the defender, reserving only the question of expenses to be decided by the Lord Ordinary or the Court." The Lord Ordinary "interponed his authority to the judicial reference contained in the within minute, and remitted to the judicial referee there named to consider the points at issue between the parties and to report." Before the report was lodged, Mrs Watmore's husband (the original pursuer) died, and an objection was taken, that in consequence of the death, the reference, like an arbitration, had fallen. This objection having been repelled both by the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House, the referee lodged his report, and the Lord Ordinary gave judgment in terms of it. Mrs Watmore reclaimed, on the ground that she had not been heard before the judgment was pronounced; and the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties "on the terms and import of the judicial award." Thereafter, his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor:

"17th July 1841.—Having heard counsel for the parties upon the terms and import of the judicial award, and having read and considered said award, of new interpones his authority to the award and report of the judicial referee; and in the process of suspension, in terms of said judicial award, finds the letters and charge orderly proceeded to the extent of £99. 9s. 11d. Sterling, being the balance found due to the charger by the judicial referee as at 11th November 1838, with interest from that date till payment, and decerns,—it being understood, that in terms of said report, the suspendor must relieve Mr Burns of his responsibility for the bond for £800, mentioned in said judicial award: And in process of count and reckoning, also in terms of said judicial award, assolisies the defender from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Farther, appoints parties to be ready to debate on the question of expenses at next calling, as reserved in the minute of reference, to be disposed of by the Lord Ordinary."

Mrs Watmore reclaimed, and prayed the Court to find "that the report of the accountant does not exhaust the reference, and is contrary to law." At the advising she pleaded in support of the note, that the defender having, for the alleged purpose of operating his relief, taken possession of a farm held in lease by her husband, he was liable, in terms of her first plea in law, "not only in the value of the lease," but also "in compensation for the loss of the profits of the farm." The referee, however, had refused to allow these profits, and had merely charged the defender with the estimated rent. By so doing he had failed either to exhaust the reference, or to decide according to law.

Lord President.—I can find no difficulty here. What objections are they which have been stated to the report of the referee? They are only to the merits. They regard the accuracy of the report. It is said he did not take this or that into view. But he did proceed, after the most deliberate consideration, to ascertain what was due to the defender in 1827,—to set against that the value of the lease, and to bring out in the defender's favour a balance of £99. I admit that this is an action of count and reckoning; but was there not a judicial reference of the action? The referee makes this report, and it is impeached on no other ground than the merits. I see no principle on which we can deal with the report in the way proposed by the pursuer. We cannot open it up. I therefore think that the interlocutor should be adhered to.

Lord Gillies.—I concur in the conclusion to which your Lordship has come, on this ground, that I do not think any sufficient objection has been stated to the report. But must we now treat this as a decree-arbitral? It is the report of a judicial referee. We cannot touch a decree-arbitral. It is different with a referee's report. A reference does not take the case out of Court. It is a mere step of process. But I think no sufficient objection has been stated to the report. I do not believe the claimer has sustained any loss by the course taken.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur with your Lordships. I doubt whether the objection, even if it could be competently entertained, is a good one. The summons does not conclude for the actual profits of the farm (this would have been very unreasonable), but for a sum for the loss of the profits. That is a reasonable conclusion, and I do not know that a calculation of a fair subrent is an improper mode of ascertaining what should have been the consideration. I see no room therefore for the objection. But suppose that the report is inaccurate in this respect, I do not think it can be opened up. There I differ from Lord Gillies. I think a judicial reference is an arbitration, and that the result of the award of the referee, though it may be in form different from a decree-arbitral, cannot be opened up on the ground of error. We cannot inquire into the referee's report as into that of an accountant, which we may correct in so far as in any way erroneous. Though the referee should have gone wrong on evidence of fact or in law, still his decision is final, provided it be upon the matter referred to him. Here the amount due by the one party or the other was referred, and I do not think we can open up the report.

Lord Gillies.—If it were an arbitration, it must have fallen by the death of the party.

Lord Mackenzie.—In that respect, indeed, it differs from an ordinary arbitration, for it is not essential to a submission that it shall fall by the death of the party; but it agrees in this, that the decree does not stand subject to the review of the Court.

I do not however think the objection a good one, even though it were competently stated.

Lord Fullerton.—I rather agree with Lord Mackenzie as to the effect of the report of a judicial referee. And indeed the question was so treated by the pursuer's counsel, who objected to the report only on the ground that it did not exhaust the reference. I see no foundation for the objection. For debiting the defender with the estimated annual value of the lease, is just the way which the reporter takes of extinguishing the balance in his favour. And I may remark that it is a fair enough way. The stocking of the farm is placed to the defender's debit, and I do not think the reporter could justly have found him liable in the whole profits of a farm which was cultivated with his own stock. It was right that he should take merely what was calculated to be a fair subrent. At any rate, this is not such an error as to entitle us to open up the report.

The Court adhered.

No. 35.—HENRY MONTEITH, Pursuer, v. JOHN PATTISON and OTHERS, Defenders.

Caution—Prescription, Septennial—Statute 1695, c. 5—A B, by his daughter's marriage-contract, conveyed certain heritable properties in name of tocher, in favour of certain trustees. The contract contained no obligation to infest, or precept of sasine, but the party bound himself forthwith to grant a valid disposition with all necessary clauses. Having failed to fulfil his obligation, an action at the instance of the trustees was raised against him for enforcing it, and inhibition was used on the dependence. Sequestration supervened; and the cautioners for payment of his composition, in consideration of the action and inhibition being discharged, became bound with him in a bond for the sum of £1830 Sterling as an equivalent for the value of the properties conveyed in the contract. The cautioners bound themselves in the bond "as cautioners, sureties, and full debtors with and for the said A B;" and it was provided, "that the said principal sum shall be payable within seven years after the term of Martinmas 1808, and at farthest, on the term of Martinmas 1815." No demand for payment was made until 1827; and in an action of declarator at the instance of the surviving trustee of one of the cautioners, it was found that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the septennial prescription.

The present action was brought by the pursuer, Mr Monteith, as surviving trustee of the late Robert Thomson, senior, of Glasgow, for the purpose of having it declared by decree of the Court, that a cautionary obligation, in which Mr Thomson was bound, has been extinguished by force of the septennial prescription.

The circumstances giving rise to the cautionary obligation in question are these:—

In the year 1803, John Pattison, junior, merchant in Glasgow, was married to Rebecca Monteith, daughter of John Monteith, manufacturer there. A marriage-contract was executed on 2d April 1803. By this contract, John Monteith, the father of the lady, conveyed, "in name of tocher to his said daughter," in favour of certain parties as trustees, certain heritable properties therein specially described. The purpose of the trust was, that the property should be held for the benefit of the spouses in liferent, and of their children in fee. The deed also provided as follows:

"And further, the said John Monteith hereby binds and obliges him, and his heirs and successors, to pay to the said Rebecca Monteith and John Pattison, junior, her promised husband, such a sum or sums of money as, with the value of the foresaid houses and cellars, which are hereby fixed and ascertained to be £1500 Sterling, shall be equal in amount and value to her just and equal share of the whole, or of the sum total of the sums and provisions made, given, and provided, or to be made, given, or provided by the said John Monteith, in favour of his daughters; that is to say, in case the said John Monteith shall make provisions in favour of five daughters, he shall make provision to the said Rebecca Monteith and her promised husband, equal to one-fifth part of the said whole provisions, and so in proportion, declaring that the provisions made by the said John Monteith in favour of the issue or husbands of any of his other daughters, shall be reckoned the same as made in favour of his daughters themselves; and further, declaring that in reckoning the amount of the said provisions, no interest shall be calculated on the foresaid sum of £1500 Sterling, or on any of the sums advanced by the said John Monteith, to or for any of his daughters during his own lifetime."

There was no obligation to infest, or precept of sasine, contained in this contract. But the deed declared, that "the said John Monteith obliges himself, his heirs and successors, forthwith to grant, execute, and deliver a valid, ample, and formal disposition of the premises, in the terms aforesaid, containing all clauses necessary and requisite."

Mr Monteith could not fulfil the obligation in the contract, to convey the houses themselves, in consequence of having granted prior rights to others. Accordingly, in 1804, the trustees under the marriage-contract raised an action against Mr Monteith, reciting the obligations undertaken by him in that contract, and concluding that he should be decerned and ordained to convey and make over in terms thereof, and failing his doing so,

"either to make payment to the said trustees of the sum which had been fixed and ascertained to be the worth and value of the said subjects, to be laid out by them on good and sufficient heritable property, for the purposes of the trust, or to lay out and invest the sum himself in such heritable property, at the sight and to the satisfaction of the said trustees, in whose names the titles thereto should be made up and taken in trust for the purposes therein specified."

On the dependence of this action the trustees used inhibition, which was completed on 18th September 1804. In 1807, Mr Monteith found it necessary to apply for sequestration of his estates; and in the course of the same year he was discharged under a composition-contract for 7s. 6d. in the pound. The pursuer and Mr Thomson became cautioners for the payment of the composition.

The trustees under the marriage-contract neither demanded nor received payment of any of the instalments, but trusted to their security. The last instalment under the composition-contract became due on 22d October 1808; and the composition being thus paid, it was proposed to arrange the claim, and get rid of the action and diligence of the defenders. The result was the granting of the bond which is the subject-matter of the present action. It is dated 8th December 1808, and is for the sum of £1830, viz., the sum of £1500, fixed by the marriage-contract as the value of the houses undertaken to be conveyed, and interest thereon to Whitsunday 1807, deducting the terms' rents which had been drawn by the defender. The bond begins by narrating the marriage-contract of 1803, and the circumstance of an action having been raised for enforcing the contract, and of inhibition having been used on the dependence of that action,—both of which it was provided were now to be discharged. The obligatory clause was as follows:

“Therefore I, John Monteith, as principal, and we, Henry Monteith of Monkland, and Robert Thomson, senior, manufacturer in Glasgow, as cautioners, sureties, and full debtors with and for the said John Monteith, have bound and obliged us, as we hereby do bind and oblige us, both principal and cautioners, and our heirs, executors and successors whomsoever, all jointly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to content and pay to the said John Pattison, junior, &c., as trustees and fiduciaries, &c., all and whole the principal sum of £1830 Sterling, as an equivalent for the value of said houses and interest on the same, from the term of Whitsunday 1808, with the lawful interest of the said accumulated principal sum of £1830 Sterling, from and after the said term of Whitsunday 1808, until the term of payment after written; and which interest shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, beginning at the term of Whitsunday 1809, and so on until payment of the said principal sum; and the said principal sum shall be payable within seven years after the term of Martinmas 1808, and, at furthest, on the term of Martinmas 1815, without delay, with one-fifth part of said principal sum further in name of liquidate damages, expenses and penalty, in case of failure, attour the said principal sum itself, and the lawful interest thereof aforesaid, and also the lawful interest thereof from and after the said term of payment, until payment.”

When the bond became payable the money was not called up; but after a second bankruptcy of Mr Monteith in 1827, an action was brought against the present pursuer personally. This action was taken out of Court by a judicial reference, and decree was pronounced against him for one-half of the principal sum, with interest. The present declarator was brought by him, as the only surviving trustee under the family settlement of his co-cautioner, Mr Thomson, and concluded to have it found that Mr Thomson's obligation had been extinguished by the septennial prescription.

It was pleaded in defence—1. The bond libelled did not fall under the septennial prescription, in respect it was not an original bond for borrowed money, or for any obligation thereby constituted for the first time, but was corroborative of, and subsidiary to, an obligation previously undertaken by the principal debtor in the marriage-contract, and for which action had been raised, and diligence in security had been used. 2. The bond libelled on did not fall under the septennial prescription, in respect it was granted, and bears in gremio to have been granted in consideration of the diligence of inhibition used on a depending action being discharged, and the cautioners, therefore, were already bound as cautioners in the recal of an inhibition. 3. The cautioners in the bond were not entitled to the benefit of the septennial prescription, because it was not, quoad them, a pure gratuitous cautionary obligation, in respect that they were already bound as cautioners in the principal debtor's sequestration for 7s. 6d. in the pound of the claim, and obtained a discharge of the inhibition which had affected their debtors' heritable subjects.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“17th July 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record and whole process, and made avizandum, In respect that the bond now in question is (in the precise terms of the Act 1695, cap. 5,) ‘a bond for a sum of money,’ in which the pursuer is expressly bound as cautioner ‘for and with the principal debtor,’ and that the said bond is the first bond or contract ‘for a sum of money’ granted to the creditor by either of those parties, repels the defences, and finds, declares, and decerns, in terms of the conclusions of the libel; finds expenses due; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits to the auditor for his taxation and report.

“Note.—The Lord Ordinary can find no sufficient authority for holding that the benefit of the Statute is confined to cautioners who bind themselves with the principal in bonds for borrowed money, and thinks that such a limitation would be inconsistent with the precise terms in which it is expressed. The defender, indeed, seemed to rely much more upon his second objection, that this was truly a corroborative bond, or mere renewal, in so far as the principal was concerned, of his original obligation in the marriage-contract; but the Lord Ordinary cannot so consider it. The essential difference is, that that obligation was strictly ad factum præstandum, or to convey and settle certain specific houses; whereas this is to pay a certain sum of money at a certain term. It is a mistake to say that there is any alternative obligation to pay money in the marriage-contract. The only proper obligation in that contract is, to convey and settle the houses; and their reference to the value which occurs in another part of that deed, is not at all of the nature of an alternative obligation. If the party had remained solvent, he could not have compelled the intended disponees to have accepted that value instead of the houses themselves, nor could they have obliged him to pay it. There can be no doubt, accordingly, that if cautioners had been bound along with the principal in that original obligation to convey houses, they would not have had the benefit of the Statute, as not being concerned in a money obligation; and it seems to follow on the same principle, that the pursuer, as cautioner in the first money obligation, must have had that benefit to which he could not possibly have been entitled by any earlier binding for or with the principal. That the new money obligation is a surrogatum or equivalent for the former ad factum præstandum, would seem to be of no importance in such a question, as will appear, it is thought, very plainly by merely reversing the case which has occurred. Suppose the first obligation had been for a sum of money, but without cautioners, and that, ex intervallo, there had been substituted for this, and expressly as a surrogatum or equivalent, an obligation with cautioners to make over certain houses, or to do any other thing, could it possibly be maintained that such cautioners, though ad factum præstandum only, should yet be within the Statute, because the obligation to which they acceded was a surrogatum, for one which would have entitled them to that benefit if they had acceded to it? As to the notion that the bond should be excluded from the benefit of the Statute, because it was granted, in part, for the discharge of an action for implement of the marriage-contract, and of an inhibition raised on that dependence, and was, therefore, it was said, a quasi judicial bond, it seems enough to say that it bears expressly to have been granted in place of the obligation in the marriage-contract, and that the action for implement of that contract necessarily fell (with all its dependent diligence) by its acceptance.

“Neither does it seem to afford any better ground for excluding the operation of the Statute, that the interference of the cautioners may not have been purely gratuitous, and that they might have ends of their own to answer by their principal getting rid of the specific obligation ad factum præstandum in the contract. In very many, and probably in most cases, where cautioners join, even in original bonds for money instantly borrowed and advanced, they have ends to answer, and advantages to gain for themselves, by thus contributing to supply the wants of the principal. But if they be truly cautioners only, and do not themselves receive the advance on their own account, they are clearly within the Statute. In the present case, the cautioners certainly were not previously liable for the £1830 which they then engaged to see paid by the principal, and had not received any of the considerations for which either that sum, or the conveyance of the houses, had been engaged for by that person. The only thing which at first gave rise to some hesitation in the mind of the Lord Ordinary was, that they were previously bound, as cautioners, under the principal's composition-contract for seven shillings per pound of his debts. But upon consideration, the answer seems to be conclusive that the bond evidently had no reference to that cautionary obligation; that it was not released nor suspended by the bond being granted, and that it may accordingly be still enforced (if it is not yet implemented) against the pursuer, after he has been relieved, by the preceding interlocutor, of his specific obligation to pay £1830 on or before the term of Martinmas 1815."

The defenders reclaimed; and on 6th February 1841, the Court, at the desire of both parties, appointed them to state their arguments in revised cases.

Pleaded for the pursuer—

That the obligation in the contract is plainly an obligation ad factum præstandum, or to convey the houses themselves. The bond of 1808 was therefore plainly not a corroboration, but an innovation of the marriage-contract. The parties themselves had it in view that the septennial prescription should apply, so far as the obligation of the cautioners was concerned. For it is impossible, on any other supposition, to account for the reference contained in the bond to a period of seven years, as the period beyond which payment of the bond should not be postponed. The pursuer, and the late Mr Thomson, were expressly bound as cautioners on the face of the bond, and it is necessary for the defenders to bring their case under one or other of the exceptions to the general rule of the Statute. Mr Erskine gives a summary of these exceptions (B. III. t. 7, § 23):—"This Act," he says, "being correctory of our former law, hath received a most limited interpretation. Hence, a bond granted by several persons, conjunctly and severally, though it contained a clause of mutual relief, was adjudged not to fall within the Statute, because the Act was to be understood of those bonds only in which one or more of the co-principals became bound to relieve all the other obligants. Nor bonds of corroboration, because in these the grantor is neither bound as cautioner, nor has a clause of relief in his favour,—he being entitled to relief only ex lege. In the same manner, one who had, by a missive letter, promised to pay a debt due by another, was found not entitled to the benefit of the Act, because the missive was in effect an obligation corroborating the debt. The Act itself seems to exclude all judicial cautioners, as, in suspensions, cautioners for the faithful discharge of an office, and cautioners ad factum præstandum, because the Act is confined to persons engaged for others in bonds or contracts for sums of money. Neither does it extend to the relief competent to cautioners against one another, which, like other rights not limited, subsist for forty years." The Statute is not limited to bonds for borrowed money, but applies to all bonds and contracts whatever which involve money obligations. Even where an obligation ad factum præstandum itself merges into a money obligation, there the Statute is held to apply. It is contended that the bond must be held in the same predicament as if it had been a judicial bond granted in Court for the loosening of inhibition; but in point of fact, it was an extrajudicial bond. And the effect of the inhibition was extinguished by the supervening sequestration. That the obligation was undertaken by the cautioners for some benefit derived to themselves is not true; but even if it were, this is no relevant ground for excluding the application of the Statute. It is said that there was an antecedent obligation upon the principal debtor, and therefore that the bond falls under the exception of bonds of corroboration; but the bond was not a corroboration: it was an innovation of the original debt. There are two ways in which a cautioner may interpose. The one is by his becoming a co-obligant along with the principal debtor in one common deed, to which they both are parties. The other is by his afterwards interposing his suretieship in a separate and subsequent deed. In the first case the Statute applies, because its express terms bear reference to cautioners "binding and engaging for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in a bond or contract for a sum of money." In the second case, although the party is not the less a cautioner than in the other, yet still he is not a cautioner interposing according to the literal terms of the Statute. The principle which pervades the whole of the decisions is, that a party, however truly cautioner, has not the benefit of the prescription if he is not bound in the same deed with the principal obligant, but becomes cautioner by a subsequent obligation; and this for the technical reason, that the words of the Statute, which are to be strictly interpreted, only comprehend the case of cautioners bound in the same deed with the primary debtor. But there is no trace of its being made the ground of the exception, that the obligation was, with reference to the principal debtor himself, not an original but renewed obligation. The great majority of cases in which cautionary obligations intervene, are not cases of original debts, but of antecedent obligations; and it is generally for the purpose of procuring indulgence in discharging these, that the additional security of the cautioner is granted.

Pleaded by the defenders—

In the application of the Statute two rules are admitted: First, It is fixed by all authorities, that "this Act," to use the words of Mr Erskine, "being correctory of our former law, hath received a most limited interpretation." Second, Although the Statute speaks generally of cautioners bound in "bonds and contracts for sums of money," it is admitted that it does not comprehend all bonds and contracts for sums of money, but that a bond, of which this is the character, may nevertheless be excluded from the benefit of the Act. The object of the Statute was to give relief to cautioners interposing their credit to enable others to raise funds, in a transaction by which the creditor, at one and the same time, advanced his money, and received the obligation of his debtor and his cautioner; and therefore it has always been held to apply only to bonds for borrowed money. But however purely the obligation may be a money obligation, the cautioner is to have the benefit of the Statute only, "providing that he have either a clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, intimated personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond." This implies and means a transaction in which the intended creditor has the power of refusing to become a creditor, if a proposed co-obligant shall be tendered only as a cautioner. The point of time to be regarded, is that at which the creditor can make his choice whether he will or will not advance his money. But this element cannot possibly be present except in an original transaction of borrowing and lending, or in the original constitution of a debit and credit in some shape or other. A cautioner interfering for a party who is already bound, never can be in the case of the Statute. His obligation is only a corroborative security to benefit a debtor who is already bound, and these are not the cautioners whom the Act of Parliament had in view. Under the marriage-contract, Mr Monteith was debtor in payment of the value of these houses, four years before this bond was granted. Not only were the trustees the creditors in the debt, long before it assumed this form, but it had been made the subject of action, and was secured by diligence, which the cautioners recognised to be good and binding, and bargained should be discharged. The bond itself expressly recognises it as a debt which had been due, and bearing interest, from Martinmas 1803 downwards; the cautioners acknowledge it to have been so; they consent that the arrears of interest on the £1500 shall be accumulated into a principal sum, and added to the principal sum of £1500, and that the whole shall carry interest from the date of the bond. It is maintained that the exception of corroborative securities extends only to cases where—the principal debtor having been previously bound without a cautioner—the cautioner subsequently becomes bound by a separate deed in which the principal does not renew his own obligation: But this is admitting that a cautioner, to have the benefit of the Statute, must be a person who was bound as such in the original constitution of the obligation. The principle which lies at the bottom of the exclusion, is not merely that the subsequent cautioner is not bound "for and with another" in the same deed, but a much broader principle, viz., that such a cautioner is not a party "at the time of delivering the bond,"—is not a party to the constitution of an original obligation,—the only state of things that the Statute contemplated. Independently of this, the bond in question was in fact and substance a cautionary obligation in a marriage-contract, and it is undoubted that cautioners for the implement of conditions in contracts of marriage, have uniformly been excluded from the benefit of the Statute, whether the obligation was to settle land or to pay money. It is said the bond was an innovation of the marriage-contract. But innovation is a voluntary contract, by which a creditor, having it in his power to proceed against one debtor, and enforce one obligation, voluntarily accepts a different debtor, and a different obligation. No such thing took place here. The defenders had it not in their power to compel a conveyance of the houses; that had been impossible from the beginning. They did not therefore voluntarily exchange that power for something else, and of a different kind, in which case there might have been some pretext for the plea of innovation. Neither was there any novation as to the debtor, for John Monteith was the party bound from the beginning. Farther, the bond bears expressly to have been granted in consideration of diligence against the debtor having been recalled and discharged. And there cannot be a doubt, that bonds of caution granted in order to procure the recal of legal diligence, have always been held to be excluded from the benefit of the Statute,—whether it be caution in a suspension, or in losing of arrestment, or recal of inhibition. That which excludes such bonds from the benefit of the Statute, is not the indifferent circumstance of their being judicial bonds; they are so excluded on account of one common character, which necessarily belongs to them all, viz., that from their very nature, the cautioner does not interpose in the original creation of the relation of creditor and debtor, but becomes a corroborative security for implement of an obligation which already exists, or is held to exist. Lastly, The bond was not, on the part of the cautioners, gratuitous, but one for which they themselves received value; and it does not appear to be susceptible of doubt, that when the Act of Parliament was limiting the risks to which men may expose themselves by becoming bound for the debts of others, it had in view only those whose obligation, as in a question between them and the creditor, was entirely gratuitous.

At advising,

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor is right. When a party is bound expressly as cautioner in the bond, a clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, personally intimated, is not required. The pursuer, therefore, is entitled to relief under the Statute. In the first place, I see no authority for limiting the application of the Statute to bonds for borrowed money: these are merely general terms. A man borrows money, when in certain circumstances he keeps it, just as much as when he receives money at the granting of his bond. Suppose an executor is bound to pay a legacy, but instead of doing so, grants his bond, would not the cautioner in the bond have the benefit of the Act? Or, suppose a factor, in settling accounts with his principal, grants a bond for a fixed sum as the balance, the cautioner would be under the Statute: yet these are bonds granted for pre-existing obligations. In the present case, the bond is the first money-obligation even of the principal; it is a new and substantive obligation. It is said that the point of time to be regarded, is that at which the creditor can make his choice whether he will or will not advance his money. But I don't think an onerous consideration is necessary to an application of the Statute. Suppose the principal had granted the bond gratuitously to a near relation, having cautioners bound with and for him, would they not be free after the lapse of the seven years? The decisions in Balvaird and Monro show that the Statute is not confined to cases of original obligations merely. The second objection stated is, that the Act does not apply to bonds of corroboration; but that rule depends on the cautioner not being bound with and for the principal. Secondly, This is not a bond of corroboration in any sense of the term. The first obligation was discharged, and it is impossible to corroborate what does not exist. In the third place, It is said that there is an exception from the Statute, in the case of cautioners in marriage-contracts, because in these the term of payment is not definite. But this is not a cautionary obligation in a marriage-contract. Thomson had nothing to do with the marriage-contract, or with anything but his own bond. In the fourth place, It is said the bond falls under the exception of judicial cautionary. But the inhibition was discharged by supervening sequestration, according to the case of Holmes. At all events, if the defenders took the bond in place of the inhibition, they took it subject to the septennial limitation, and it is their own fault if they did not enforce payment within the seven years. Besides, they got a great deal better security than they could have had under their diligence. In the fifth place, It is said the cautioners had some interest in granting the bond; but there is no relevancy in this. The claim against them for payment of the composition is not hujus loci. The grounds of the exceptions stated by the defenders would render the Statute entirely nugatory; and all the decisions tend to show that the Court has already gone far enough in restraining its application.

Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The Act 1695 seems to have been somewhat misunderstood from the passage in Erskine, III. 7, § 23, where he says, that "this Act being correctory of our former law, hath received a most limited interpretation." Now, not one of the illustrations given by Erskine fall within the terms of the Statute. They are all beyond the Statute, and the Court could not enlarge it, so as to reach them. The person pleading the Statute must be within its terms, which are perfectly clear and specific, "that no man binding and engaging for hereafter, for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contracts for any sums of money, shall be bound for the said sums for longer than seven years after the date of the bond, but that from and after the said seven years the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution; and that whoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner, or as principal or co-principal, shall be understood to be a cautioner to have the benefit of this Act, provided that he have either a clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, intimated personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond." There is not an expression in the Statute susceptible of two meanings; and hitherto there is no case in which the Court has refused the benefit of the Act, which was not manifestly beyond its reach. As to the pleas urged by the defender, I agree with the opinion of Lord Moncreiff. The present case is clearly within the Statute, and we cannot deny the party the benefit of it.

The Court adhered with expenses.

No. 36.—ROBERTSON v. MASON.

Proof.—Process—Clerk, Subscription of—Oath de fideli—A proof having been led before one of the Sheriffs-Commissary, it was objected, 1st, that the report did not bear that the oath de fideli had been administered to the clerk; and, 2d, that he did not sign the proof along with the commissioner. Both objections were repelled.

This was a case reported verbally to the Court by Lord Cockburn, and involved two objections to the report of a proof by Mr Jardine, one of the Commissary Sheriffs—1st, That the report did not bear that the oath de fideli had been administered to the clerk; and, 2d, That he did not sign the proof along with the commissioner.

Robertson.—As to the first objection, it is not a nullity. The Sheriff is a statutory officer, and is not bound to employ any particular clerk, or any clerk at all. Under the former practice, the reports generally bore that the clerks were sworn, although, in point of fact, they very seldom were so. The Statute makes no reference to clerks whatever. In regard to the second objection—In the case of Macfun, 1836, the proof was not signed by the commissioner, and the Court allowed the commissioner to call the witnesses before him and read over to them their depositions, and then authenticate the proof.

Paterson.—The proof has not been regularly taken, and the clerk does not sign along with the commissioner. If the report did not bear that the witnesses had been sworn, the omission would be fatal; and in the case of Baxter (3 Shaw), where the proof was not signed by the commissioner, the Court remitted to take the oath de novo.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The want of the signature of the commissioner to the proof cannot be known till after it is out of his hands; but here the objector was present, and might, and ought to have objected to the oath de fideli not being administered to the clerk.

Lord Meadowbank.—The clerk having been appointed, the presumption is, that every thing was done rightly. It is said he did not sign the proof; but he may do so now.

Lord Medwyn.—There is nothing on record as to the appointment of the clerk; but being appointed, we are to presume that he was appointed regularly. As to the want of his subscription, it is of no consequence. It is necessary that the Commissary should subscribe; and had he neglected to do so, he might still authenticate the proof.

Lord Moncreiff.—The more regular practice is, to enter on the record that the oath de fideli was administered to the clerk; but to say that the omission of this implies a nullity, is a very different matter. If, when appointed, the party was present, and did not object, it is too late to go back now.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The objection to the want of the clerk's subscription is groundless. If the proper officer sign the proof, that is sufficient. As to the oath de fideli not being administered, I go wholly upon the ground that, the parties being present, and the objection not stated at the time, it is incompetent to state it now.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 37.—GEORGE MELVIN, Suspender, v. THE PRESIDENT and GOVERNORS of GORDON'S HOSPITAL, Respondents.

Public Officer—Schoolmaster.—The master of a private charity, incorporated by royal charter, had the office conferred upon him only from year to year, or during pleasure—Held that the governors might dispense with his services at the annual election of office-bearers.

In 1729, Robert Gordon, merchant in Aberdeen, executed a deed of mortification of his whole property in favour of the Provost, Bailies, and Town-council of Aberdeen, and the four town's ministers, and their successors in office, for ever, for erecting and maintaining an hospital, under the title of Robert Gordon's Hospital, for entertaining and educating indigent male children and male grandchildren of decayed merchants and brethren of the guild of the burgh. In this deed he appointed certain rules and statutes to be observed in the management of the hospital. By the second he provides, that

"the saids Governors shall have power to make farther by-laws and rules for the better administration of the said hospital and affairs thereof, the same being noways derogatory to what is declared to be fundamental, nor to the rules and statutes now adjusted, (except the same shall be altered in manner after prescribed.)"

In 1772, the Governors were incorporated by royal charter. The 9th section of the original deed regulates the election of the master. It enumerates various occasions on which the Governors are specially enjoined to depose or censure him; and it farther provides, that if the master shall marry, his office shall ipso facto become void. The deed, however, beyond this, contains no limitation of the discretion of the Governors in regulating the tenure of the office as may appear to them best for the interests of the institution. In particular, it does not confer on the master any right to hold his office ad vitam aut culpam.

The first master appointed to the institution was Mr George Abercrombie, who was elected in 1750. In 1790, Mr Anderson, then master of the hospital, resigned. Before electing his successor, the minutes bear, that the President and Governors resolved unanimously that a master shall be elected for one year only; thereafter they unanimously elected Mr Alexander Thom to be master of the hospital for one year. At the annual general meeting in November 1790, the President and Governors continued Mr Alexander Thom as master of the hospital till the third Monday of November next year.

At a meeting on the 4th April 1791, it was moved, "that it be clearly established by regulation, that in future the master, schoolmasters and housekeeper, as well as all the other office-bearers of the hospital, be elected annually on the third Monday of November, and that for one year only. The same was for some time deliberated upon, and unanimously agreed to, and ordered to be under consideration of the two next general meetings."

Accordingly, on the 21st of November 1791,

"the President and Governors having taken under their consideration the motion made on the 4th of April last, and which was then unanimously agreed to, and was again under consideration of the old Governors this forenoon, and then unanimously agreed to, and having now fully deliberated thereupon, they unanimously statute and enact, that in future the master, school-masters and housekeeper, as well as the other office-bearers of the hospital, be elected upon the third Monday of November yearly, and that for one year only."

This form of re-election was observed at each annual general meeting from 1791 down to the date of the suspender's appointment, on the 3d September 1832. The minute of election bears, that "the President and Governors did, and hereby do, name and elect the said Mr George Melvin, as having the majority of votes, to be master of the hospital until the third Monday of November next, when the annual election of office-bearers, on the members of the new council coming in, takes place."

On the third Monday of November, the suspender was continued, along with the other office-bearers, till the third Monday of November following. In November 1833, in consequence of some investigations at that time pending, which were not concluded until the December following, the office-bearers were continued only during the pleasure of the President and Governors; and this form of re-election has been observed annually ever since.

From 1833 to 1841 the Governors found it necessary to institute several inquiries into the discipline of the house, and on the 16th of August last, it was resolved to dispense with the services of the suspender and the two resident teachers in the ensuing November. Intimation was accordingly given to the suspender, and in consequence the present note of suspension and interdict was presented.

Pleaded for the suspender—

1. That by the common law of the country, and apart from the provisions in the deed of mortification, the master of a great educational establishment incorporated by royal charter like Gordon's Hospital, holds his office by law on a permanent footing, and is only removable on reasonable cause shown to the Court for his dismissal: Adam v. the Directors of the Ayr Academy, July 7, 1815, reported in note to Gibson v. Directors of the Tain Academy, Shaw, 14, p. 710; Mason, Shaw 14, p. 343; Clark v. the Directors of the Irvine Academy, November 30, 1839, Shaw, 9, p. 97. 2. Farther, it has been decided, and is the law of the country, that even if the terms of his appointment bore that he was to be removable at pleasure, such a condition is illegal, and contrary to public expediency, and would be held pro non scripto; reasonable cause of dismissal being equally required in both cases: Adam v. the Directors of the Ayr Academy, July 7, 1815. 3. In the present case, the deed of mortification, in addition to the ordinary presumption of law, makes the appointment of the master a permanent one, by the clear distinction which pervades its provisions in regard to the inferior officers, &c., of the establishment, who are to hold their offices at the pleasure of the Governors, or who are declared removable when they think proper, and the case of the master, as to whose appointment there is no such provision, and as to whose removal it is declared that he may be deposed in certain specified cases of proven immorality, negligence, or incompetency, and that only in a particular form and under certain qualifications. 4. The deed of mortification prescribes and contemplates no annual re-election of the master; the reference in the section to the election of the treasurer being limited to the manner of the original election, i. e., by a simple majority as distinguished from any other proportion of votes. 5. But even if, by usage, the form of an annual election has come to be matter of practice, the situation of the master is still a permanent one, and he is entitled to be re-elected, except reasonable cause can be shown against him, in terms of section 9 of the deed of mortification: Kempt v. the Magistrates of Irvine, Mor. 13,136. 6. The attempt to make the appointment of the suspender one to be held at the pleasure of the Governors, would have been equally contrary to the common law and to the deed of mortification and royal charter. But farther, no such limitation being contained in the original appointment of the suspender, it was ultra vires of the Governors to alter the footing on which he had been appointed to the situation, or to declare, in prejudice of his vested right, that it was held to be at their pleasure only. 7. The Governors having attempted, under an erroneous view of their powers, to dismiss the suspender, expressly on the ground that they are entitled to do so at their own pleasure, and having neither proved that the suspender has been guilty of any of the offences which warrant deposition, in terms of the deed of foundation, nor even exhibited any charges against him, so as to give him an opportunity of investigating them and proving his innocence, ought to be interdicted from so doing; and it is irregular and incompetent for them, on the supposition that they have not the legal power to dismiss the suspender at pleasure, to come forward in Court with any charges against him which they have declined to state, when called upon to do so extrajudicially.

Pleaded for the respondents—

1. Under the original deed of mortification the founder did not confer on the master of the hospital any right to hold his office ad vitam aut culpam, nor did he in any degree limit or control the discretion of the Governors in regulating the tenure of the office as should seem to them best for the interests of the institution. 2. Even if the original deed of mortification had expressed an intention on the part of the founder that the master should hold ad vitam aut culpam, this regulation was validly altered, in terms of the powers contained in the deed of mortification and the royal charter, by the Statute passed in 1791, by which the President and Governors resolved that in future the office-bearers of the institution should be elected for a year only, and which has been uniformly adhered to ever since. 3. At all events, the suspender having been elected, in the first instance, only until the November following, and having been re-elected annually first for one year, and thereafter at the pleasure of the Governors, and having accepted the office, and continued to act under it in the full knowledge of all the conditions affecting it, the respondents were fully entitled to adopt the proceedings complained of, and the suspender cannot competently interdict them from filling up the office of master of the hospital in any way they may think proper on the 15th of November current. 4. By the common law of Scotland, a party holding the situation of the suspender is not a public officer, nor is there any presumption in law that he holds his office ad vitam aut culpam: Gibson v. Directors of Tain Academy, House of Lords, 2d March 1840, (ante, Vol. 13, p. 3.) 5. It is absolutely necessary, for the proper regulation of such institutions, that those having charge of them should have the power of changing the officers employed under them when they become convinced that their continuance is prejudicial; and it is sufficient in any view to warrant them in doing so, that there exist grounds which appear to them reasonable for rendering such proceedings necessary. 6. The prayer of the suspender being neither founded in fact or in law, and the subsisting interdict being highly prejudicial to the interests of the institution, the interdict ought to be recalled, and the note refused simpliciter.

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Inner-House, and annexed to his interlocutor the following note:

"This is an important question to the parties; but after the Lord Chancellor's speech in moving judgment of affirmance in Gibson v. Directors of the Tain Academy, (1 Robinson's Ap. Ca. 16), there does not seem much difficulty as to the law of the case.

"It must now be taken for settled, that in private charities like the present, nothing either of the character or privilege of public officer attaches to a party in the suspender's situation;—and also, that no distinction is to be drawn in this respect from the mere circumstance that there has been obtained a charter of incorporation. So much, indeed, was conceded at the debate; the suspender admitting, in reference to the authority referred to, that he could no longer maintain the high ground which, while not yet aware of its import, he had taken in some of the pleas appended to the note of suspension.

" This then brings the case at once within the rule of Mason, 23d January 1836. In other words, it reduces the question to a mere ordinary question of private contract between master and servant. The terms of the contract may no doubt have been such as to give the suspender his office on a tenure ad vitam aut culpam. But on the other hand, it may equally have been such as to confer the office upon him only from year to year, or during pleasure. This raises a pure question of fact; for the moment the office ceases to command privilege as a public office, the notion upon which some of the older authorities rest, that it must be held pactum illicitum and contra bonos mores to bargain for a limited term of endurance, falls to the ground.

" Now, what was here the actual contract, is an element of the case which admits of no dispute. The suspender was, on 3d September 1832, elected ' to be master of the hospital until the third Monday of November next, when the annual election of office-bearers, &c., takes place.' So that there was not only an express limitation of the term of service in the first instance, but a direct intimation to the suspender, that his continuance in office was thereafter to form part of ' the annual election' of office-bearers. Accordingly, at the annual election on 19th November 1832, the Governors continued, and hereby continue, ' the suspender as master of the hospital, in like manner as they continued the teachers and various other office-bearers, ' all until the third Monday of November' in the succeeding year. And so there was a regular act re-electing the suspender in every after year, the only difference being, that, from 1833 downwards, the office was given ' during the said President and Governors' pleasure only.'

" Nor is this all:—for the same system of annual election had existed, and been in uniform and invariable observance, at all events, since 1790. On 28th June of that year, the Governors ' resolved unanimously that a master shall be elected for one year only.' On 4th April 1791, it was unanimously agreed, ' that it be clearly established by a regulation, that in future the master, schoolmasters and housekeeper, as well as all the other office-bearers of the hospital, be elected annually on the third Monday of November, and that for one year only.' This was unanimously confirmed by a statute or bye-law, to that effect, passed at a subsequent meeting on 21st November 1791. And the practice has continued, without a single exception, ever since.

" The suspender attempted to raise a question, as if such a regulation was ultra vires of the Governors, and at variance with the spirit and terms of the original deed of foundation. But even if it had been so, however much such a consideration might have been agitated by those having a legal interest in the trust, it could never, it is thought, have availed the suspender, in an endeavour like the present, to extend his individual contract beyond the express limitation embodied on the face of it. If, indeed, the suspender's appointment had been conceived in vague and general terms, without bearing in græmio any such positive limitation, he might perhaps, with more plausibility, have argued on the deed of foundation, as lying at the root of the matter, and as constituting what he had principally relied upon as the basis of his contract, or at all events, what he was in dubio entitled to refer to, in explication of whatever there might be indefinite or ambiguous in its terms. This, so far as their authority on the general point is not overruled by the Tain case, appears to have been in some measure the shape of the question in the cases of the Inverness and Ayr Academies. But where, as in the present case, there exists no dubiety whatever,—where, on the contrary, the contract expressly gives an appointment only from year to year,—and where there is no maxim of public policy to render such a stipulation unlawful on public grounds,—the suspender can never be allowed, in a mere question of private contract, to question the authority of the parties with whom he had so contracted, and this to the effect of imposing upon their official successors a different contract altogether from what had ever been intended or agreed to in any quarter.

" But, after all, there is nothing in the deed of foundation, as the Lord Ordinary reads it, that seems to afford the least ground for the suspender's argument. It may be very true that the founder did not intend that there should be a yearly removal of the party holding the office of master. Indeed it is only reasonable to assume, that as one of the ordinary securities for the welfare of the institution, he looked forward to the master's being continued in office for something like a permanency. But any permanency thus anticipated was not a permanency as of right, or upon which the master was entitled to insist, independently of the Governors. It was entirely a permanency of probability and expediency, and rested exclusively upon this, that the Governors, acting with a sound discretion, were not likely to withhold the requisite act of re-election in the case of such an officer, so long as they were satisfied that the interests of the institution did not demand it.

" Besides, the deed of foundation confers upon the Governors the most unlimited power to alter the original statutes of the institution, except in certain specified fundamental articles, of which this is not one. And thus, had the deed of foundation been even other than it is, the legality of the annual election must have come at all events to be settled by the statute to that effect in 1790 and 1791. The suspender stirs a doubt, how far this statute was regularly enacted in reference to the formal requisites stipulated in section 20 of the deed of foundation. But while it may be questioned how far there is any solidity in the criticism, viewed in its strongest aspect, it is thought to be a sufficient answer in every view, that the statute has now been in uninterrupted observance for upwards of fifty years, and—being unquestionably within the power of the Governors—has thus become fortified by prescription.

" Upon the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary, had he been himself to dispose of the case, would have had no hesitation in refusing the suspender's note and recalling the interdict. But as it seems better for all concerned that such a question should receive, as speedily as possible, the authoritative judgment of the Court, it has been thought right to take the case at once to report."

At advising,

Lord Meadowbank.—I mistook the law in the case of Tain. Considering that the office of a schoolmaster required a person of good character, I thought he would have retained his situation ad vitam aut culpam. The case of Tain, however, was decided otherwise in the House of Lords; and unless the founder say expressly that his will is that his masters shall hold their situations permanently, we have no power to prevent their being dismissed.

Lord Moncreiff.—It is not for us to speculate upon expediency. No doubt there are many good reasons for the permanency of a schoolmaster's appointment. But when cause does arise for removal, we cannot interpose to prevent the Governors exercising their discretion. This may arise from circumstances which they are not bound to state in a court of law, and which may not be in the least disparaging to the party dismissed. The case of Tain is clear, and I think it was ruled according to the sound principles of law.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—As this individual does not plead the character of a public officer, but is merely a party chosen to do a particular duty, he must show that the Governors employed him under certain conditions and restrictions, in order to control their discretion in dismissing him. We cannot inquire into the grounds of their doing so.

Lord Medwyn concurred.

The Court refused the bill.

Rutherford stated that no expenses were asked.

No. 38.—JAMES THORBURN, Pursuer, v. JAMES CHARTERS, Defender.

Process—Jury Trial—Issues—Servitude—Possession—Burgh, Inhabitant of.—The proprietor of a tenement situated in a certain part of a royal burgh set forth, that he and his predecessors, as well as the inhabitants generally, residing in that neighbourhood, had had right of access to a mill-dam from time immemorial, for the purpose of drawing water therefrom. In pursuing a declarator of his right, it was found that he was entitled to an issue embracing not only his own possession, but also that of the other inhabitants of the neighbourhood.

The pursuer stands infeft in a house in the burgh of Dumfries; and having raised a summons, setting forth, that “from time immemorial, and until the last few years, the proprietors, tenants, and occupiers of the said tenement, and inhabitants generally of that neighbourhood, have possessed and enjoyed constantly, and without interruption, the right and privilege of access to, and taking water from, a mill-dam” on the premises of the defender, for domestic and other purposes; that within the last few years, the defender had obstructed the access to the mill-dam, and that therefore the right of the pursuer should be found and declared, and the defender ordained to remove the obstructions which he had erected for preventing its exercise;—the following issue in the cause was prepared by the issue clerks:

“Whether, for forty years and upwards, or for time immemorial preceding the 1823, the pursuer and his predecessors and authors, proprietors of a house in Mill Hole or Mill Street of Dumfries, or their tenants, have been in the use of drawing water from a mill-dam or mill-run, in or near said street, and whether, since the said time, the defender wrongfully obstructed the pursuer, or prevented him from drawing water from the said mill-dam or mill-run?”

The pursuer objected to the issue as framed, and proposed the following:

“Whether, for forty years and upwards, or for time immemorial preceding the 1823, the pursuer and his predecessors and authors, proprietors of a house in Mill Hole or Mill Street of Dumfries, or their tenants, and the other inhabitants of the said street or neighbourhood, have been in the use of having access to, and drawing water from a mill-dam or mill-run, in or near said street, and whether, since the said time, the defender wrongfully obstructed the pursuer and others aforesaid, or prevented them from having access to and drawing water from the said mill-dam or mill-run?”

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the issue to the Second Division of the Court, and annexed the following note to his interlocutor:

“The pursuer, James Thorburn, claims a right to use the water of a mill-dam on the premises of James Charters, on the ground, as set forth in the summons, that he and his predecessors in the tenement libelled on, ‘as well as the inhabitants generally residing in that neighbourhood of the town of Dumfries, have had right of access to the said mill-dam from time immemorial, for the purpose of drawing water therefrom.’ &c. &c.

“In this process a record has been prepared, and the parties fully heard before the issue clerks, who have returned an issue, confining the inquiry to the possession of the pursuer and his predecessors in the tenement libelled on, and thus excluding the possession of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, and third parties. The issue is annexed for your Lordships’ perusal.

“To this the pursuer objects, that the issue does not exhaust his libel,—that he specially founded in his summons on the possession of the inhabitants of that neighbourhood in the town of Dumfries,—and that a similar issue to that now proposed by him was given by the Second Division of the Court in the late keenly contested cases of Mercer v. Reid, 1st February 1840, and Mercer v. Rutherford, 18th February 1840, in both of which an issue was allowed as to the use of a road by the pursuer, ‘and the other inhabitants and portioners of the village of Bridgend.’

“To this the defender answers, that the issue in cases of the present description was authoritatively settled by the House of Lords in the case of the Duke of Hamilton and Aikman in 1832; in which case a party, who alleged that he and his predecessors, and others, inhabitants of the town of Hamilton, had been in use to take sand and gravel from the river Avon, was allowed an issue by this Court to that effect (8 Shaw and Dunlop, 943); but that judgment was reversed on appeal, and the case remitted, with a special finding, ‘that the respondent has only a title to insist in this action as one of the inhabitants of Hamilton, or as owner of certain lands therein, to the effect of having it found by a jury, whether or not he has a right of servitude to take sand and gravel from the pond in question, in right of and for the use of his own property.’—See Shaw’s Supplemental Appeal Cases for 1832–33, p. 12.

“The issue clerks have adhered to the precedent in the Duke of Hamilton’s case, and limited the inquiry to the possession of the pursuer. The Lord Ordinary, though concurring with the issue clerks, feels it his duty to report the case to the Court, not only that it may be considered by the Judge who is to preside at the trial, but that a question of very frequent occurrence in practice may be reviewed by the Court.

“There can be no doubt that this Court did not intend, in Mercer’s case, to depart from the decision of the House of Lords in the prior case of the Duke of Hamilton: And as the latter case was not even quoted in Mercer’s case, it was probably viewed, both by the parties and the Court, as a question of a different nature, and depending on different rules of law. The one related to a servitude of gravel—a right peculiarly attached to heritable property; the other to a right of road—a subject which notoriously may either be a public or private servitude, as immemorial usage shall establish.

“The pursuer, however, pleads, that his case falls precisely within the principle of the road; and as it was found in the noted case of Dysart, in the House of Lords (Dict. p. 14,519), departing from a precedent of their Lordships to the contrary in the case of Kelso (p. 2340), that a servitude may be constituted over a green for bleaching in favour of the whole inhabitants of a borough, it is argued that the pursuer is entitled to maintain a similar plea. But on recurring to the case of Dysart, it will be found that the servitude was claimed there by the magistrates for behoof of the community, and in that form it was sustained; and the later cases of St Andrews and Burntisland afford examples of the form in which such servitudes, when established, may be made effectual by inhabitants, as suspensions were sustained at the instance of the inhabitants against the magistrates, as administrators of the common property, to stop certain projected alienations of a burgal common, inconsistent with the long established servitudes of the inhabitants. These questions were tried in a form altogether different from the present.

“At the same time, it perhaps would not be safe to lay it down, that a public servitude may not be vindicated or protected at the instance of the individual inhabitants more immediately interested in its maintenance. But the pursuer does not go the length of maintaining that this was, in the proper sense of the term, one of the public wells of Dumfries. If he did, the case would fall to be tried in some form that would enable the defender, if successful in his averments, to be free of the burden for ever. The present is not an action of that description, and therefore it is thought that the pursuer can only establish his own right, and prove the use of the water for his own tenement.

“The defender proposed an issue as to homologation, which does not seem to have been urged before the issue clerks. The Court will of course hear parties on that point when the case is before them upon the principal issue.

“On conferring with the issue clerks, the Lord Ordinary finds that the reason for giving no issue to the defender as to homologation was, that there was no plea, and only a very brief and questionable statement, in point of relevancy, to justify an issue as to homologation."

Argued for the pursuer—That he was entitled to found on the possession of the other inhabitants, to the effect of establishing his own right. The case of the Duke of Hamilton and Aikman (6 W. and S. App. p. 64), drew the distinction between an inhabitant and owner, as to the right to found upon the possession of others, in prescribing a right of servitude. It was there ruled, that if Aikman insisted in such a right as inhabitant, he could found upon the possession of the other inhabitants, but if he insisted in his character of owner, he could only found upon his own possession. Where burghs are on the increase, the proprietor of a new house never could prescribe such a right, except by the possession of others. The case of Mercer v. Rutherford, 18th February 1840, is precisely in point, and establishes the pursuer's right to the issue which he proposes.

Answered—The question here is not as to the proof competent to be adduced at the trial, but merely what is to be put into the issue. A royal burgh possessed of a dominant tenement, may prescribe a servitude for the use of the inhabitants generally, and the magistrates may claim it for behoof of the community. But each individual, when he comes into Court separately, must prescribe his own right. The possession of the other inhabitants he may found on as evidence, but not as prescribing his right of servitude.—(Lord Justice-Clerk. It is settled that it is incompetent to lead evidence at the trial of the possession of the other inhabitants, if the issue be not broad enough to cover it).—The case of the Duke of Hamilton determined, that where a party claimed as owner, he could only found upon his own possession. Here the pursuer libels as proprietor, and it is needless to enter into his rights as an inhabitant.

Lord Moncreiff.—If allowed to establish his right as an inhabitant, I don't see how he can be prevented from proving it by the possession of others; and the case of Mercer is precisely in point.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am surprised there should be any question as to the proper issue here, for such cases have been of late very frequent; and the issues were precisely such as the one proposed by the pursuer, which is the proper issue for trying the question. The pursuer is not entitled to ask decree for the other inhabitants, but he may adduce proof of their possession, and found upon it in support of his own right. The Lord Ordinary is under a mistake when he supposes that the case of the Duke of Hamilton and Aikman was not under the serious consideration of the Court in fixing the issues in Mercer v. Rutherford.

Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn concurred.

The Court approved of the issue proposed by the pursuer.

No. 39.—JAMES BARCLAY, Appellant, v. WILLIAM MUIR, Respondent.

Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 54—Sequestration—Trustee, Competition for—Review—Appeal—One of the competitors for the office of trustee on a sequestrated estate lodged with the Sheriff-clerk a notice of appeal against the deliverance pronounced on the same day by the Sheriff-substitute, and, three days thereafter, he also lodged a bond of caution subscribed by himself and cautioner—Held that the note of appeal was incompetent.

In a competition between the appellant and respondent for the office of trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Ross, some time innkeeper in Forfar, and now residing at Craigs, by Falkirk, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following deliverance:

"Falkirk, 3d November 1841.—Having heard parties' procurators in terms of last interlocutor, and thereafter advised the cause, finds that James Barclay is admitted to have acted as trustee for the bankrupt under a private trust: Finds that his interest is adverse to that of the other creditors; therefore, sustains this objection to his election as trustee in this sequestration: Repels the whole objections to the election of William Muir; and in respect it was stated that Thomas Carnaby refused to accept, declares William Muir, merchant, Leith, to have been duly elected trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Ross, some time innkeeper at Forfar, now residing at Craigs, by Falkirk, in terms of the Act 2 and 3 Victoria, chap. 41." (Signed) "J. W. DICKSON."

Mr Barclay appealed, and, along with his note, produced the following certificate by the Sheriff-clerk:

"I, Sheriff-clerk depute of the eastern district of Stirling-shire, certify, that on the 3d day of November current, Mr James Barclay, writer in Forfar, a competitor for the office of trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Ross, some time innkeeper in Forfar, now residing at Craigs, by Falkirk, lodged with me a notice of appeal against the deliverance pronounced of that date by the Sheriff-substitute in said sequestration; and I farther certify, that upon the 6th day of November current, the said James Barclay also lodged with me a bond of caution, subscribed by himself and Mr Lewis McKenzie, writer in Forfar, as cautioner for him." "P. MURDOCH."

Objected by the respondent, that the note of appeal was incompetent, in respect that the bond of caution had not been lodged within two days after the deliverance of the Sheriff, in terms of the 54th section of the Act.

Answered—That the cautioner proposed and accepted at the meeting of creditors was resident at Forfar; and although the Statute bears that the bond of caution shall be lodged along with the notice of appeal, this does not mean that the notice must be accompanied by the bond. If the bond be lodged timeously, it is sufficient, provided the notice be lodged within two days after the deliverance. But here there is truly no deliverance. The 47th section of the Act provides, that the Sheriff shall state in a note the grounds of his decision, and this note shall form part of the process. Here there is a deliverance, but no note. The appellant was entitled to wait for the issuing of the note before lodging his bond, and if it had been issued on the 4th November, his bond would have been in time.

Lord Moncreiff.—The Statute is express, that the bond must be lodged within two days from the date of the deliverance.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think the appeal is bad; and I am also of opinion, that it is incompetent to state the grounds of an appeal, when there is no appeal before us.

Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn concurred.

The Court refused the note as incompetent, and modified the expenses to six guineas.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 40.—GEORGE LYON, Pursuer, v. ARCHIBALD BUTTER and THOMAS ELDER BAIRD, Defenders.

Bill of Exchange—Blank Stamp—Notice—A party signing and delivering a blank bill becomes responsible, as acceptor, for any amount that the stamp will cover, and is not entitled to notice either of the amount for which it has been filled up, or of its not having been duly retired.

On 4th February 1837, Macritchie, Bayley and Henderson, addressed the following letter to Mr Fergusson, W.S., agent of Mr Butter of Fascalally:

"We mentioned to you lately the bill which Mr Lyon held by Mr Butter of Fascalally and Mr Baird, and which Mr Lyon had sent us to get payment of. Mr Baird, at the time, wished us to delay writing you or Mr Butter about it, till he should himself communicate with Mr Butter, and which he told us he had done; but as we have heard nothing farther on the subject, we will feel obliged by your bringing the matter before Mr Butter. The bill is dated 31st July 1833, payable at Martinmas then next, for £932. 19s. 6d., and we personally know that the money was advanced by Mr Lyon. Mr Lyon will in the meantime rank on Mr Baird's estate, if such is Mr Butter's wish."

"P. £922 5 4
In. 10 14 2

£932 19 6

Edinburgh, 31st July 1833.

"Conjunctly and severally, against Martinmas first, pay to me, or order at the Bank of Scotland's office, Edinburgh, the sum of nine hundred and thirty-two pounds 19s. 6d. Sterling, for value received."

(Signed)

"GEORGE LYON.

"A. BUTTER.

"THOMAS ELDER BAIRD.

"To Archibald Butter, Esq. of Fascalally, and Thomas Elder Baird, Esq., advocate, Forineth."

Mr Fergusson wrote in answer, that Mr Butter had "not the most distant recollection of the transaction;" but that Mr Baird had stated "his positive recollection of Mr Butter signing this bill as a blank bill at Fascalally." Mr Baird had further stated, that the bill "was only got for a temporary accommodation of three months or so at farthest;" that "he received none of the contents," and "does not know how they were applied." It was agreed "to rank Mr Lyon, in the meantime, for principal and interest on Mr Baird's estate, reserving all questions as to Mr Butter's liability entire, until it be seen what the ultimate deficiency amounts to." Ultimately, Mr Butter denied his liability for the bill, but offered to consign the amount till the question was judicially decided.

Mr Lyon accordingly raised an action against Mr Butter and Mr Baird, concluding for payment of the principal sum contained in the bill, with legal interest from the term of payment, under deduction of £323. 18s. 10d. received to account from Mr Baird's estate.

In his condescendence Mr Lyon averred, that in 1833 Mr Baird was indebted to him in a sum of £800, lent on a bill granted by him and Mr Leake; that he was likewise indebted to him in another sum of £100, which had become due at Candlemas 1833, on an heri-table bond for £5000, and that Macritchie, Bayley and Henderson, who were agents both for himself and Mr Baird, having agreed to accept of the joint acceptance of Mr Baird and Mr Butter for the amount; Mr Baird produced a 12s. 6d. bill stamp duly signed by these gentlemen, and the bill was accordingly filled up with the sum of £932. 19. 6., being the amount of the above debt, with interest to the date.

Mr Butter averred, that after the blank stamp was received, Mr Bayley "made the bill, which is holograph of him, in the form in which it now appears. Mr Bayley was, in 1833, and still is the agent of the pursuer as well as of Mr Baird. He has had the entire management of the affairs of both of these gentlemen. Mr Bayley not only knew that the defender was merely a cautioner for Mr Baird, but also that his name was adhibited to the stamp only as a temporary accommodation, and not as a voucher of debt which was to subsist beyond two or three months; and hence, in writing out and dating the bill "Edinburgh, 31st July 1833," Mr Bayley made it payable at the following term of Martinmas, or three months and a few days after date, when it was to be taken out of the circle." Mr Butter also averred, that "when the bill fell due at Martinmas 1833, it was not noted or protested by the pursuer or his agent, nor was any intimation made to the defender that it had not been retired by Mr Baird, while, if Mr Bayley or the pursuer had timeously intimated that the bill had not been retired, the defender could then, with perfect ease, have operated his relief against Mr Baird, whose credit and circumstances were then, and for nearly two years afterwards, perfectly good and undoubted. No such intimation was made to the defender at any time prior to the month of February 1837, upwards of four years after the date of payment of the bill."

The pursuer pleaded—1. The defender is resting—owing to the pursuer the sum sued for in virtue of the bill libelled on. 2. The defender cannot be exempted from paying that debt on the pretence that he received no value for joining Mr Baird in the acceptance, in respect not only that there is no evidence of the truth of that allegation, but that, as the pursuer received the bill from Mr Baird for full value, the allegation is irrelevant. 3. The defender cannot be exempted from paying the debt, on the pretence that he did not receive notice of the non-retirement of the bill by his co-acceptor, in respect that it was the defender's duty, as an acceptor of the bill, to make inquiry as to its retirement if he wished for any such information, and that the pursuer was not bound to give any such notice.

The defender pleaded—1. As the pursuer gave no value for the bill libelled on, he has no title to insist in the present action of payment. 2. Even if the pursuer did give value in any form for the bill, as Mr Bayley, who acted as his agent and manager of the whole business, as well as the agent and manager of Mr Baird, knew perfectly that the defender was not truly debtor in the bill to any extent, but had interposed his name as Mr Baird's cautioner merely, it was incumbent on the pursuer, or on Mr Bayley who had been intrusted with the management as aforesaid, to have intimated the dishonour of the bill when it fell due to the defender, and to have noted and protested it, whereby the defender would not only have been timeously informed of Mr Baird's failure to pay, but might have operated his relief against that gentleman or his estate; and because of the failure to intimate the non-payment and dishonour of the bill by the proper debtor, the pursuer has lost all right of recourse against the defender. 3. If the pursuer ever did give any value for the bill, he did not do so at the date which it bears, nor until after Mr Baird's affairs became embarrassed, and then only by some arrangement with Mr Bayley, in whose hands the document all along lay, when he was perfectly aware that the defender was a party to it merely as a cautioner for his brother-in-law Mr Baird. And therefore, in the knowledge of that fact, and after Mr Baird's bankruptcy, at least after his affairs had become embarrassed and been put under trust, the pursuer and Mr Bayley were not entitled to negotiate any transaction in relation to this bill, or then to endeavour to fasten, by means of it, an obligation of debt against the defender, whose right of relief against Mr Baird had then been rendered useless. Lastly, The defender is not resting-owing the amount of the bill libelled on, and therefore, and on the other grounds stated, he is entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"December 16, 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the closed record, and thereafter considered the whole process,—before answer, appoints the pursuer and defenders, and also the pursuer's agent who filled up the bill libelled on, to appear before the Lord Ordinary on the day of to be judicially examined upon the circumstances, in so far as consistent with their knowledge respectively, which took place when the said bill was subscribed, delivered, filled up, and retained by the pursuer's agent from its date till the raising of the present action; the parties to bring with them all letters, or copies of letters, written by or to any of them respecting the said bill prior to the date of the action.

"Note.—The defender moved for a proof at large, but the Lord Ordinary hardly thinks that there are any allegations on record to justify that course. On the other hand, the judicial examinations may afford the Judge an opportunity of ascertaining the precise state of the facts more fully than the record yet discloses.

"He conceives that the very unusual nature of the transaction, according to the statement of both parties, entitles the Court to order the judicial examination now proposed. In this case a bill for a large sum was signed in blank by the defender Mr Butter; it was delivered to Mr Baird, and filled up by the pursuer's agent; and these proceedings apparently took place remotis arbitris. The case thus admits of no proof, except what may be obtained from the parties themselves, and the pursuer's agent; but as it appears in every view to be one of novelty and difficulty in point of law, it is desirable that the whole facts should be sifted and ascertained in the most authentic and satisfactory form, before any decision on the merits is pronounced."

Mr Lyon reclaimed, and the interlocutor, in so far as it appointed him to be judicially examined, was altered; but no reclaiming note having been presented against the examination of his agent, Mr Bayley appeared before the Lord Ordinary, and being judicially examined, declared as follows:

"That in the years 1832 and 1833, the copartnership of Macritchie, Bayley and Henderson, of which the declarant was a partner, was the law-agents of the pursuer Mr Lyon: That the said copartnership did no law-business for the defender Mr Butter: That the declarant is also the brother-in-law of the defender Mr Thomas Elder Baird; and the bill libelled on, bearing date

31st July 1833, for £932. 19. 6., being shown to the declarant, he was requested to state the circumstances under which the said bill was filled up by the declarant. Declares, That in the spring or summer of 1833, Mr Baird stood bound to the pursuer Mr Lyon for £800, with a certain amount of interest thereon, for which he and James Leake, one of his tenants, had given their bill in favour of the pursuer, which was held by the declarant as agent for the latter; and the declarant told Mr Baird that it would be necessary to provide funds for retiring that bill, which was then past due: That Mr Baird then asked the declarant whether he could procure a loan of £1000, or thereby, to pay the said bill, and certain other claims then due by him on his (Mr Baird's) and Mr Butter's joint security: That the declarant said he thought it very likely that he could procure the money: That some time afterwards, and as the declarant believes on 31st July 1833, the day on which the bill bears date, Mr Baird brought to him the said bill stamp with the name of Mr Butter upon it: That the declarant is not sure if Mr Baird's name was then subscribed thereon, but if it was not, it was subscribed on that day when the bill was filled up: That the bill stamp was not otherwise filled up when first brought to the declarant: That the declarant filled it up with his own hand, as it now appears, addressing it to Mr Butter and Mr Baird as joint acceptors, and making it payable at the Bank of Scotland's office, Edinburgh, against Martinmas then next: That the pursuer, Mr Lyon, was not then present; and though the declarant always intended that the pursuer, Mr Lyon, should subscribe the bill as drawer, he does not recollect at what precise time he signed it, nor whether he did so before Mr Baird's bankruptcy: That the declarant's impression is, that Mr Lyon was in England at the date of the bill, and that he subscribed it at one of his visits afterwards to Edinburgh, as he at that time generally resided in Scotland: That the declarant is certain that Mr Baird was present when the bill was filled up, as before mentioned, but Mr Butter was not present. Declares, That Mr Baird made no explanation to the declarant at the time he gave him the said stamp, as to the circumstances under which Mr Butter had put his name on the said stamp: That Mr Baird did not inform the declarant that Mr Butter was his debtor in the amount of the sum for which the bill was filled up. Declares, That the amount of the bill, when completed, was applied in paying debts of Mr Baird, as set forth in articles 2 and 6 of the pursuer's condescendence. Declares, That the declarant made no communication to the defender, Mr Butter, of the amount for which the said bill was drawn, or of the time when, and the place where, the bill was filled up as payable. Declares, That the declarant intended at the time, that the loan should be a permanent loan, to be given the debtors for some years. Declares, That he gave no notice to, and made no demand on, Mr Butter or Mr Baird when the bill fell due at Martinmas 1833: That the declarant's copartnership were at that time the law-agents of Mr Baird. Declares, That neither the declarant nor his copartnership made any claim on Mr Butter or Mr Baird, at Whitsunday or Martinmas 1834, for the interest on the said bill: That it was understood between Mr Baird and the declarant, at the time of the loan, that if the interest was paid once a-year, it would be sufficient; and by the term of Martinmas 1834, Mr Baird was on the eve of executing his trust-deed. Declares, That in making up a state of Mr Baird's affairs relative to his trust, along with Mr Baird, the declarant was led to understand that Mr Baird was to take this debt on himself; at least the declarant, on making inquiry at Mr Baird as to this debt, was led to believe that he was then to include it among the debts due by himself, though he also led the declarant to believe that there were unsettled accounts between him and Mr Butter: That when Mr Baird and the declarant were making up the said state, the declarant's impression was, that there would be a considerable reversion remaining to Mr Baird and his father, who had joined in the same trust, after liquidating the whole debts of the trustees; and it was under that impression that the declarant delayed making any demand on the defender Mr Butter: That Mr Baird requested the declarant to make no demand till he (Mr Baird) should see Mr Butter; and accordingly the declarant, without giving any promise to Mr Baird, postponed making any claim on Mr Butter: That the declarant is quite satisfied that the pursuer, Mr Lyon, made no intimation to, or claim upon the defender, Mr Butter, respecting this bill; but the declarant had frequent conversations with the pursuer on the subject. Interrogated, at what time the declarant first made a claim on the defender, Mr Butter, or his agent, for payment of the said bill, or informed him of the amount and terms in which it had been filled up? Declares, and answers, That he made no communication to the defender respecting the bill till recently before the letter written by the declarant or one of his partners, on 4th February 1837, to Mr Butter's agent: That at a personal interview between the declarant and the latter, the declarant informed him of the amount of the bill, and the term when the same was payable: That by this time the declarant anticipated that there would be a considerable deficiency in Mr Baird's funds. Interrogated, on the suggestion of Mr Butter's counsel, Whether any interest was ever paid or placed to Mr Lyon's credit in reference to the said bill? Declares, That there was not: That the declarant rendered states to the pursuer, Mr Lyon, of his accounts periodically, and these states showed that no interest had been paid by either of the obligants on the bill libelled on."

"13th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the record, and thereafter examined judicially Mr Isaac Bayley, agent for the pursuer, and resumed consideration of the whole process, with his declaration, Finds it established by the admissions or statements not denied upon record, as well as by the said judicial declaration, that the amount of the bill libelled on was, prior to the date thereof, owing to the pursuer by Mr Thomas Elder Baird as principal debtor, and that the pursuer had not previously any claim against the defender Mr Butter: 2do, Finds, that in July 1833, the pursuer having previously urged the principal debtor, Mr Baird, either for payment or security for the said debt, Mr Baird brought to the pursuer's agent, Mr Bayley, a bill stamp, with the names of the defender and Mr Baird subscribed thereon, and that otherwise the paper on which the said stamp was impressed was entirely blank: 3do, Finds it neither alleged, nor offered to be proved by the pursuer, that the defender, Mr Butter, was indebted to Mr Baird in the amount of the said bill; or otherwise, that Mr Baird made any representation to that effect to the pursuer or his agent: 4to, Finds that the said blank stamp was filled up by Mr Bayley, the pursuer's agent, on or about the 31st July 1833, as a bill intended to be subscribed by the pursuer as drawer, and making Messrs Baird and Butter joint acceptors for £932. 19. 6., payable at the Bank of Scotland's office in Edinburgh at Martinmas 1833; and the bill accordingly was afterwards subscribed by the pursuer as drawer: 5to, Finds that the said bill was so filled up by the pursuer's agent, outwith the presence of the defender Mr Butter; and that he sent no notice to the defender of the drawer's name, sum filled up, or of the time and place where the bill was payable: 6to, Finds, that when the said bill fell due at Martinmas 1833, it was not presented at the place of payment, or to either acceptors, and it was not paid or provided for by the principal debtor, while it is not alleged that that party was at that time, or for nearly a year afterwards, insolvent or in bad credit: 7mo, That when the said bill fell due as aforesaid, it was not protested for non-payment, and no notice was given by the pursuer to the defender, in any shape, that such a bill was in existence and held by the pursuer, and lying over unpaid; but that on the contrary, such notice appears to have been withheld or delayed at the request of Mr Baird, the principal debtor: Lastly, Finds that the first notice given to the defender Butter, by the pursuer or his agents, of the date, amount, and non-payment of the bill libelled on by the principal debtor, was on a certain day in the end of January or beginning of February 1837, being three years and a-half after the date of the bill, and more than three years and two months after the term of payment, and that, prior to that time, the principal debtor had become irretrievably bankrupt: Finds, under these special circumstances, that the pursuer is not now entitled to recover the amount of the bill libelled on from the defender, Mr Butter: Therefore, sustains the defences, and absolves him from the action: Finds no expenses due to either party, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has found that the pursuer is not now entitled to recover payment of the large balance libelled on from Mr Butter, the only defender for whom appearance is made, from a strong conviction that the claim against him cannot be maintained on those principles of law and of essential justice which ought to receive effect under the singular combination of circumstances in which it is now brought forward. At the same time, the Lord Ordinary is sensible that the case may be viewed by many Judges as one of great difficulty, from the weight of certain precedents in the law of bills in England, which at first sight may appear adverse to the defender's plea. As bills are juris gentium, these authorities deserve great consideration in every question of this sort. But while it is doubtful whether the precedents referred to can be adopted in Scotland, from the peculiar rules of our law as to the duties and rights of creditor and cautioner, it is thought that no preceding case on record is sufficient to support the claim of the pursuer, either in England or Scotland, under the specialities which here occur.

"It is a trite point in law, that an innocent third party, who onerously acquires a bill brought to him filled up and complete, cannot be met by any plea founded on the wrong or misdemeanour of another party who may have filled up a blank stamp in peculiar terms not known to the subscriber, and without the knowledge or privity of the indorsee. But the present is not a case of that description, as the blank condition of the writ, when it passed out of Mr Butter's hands, was visible to the pursuer or his agent (who acted throughout for his behoof) as they filled it up, and placed the pursuer himself in the position of drawer. In the next place, though it has been long established in law, that notice of non-payment need not be given to an acceptor; and it is farther provided by the Act 1st and 2d Geo. IV. cap. 78 (which a late author, on probable grounds, treats as applicable to Scotland, Thomson on Bills, p. 427), that the holder of a bill, made payable at a certain place, is not bound to present it there, unless it be made a condition of the acceptance that the bill be payable there, and not otherwise. Yet it seems necessary, in order to bring any case within these rules, that the acceptor should be informed, or have the means of knowing, in some way, the amount of the bill, and when and where it has been made payable, as his obligation to provide for it rests on the assumption that these facts are well known to all acceptors. The rules of law, now referred to, therefore must, in reason and justice, be reversed, when a party, who has taken delivery of a blank stamp, and placed himself in the position of the drawer thereof, is necessarily aware of the ignorance of the party whom he has made acceptor, of all the circumstances necessary for his discharge or relief from the obligation when due, and nevertheless does not inform, but rather withholds all communication of them to the acceptor. Hence, under the very peculiar circumstances of this case, it is difficult to resist the plea, which obviously arises to the defender, Mr Butter, that when the pursuer or his agent took possession of the blank writ, and filled it up with an obligation by the defender in favour of the pursuer for the large sum which it now bears, they were bound, either then or when the bill fell due, to give the pursuer that information which was absolutely necessary to enable him to provide for the bill, and to take proper measures for his own relief; or otherwise, they were bound to take steps at their own instance to compel the principal debtor to discharge the obligation when it fell due.

"In giving effect to this principle, under the specialities which here occur, it is not supposed that the security of the public in bills which have been put into circulation in the ordinary course of trade, will be in the least degree relaxed or put to hazard. The present decision is inapplicable to the case of bills at first signed blank, and delivered in a completed state to onerous indorsees. But when documents come into the hands of third parties visibly as blank writs, and when they fill them up and take benefit from them, it would be too much to hold that they are absolved from all duty towards the over-confiding subscribers, and are entitled to keep them ignorant, for an indefinite time, of the nature and terms of the contract which has been superinduced on their subscription. This would be virtually finding, that, in proportion as a party was unprotected, and had reposed exuberant confidence in his neighbour, parties cognisant of the trust, and profiting by it, could expose the obligant to great additional hazard, by withholding from them that information absolutely necessary to enable them to secure their relief. Such a plea would be repugnant to the first principles of law and equity.

"Farther, the specialties of the present case would, on the principles of the common law of Scotland, afford another plea to the defender, Mr Butter, entitled to great weight in equity. It seems quite incontestable, upon the state of the facts explained by Mr Bayley in his judicial declaration, and indeed admitted on record, that Mr Butter was a mere cautioner to the pursuer. This seems to be indisputable, as the pursuer admits that, before he got delivery of the blank bill, he had no claim on Mr Butter,—his original debt having been composed entirely of advances to Mr Baird. The pursuer, therefore, was peculiarly called on, when he filled up the blank bill, to give the surety such information as was necessary to enable him to operate his relief when the bill fell due, or, at all events, to do himself what was necessary for protection of the surety. Instead of that, Mr Bayley declares that, even when Mr Baird was so far embarrassed as to be obliged to grant a trust for behoof of his creditors, Mr Baird 'requested the declarant to make no demand till he (Mr Baird) should see Mr Butter, and, accordingly, the declarant, without giving any promise to Mr Baird, postponed making any claim on Mr Butter.' It is apprehended, that when the party who has filled up a blank stamp with a date, sum, and place of payment, wholly unknown to the subscribing cautioner, and has omitted to apprise that party, even on the embarrassment of the principal debtor, of the nature and particulars of the obligation, he is barred, on all the principles of law uniformly recognised in Scotland between creditor and cautioner, from afterwards maintaining any claim against the cautioner.

"But the Lord Ordinary hesitates to proceed on that ground exclusively, keeping in view certain precedents in the law of England, which, if fairly applicable to Scots bills, would be decisive against the plea. It appears that of late the question has been repeatedly mooted in England, whether the holder of a bill giving time to the drawer, when he is the principal debtor, liberates the acceptor, known to the holder to be a mere surety? This seems to have been a questio vexata in English practice for the last thirty years; and the fluctuations in the opinions of the different Courts on the point, is well exhibited by Mr Thomson in his last edition, pp. 365–66. The decisions in all the cases referred to, however, manifestly proceeded on the assumption that the cautioner-acceptors, charged for the bills, always knew at least the sum, date, and place of payment of the bills sued for, and with such knowledge allowed them to lie over. But the plea of Mr Butter, in the present instance, is of a different and more cogent nature, when he pleads that the holder who filled up the blank bill gave him no information, till after the principal debtor's bankruptcy, either that he had drawn such a bill, or that it was left unpaid at maturity.

"It is obvious, however, that the present case is not that of a principal debtor who has drawn a bill accepted by the cautioner for his accommodation. The drawer here was himself the creditor, and the principal debtor and the cautioner were made joint acceptors. In such a case, some doubt appears to have been entertained at one period in England, whether the drawer could give time to the one acceptor, who is principal debtor, without the consent of the other joint obligant, who is a mere surety. But certainly the law seems now to be settled by a late case (Price against Edmonds, 10 B. and Cr., 578), and other authorities, that the giving time by a drawer in England to a joint acceptor who is principal debtor, does not liberate the other obligants. As these judgments, however, in a great measure proceed on the presumption that the obligant knew when and where his obligation was payable, and wilfully omitted to provide for it, the ground of decision is inapplicable to a question where the surety, though in form a principal, got no information whatever on these points from the creditor who filled up the bill.

"Besides, with reference to all of the English cases on the point last noticed, the Lord Ordinary must be permitted to express great doubt whether they do not proceed on technical grounds peculiar to the English law, and in a great measure inapplicable to our practice. For example, it seems to be laid down in England, that a creditor holding a variety of parties bound to him as principal debtors on the face of the instrument, is entitled to treat them all as principals, and to act without reference to the peculiar interests and pleas competent to the obligants who are cautioners. But that clearly is not the law of Scotland. When a party bound ex figura as a principal is truly a cautioner, within the knowledge of the creditor, the creditor can do nothing to injure or put to hazard the right of the cautioner. He loses his recourse if he gives time to the principal debtor, as exemplified in the cases of Stirling against Forrester (1 Shaw, Appeal Cases, p. 37), and Hume against Youngson, in 1830 (8 Shaw, p. 295), and cases there cited; and generally, the long-established rule of the Scots law is laid down by Erskine, when he states: 'The cautionary obligation ceaseth if the creditor shall do any act which hath a tendency even to weaken the cautioner's right of relief.'—Erskine, B. III. t. 3, § 66.

"There appears, however, to be other very essential distinctions between the rights of Scots and English sureties, which materially affect the present question. Thus, it is laid down in the law of England, that the obligation of a party to relieve a surety, who has accepted a bill for his behoof, does not arise till he has actually paid the bill (see Thomson on Bills, p. 367); while in Scotland, unquestionably, an action of relief is competent to the surety at any period after he has become bound, whether he has retired the bill or not. In like manner, it seems quite settled in the law of England, that joint obligants in bills and bonds have no summary relief against the principal debtor, even when they have paid up the debt, but must proceed by a separate suit. But the law of Scotland has stood differently from a very early period; and a surety, though bound as a joint obligant, when compelled to pay a bond or bill, may demand an assignation or indorsation from the creditor to enable him, by summary diligence, to enforce instant payment under the original obligation from the principal debtor.—See 1 Bell, p. 348; Thomson's Treatise on Bills, pp. 580, 581, and cases there referred to. In particular, the case of Erskine against Manderston (Fac. Coll., 14th January 1780; Dict. p. 1386,) deserves attention, as, in that instance, one of two joint acceptors of a bill was found entitled to an assignation, for the very purpose of enabling him to do summary diligence against his co-obligant. The pursuer, however, obviously put it out of the power of Mr Butter to avail himself of these remedies competent to a cautioner by our law, when they could be effectual for his relief.

"This peculiarity in our practice, whereby sureties, or assignees for their behoof, have power, by summary diligence, to operate their relief against the principal debtor, renders it more peculiarly incumbent on any creditor in Scotland, who has converted a skeleton bill to his own use, to apprise every known surety, at least, without any unnecessary delay, of the position in which he has been made to stand by the filling up of the bill, so as the cautioner may be enabled to take all necessary measures in due time for his own relief. On these views the Lord Ordinary has held that the defender is entitled to be absolved from this action."

At advising,

Lord Gillies.—I fear the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be altered. When a party subscribes a blank bill, he is, or ought to be aware that he is considered as an acceptor, and subjects himself to all the liabilities of an acceptor. The only question here is, was Butter an acceptor? Aye or no? If an acceptor, he may still show that the acceptance was obtained by fraud, and escape from the obligation which it would otherwise impose upon him; for I do not see that fraud might not be pleaded in a case of this kind, as in any other case. But if the acceptance was given without fraud, then Butter, as the acceptor, is truly the debtor in the bill, and has incurred all the liabilities, and subjected himself to all the exceptions which attach to him as the debtor. How then stands the case? Baird is indebted to Lyon, and not finding it convenient to pay, offers security. For this purpose he applies to Butter. I don't know what he said, and it is of no consequence; for what he said cannot affect Lyon. The result is, that he returns with a blank bill signed by Butter, and without explanation delivers it to Mr Bayley, who happens to be both his own agent and Lyon's too. Say he had given it to Lyon himself,—what then? Lyon would have been entitled to make the best use of it he could, and for that purpose to make Butter the acceptor. If this was his right, the agent did nothing more than his duty in securing it for him. There is nothing on the face of the bill to give any indication of fraud, and it is not a slight indication that would do; for in a case of this kind the proof must be pregnant. The fraud must be clearly brought home to the creditor. Holding, then, that Butter was fairly made acceptor, he is not entitled to plead delay in the demand of payment. This is fixed; and fixed, I think, in accordance with expediency, as it must tend to put gentlemen on their guard, and let them know that if they do sign blank bills, the consequence is that they will be treated as acceptors.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. This case falls under the rule of law, that a party who signs a blank stamp, makes himself answerable for the largest sum which can be drawn for on that stamp. I understand that to be the law, without the qualification that notice should be given of the bill being filled up to the person who thus subscribes it. Perhaps an Act of Parliament, requiring that such notice should be given, would be a good one. But there is no such Act. I am not aware that in any one of the cases in which such effect has been given to blank stamps, any immediate notice was given of the stamps being filled up. Here Mr Butter put the stamp out of his hands with his name adhibited to it, and by so doing he rendered himself liable to be made acceptor for any sum within the stamp. It is said that he stipulated that his liability should only subsist for a limited period. If he had put that on the back of the stamp, there would have been something in it. But no such thing was done. So if it had been offered to be proved by Lyon's oath, that he knew of Butter having stipulated for a limitation of his obligation, that would have made the matter different. But there is no such offer, and no proof to that effect. And I do not think any thing has been elicited from the examination of the party's agent which can affect his claim. I think that examination was irregular; and we certainly never intended, when we refused to allow the examination of the party himself, that his agent should be examined. There is no evidence of fraud in the case; and there being none, what is there? If Butter had a right to any thing, it was to instant notice of the bill having been filled up. But that, as I have already said, I think he was not entitled to.

Lord Fullerton.—The general rule is perfectly established. It is held, and I think justly, that a party signing a blank bill gives a power or mandate to the receiver to avail himself of it in any form which the signature admits, and to fill it up to the amount carried by the stamp. This is fixed beyond question by decisions which are not at all affected by the case of Drum. For in that case it was specifically alleged that the bill was delivered for a particular purpose, and that it was perverted from that purpose under circumstances which made it very questionable if the holder was not aware of the perversion, and liable for the consequences of it. Now if, in the present case, Baird had taken the bill to Lyon, and got him, while cognisant of the circumstances, to fill up the bill without procuring Baird's signature at all, there might have been some ground for holding that the case of Drum applied. But nothing of the kind can be alleged here. The bill was signed as an accommodation, and it was applied as an accommodation. No doubt it is said that the accommodation was not intended to exceed £200 or £300 for two or three months; but we cannot listen to this. The amount intended must be measured by the sum which the stamp covered. But it is said that Butter did not receive notice, and that he was entitled to receive it. This plea was expressly disregarded in the case of Taylor, and I think justly; for I am not able to see with Lord Mackenzie, that any advantage would be gained by an Act of Parliament making notice imperative in such circumstances as the present. For when one individual puts that exuberant confidence in another which is implied in giving him his signature to a blank bill, the party who becomes creditor in the bill, is entitled to think that the individual who was accommodated will himself give due notice to his friend. At all events, that friend is bound, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, to inquire. The fair presumption is, that one or other of these things will be done, and that the creditor, therefore, is not called upon to interfere. Stronger cases than the present have occurred, where it was held that the acceptor was not entitled to notice.

Lord President.—From the moment I read the note of the Lord Ordinary, I was satisfied that great consideration would be necessary before the judgment could be adhered to, and I was glad when I knew that the cause was to be so ably argued on both sides. Now, after the fullest consideration, I am satisfied with your Lordships that the interlocutor must be altered. First, I entirely agree as to the general rule, fixed by various decisions, that after a party has signed a blank bill, and delivered it, he is responsible for the full amount of the sum that the stamp will cover. There may be cases of fraud, where the acceptor might have a good exception against the holder of the bill; but where fraud is alleged, it must be distinctly proved. It cannot be presumed. On the contrary, in cases like the present, the presumption is, that the party who signed the blank bill gave full authority to the person to whom he gave it, to use it in any way he pleased. Is there any thing, in the circumstances of the present case, to defeat this presumption? If I had been present when the authority was given to examine Mr Bayley, I would have had much doubt as to its propriety. The examination, however, has been taken, and we cannot now shut our eyes to it;—but to what does it amount? It appears that Baird made a communication to Lyon's agent, stating his inability to pay a former bill, but offering to give security, by obtaining Butter's acceptance to a new one. The agent professes his willingness, as far as he is concerned, to delay till that acceptance is produced. Then, on a future day, Baird comes forward with this blank bill on a stamp sufficient to cover the amount of his debt. Had it been for a smaller sum, Mr Bayley might have said, "I cannot go into the transaction; I must have payment, or sufficient security for the whole." He sees, however, that the stamp is sufficient, and he had no occasion to inquire farther. What had he to do with what passed between Mr Butter and Mr Baird? It is very possible that Mr Butter's account of what passed is correct, but that cannot overbalance the fact, that by signing the blank stamp he put himself entirely in the other's power. Whatever cause there may be for Mr Butter's complaint, it cannot affect either Mr Lyon or his agent. I cannot see any thing wrong in Mr Bayley's conduct. As Lord Gillies has said, he did no more than he was bound to do for the interest of his constituent. As to the necessity of notice, there was nothing that called for it from Mr Lyon. It was entirely Mr Butter's affair; and though he doubtless might have been entitled to it from Mr Baird, his not receiving it, cannot in any way exempt him from liability for the debt. Indeed, the Lord Ordinary seems to admit that the general rule of law is against him, but he thinks there are specialties which take this case out of the general rule. I feel obliged to be of a different opinion.

The Court altered the interlocutor, and decerned in terms of the libel.

No. 41.—THE REV. DAVID DEWAR and OTHERS,
Suspenders, v. ALEXANDER PETERKIN, Defender.

Process—Remit ob contingentiam—Circumstances in which a motion to remit a cause ob contingentiam from one Lord Ordinary to another, was refused.

Process—Decree in Absence—Suspension—A suspension of a decree in absence having been enrolled before a Lord Ordinary who had not pronounced the original decree, he pronounced an interlocutor remitting the case to the proper Lord Ordinary. A reclaiming note complaining of the interlocutor was refused. —Opinion, That the more regular course was to have allowed the case to be withdrawn, and enrolled of new before the proper Lord Ordinary.

The majority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie having been suspended by the General Assembly on the 1st June 1840, and the present suspenders having been appointed a special commission to co-operate with the minority of the Presbytery "in providing for the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the ordinances of religion, and the exercise of discipline" in the parishes of the suspended ministers during their suspension,—they presented to the Court of Session a note of suspension and interdict against the said sentence and commission. The note was called in the Outer-House rolls, but no appearance was entered for the present suspenders. On the 20th July 1841, Lord Cuninghame decerned in the following terms:

"Sitting in judgment, the said Lords suspended and interdicted, and hereby suspend and interdict, as craved; declared and hereby declare the interdict perpetual; and decerned and hereby decern: Farther, on the 20th day of July 1841 years, decerned and ordained, and hereby decern and ordain, the respondents to make payment to Alexander Peterkin, Solicitor Supreme Courts, agent disburser, of the sum of £120. 6. 4., being the taxed amount of expenses of process, and £1. 11. 2. as the dues of extracting this decree," &c.

The respondent extracted the decree of suspension and interdict, and ordered a charge to be given to the present suspenders for payment of the expenses decerned for. The suspenders presented a note of suspension and interdict, which was passed on consignment of the amount charged for in the hands of the clerk to the bills, in terms of the Statute. The suspension was enrolled in Lord Cockburn's Outer-House roll for Wednesday the 17th; but an objection having been taken, that the case should have been enrolled before the Judge who pronounced the original decree, in terms of the 1st and 2d Vict. c. 86, § 5, Lord Cockburn, on the 18th November, remitted the suspension to Lord Cuninghame. Against this interlocutor the suspenders reclaimed.

On the 6th November, there was enrolled in the Outer-House roll, to be called on the 10th, before Lord Cockburn, a summons of reduction of the suspension and interdict, in which the decree for expenses was pronounced, and it was moved that this process also should be remitted to Lord Cuninghame ob contingentiam. The ground stated was, that there had appeared in the same weekly rolls, to be called before Lord Cuninghame on the 9th November, a summons of reduction of the General Assembly's sentence of deposition against the majority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie, pronounced 27th May 1841. The Lord Ordinary took this motion to report, in order that it might be disposed of at the same time with the reclaiming note.

Argued for the Presbytery of Strathbogie—

That it was clear, upon the Statute, that Peterkin's case must be remitted to Lord Cuninghame; and that between the reduction of the suspension of the sentence suspending the ministers of Strathbogie, and the reduction at their instance of the sentence of deposition pronounced against them by the General Assembly, there was not only contingency, but identity. By the Act of Sederunt, 28th December 1838, it is specially declared, "that when such contingent causes shall be brought, for the first time, before two or more Lords Ordinary in the same weekly rolls of new causes, the cause enrolled before the senior Lord Ordinary shall (provided the enrolment is regular) be deemed the first or leading process, and the other Lords Ordinary shall remit the contingent causes to the said senior Judge." But the suspension sought to be reduced, cannot be said to be a cause brought into Court for the first time: it formerly depended before Lord Cuninghame. Before whom, also, there depends two other cases involving the same points, viz., Edwards v. the Minority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie, and the Earl of Kinnoull v. the Presbytery of Auchterarder.

Answered for the Commission of Assembly—

The only contingency which subsists must be between the reduction of the suspension, and the suspension of Mr Peterkin's charge. But the Court must dispose of the motion to have the reduction of the suspension remitted to Lord Cuninghame, in the same manner as the Lord Ordinary must have done at the time when the motion was first made. The suspension of the charge was not then in Court, nor for a week after. It is not yet before Lord Cuninghame. That the suspension sought to be reduced was originally before Lord Cuninghame, is no ground for remitting it to him. A suspension of a decree in absence must by Statute be enrolled before the Judge who pronounced the decree; and we offered to withdraw the suspension of Peterkin's charge from Lord Cockburn's roll, and enrol it before Lord Cuninghame. But this rule does not apply to reductions of extracted decrees. Parties have the privilege of choosing the Lord Ordinary before whom they will bring their cause; and the Act of Sederunt, section 38, is express, that where two contingent causes appear for the first time in the same weekly rolls, the cause enrolled before the senior Lord Ordinary shall be the leading cause. It is said that the reduction of the suspension is not a new cause, but the decret sought to be reduced has been extracted and out of Court: it is clearly, therefore, a new cause. As to the analogous cases of Edwards and the Earl of Kinnoull, the parties are not the same; and it might as well be contended that a case of entail should be remitted to one Division of the Court and to one Lord Ordinary, because there happens to depend, at the same time, other cases of entail before the same Division and the same Lord Ordinary. It is submitted, therefore, that while the reclaiming note may be refused, we are entitled to judgment on the case reported.

At advising,

Lord Moncreiff.—We can discover from the papers and statements in this case, that it may involve questions of very great importance. But the matter at present before the Court is of no importance, except to this extent, that we take care that the excitements to which these cases may give rise, do not lead us to sanction any irregularity in the form of process. In itself, it is of no consequence before what Ordinary or what Division of the Court the case may depend; for if the questions involved are of great importance, I think the probability is, that they will be submitted to the consideration of all the Judges. But we must judge of the matter now before us. The case which has been reported by Lord Cockburn, is an action of reduction of a decree pronounced by Lord Cuninghame, and which has been extracted and taken entirely out of Court. This action of reduction appeared in Lord Cockburn's printed roll on the 10th of November, and the question proposed to us is, whether this process ought to be remitted to Lord Cuninghame ob contingentiam of certain other processes depending before his Lordship; for I think it is clear that there is no such thing as remitting a process from one Lord Ordinary to another, or from one Division to another, independent of some other process with which it is contingent, so as to render it expedient that both proceedings should proceed before the same Ordinary or Division de futuro. In the case of Gibson v. Stewart, 15th June 1827, it was decided that it was incompetent for one Division of the Court to remit to the other, unless there was an actual depending process before them, to which, ob contingentiam, it could be remitted; and least of all would it be competent so to remit, when the former proceedings were in absence of the party. Now, to what process do the defenders ask this reduction to be remitted? When it was called in Lord Cockburn's printed roll on 10th November, to what process could it then have been remitted? The mere fact of the decree in absence having been pronounced by Lord Cuninghame, is no reason for such a remit. If an action is brought for payment of £100, and decree in absence is pronounced and extracted, it was surely never thought of, that when a reduction of that decree is raised, it must depend before the Lord Ordinary who pronounced the decree in absence. That was never proposed. It may be true that a different rule holds as to suspensions, but as to a reduction of a decree in absence, there is no reason for remitting it to the Lord Ordinary who pronounced the decree under reduction. What else then is there? It is stated that there is a reduction of a sentence of deposition pronounced by the General Assembly, which action has been called in Lord Cuninghame's roll. If there was a legal contingency between that action and the reduction of the decree in absence—and perhaps there may: still it is clear, that by the Act of Sederunt, passed in 1838, both of these actions ought to depend before Lord Cockburn, as senior Lord Ordinary; both being, in the express terms of that Act, in the same weekly rolls of new causes. If there was any legal contingency between these two actions, the action called before Lord Cuninghame should rather have been remitted to that before Lord Cockburn. The defenders referred to the other processes, but they are not between the same parties, and have indeed no legal affinity to this. Indeed Mr Robertson, in reply, confined himself, on this point, to the action at the instance of Mr Edwards, which, in my opinion, has no legal contingency with the present, especially as explained by Mr Bell in reply. So matters stood on the 10th of November, when the motion was made to remit the reduction to Lord Cuninghame ob contingentiam. No doubt, next week a suspension of a charge by Mr Peterkin, for the expenses of one of the processes of suspension and interdict, came before Lord Cockburn. This is the subject of the reclaiming note, and Lord Cockburn has remitted it to Lord Cuninghame, on the ground, that being a suspension of a decree in absence, it must, in terms of the Act of Parliament, be laid before the Ordinary who pronounced the decree. But the object of the rule was to expedite the proceedings. That case must be disposed of on the reclaiming note; but what effect this shall have on the reduction, when both shall be regularly in dependence, I shall give no opinion. Between the two, however, it is certain that there is a contingency. Holding that the suspension goes before Lord Cuninghame, whether in the form proposed by the Lord Ordinary, or in any other form, the reduction must be regarded as the leading process, having been in Court a week before the suspension appeared in any roll. The result, in my opinion, is, that we are not at present in a situation to instruct Lord Cockburn to remit, as proposed, to Lord Cuninghame. It may come to that; but I do not think it is competent just now: and we should so find. As to the reclaiming note, that appears to me a simple matter. I think it is unlucky that Lord Cockburn did not assent to the proposal to allow the suspension to be scored out as irregularly enrolled before him. But Lord Cockburn remits to Lord Cuninghame. The regular course was to allow it to be withdrawn from his roll. Still it will make no material difference if we were now to adhere to the interlocutor. On the whole, while I think that the most regular course would be to remit to Lord Cockburn, with instructions to allow this action to be withdrawn from his roll, and let it be enrolled before Lord Cuninghame, I am willing, if your Lordships do not think that this is the best course, to adhere to the interlocutor.

Lord Meadowbank.—After much consideration, I have come to coincide with Lord Moncreiff generally. I think we are bound to consider the state of matters when the two processes were enrolled. At that time there was no process before Lord Cuninghame that required the reduction to be remitted to him. Lord Cockburn was the senior Lord Ordinary, and the provision in the Act of Sederunt, 1838, is clear and precise, that the action before him was to be considered as the leading process. As to the suspension, I think it was not incompetent for Lord Cockburn to remit it to Lord Cuninghame, though it might have been more regular to have allowed it to be withdrawn. I give no opinion whatever as to what shall be the effect when this action is enrolled before Lord Cuninghame. I understand that the object of the law, as to the enrolling of suspensions of decrees in absence before the Ordinary who pronounced the original decrees, was this, that as the original pursuer had his right of option of the Lord Ordinary; so by decree being allowed to pass in absence, the other party might not deprive him of his election. I give no opinion as to what may be the judgment of the other Division, if the case should be brought before them, after it is enrolled before Lord Cuninghame. All that we now do is, to remedy the mistake for which the defenders in the action of reduction are certainly not answerable, but for which the pursuers in that action are. I think we should refuse the reclaiming note, and let the case go before Lord Cuninghame. As to the report of Lord Cockburn, I think we are not in hoc statu warranted to pronounce any order, except, perhaps, to refuse the motion from the bar hoc statu.

Lord Medwyn.—I do not think it is necessary, in a point of this kind, to give any detailed opinion, after those delivered by your Lordships, with which I concur.

Lord Justice-Clerk declined.

The Court refused the reclaiming note, and also the motion from the bar hoc statu.

No. 43.—JAMES GRAHAM, Raiser, v. Captain THOMAS MACINTOSH and MRS JANE GORDON or MACINTOSH, Claimants.

Provision to Children—Parent and Child—Liferent and Fee.—A father, in contemplation of the marriage of his natural daughter, bound himself, for love and favour, to make payment to her of a sum of money, and that to her in liferent during all the days of her lifetime, secluding the jus mariti of her intended husband, and to the children of the marriage in fee, whom failing, to the husband—Held that the wife was far.

In 1825, Alexander Duke of Gordon, "in contemplation of an intended marriage" between Jane Gordon, his natural daughter, and Lachlan Macintosh, executed a bond of provision, in which, "for the love, favour and affection" which he had to the said Jane Gordon, he bound himself, his heirs and successors, to make payment to her,

"at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the said intended marriage, of the sum of £5000 Sterling, and that to the said Jane Gordon, in liferent, during all the days of her lifetime, secluding the jus mariti of the said Lachlan Macintosh, her intended husband, and to the children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, in fee, and that in such proportions as the said Jane Gordon and Lachlan Macintosh shall appoint by any writing under their hands, and failing thereof, to the said children, equally among them, share and share alike, or failing issue of the said intended marriage, then to the said Lachlan Macintosh in fee."

The Duke of Gordon farther bound himself and his foreaids,

"to make payment to the said Jane Gordon, during all the days of her lifetime, secluding the jus mariti of the said Lachlan Macintosh, of a free liferent annuity of £200:" "Declaring that the said annuity, and also the interest of the foresaid sum of £5000 Sterling, shall be payable upon the receipt of the said Jane Gordon alone, during her lifetime; and declaring also, that in case I, the said Duke, or my foreaids, shall incline to pay up the foresaid sum of £5000, we shall be entitled to do so at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, on giving six months' notice to that effect; and in that event, the foresaid sum of £5000 shall be again lent out and reinvested on good and sufficient security, at the sight and to the satisfaction of the Most Noble George Marquis of Huntly, Adam Gordon, Esq. of Newton, and Captain John Anderson of Candacraig, or the survivors or survivor of them,—the security to be taken in the same terms as are above expressed: And in order to secure the reinvestment of the foresaid sum of £5000 as aforesaid, it is hereby declared to be necessary that the discharge to me or my foreaids shall be granted with the consent of the said George Marquis of Huntly, Adam Gordon and Captain John Anderson, or the survivors or survivor of them, as trustees, for the purpose of carrying the said reinvestment into effect: And I hereby revoke and recal all bonds of provision granted by me at any time of my life, to and in favour of the said Jane Gordon, my daughter."

In 1829, after the Duke of Gordon's death, the £5000 having been paid up by his trustees on the joint receipt and discharge of Mr and Mrs Macintosh and Captain Anderson (who alone of the three individuals mentioned in the bond of provision accepted of the appointment), was paid over to Mr Macintosh, who granted bond for it in terms of the Duke of Gordon's bond of provision. Mr Macintosh then lent it out to Alexander Fraser, Esq., now Lord Lovat,—£120 on personal security, and £4880 on a redeemable annuity for £411, secured by an heritable bond over the barony of Lovat, and made payable to Captain Anderson and William Hackney Kerr, as trustees for Mr and Mrs Macintosh and their children. In order to secure the ultimate repayment of the £5000, two insurances were effected in the name of these trustees,—one for £5000 on the life of Lord Lovat, and another for £2500 on the life of Mrs Macintosh; and for keeping up these insurances, it was provided by a deed of agreement and declaration of trust, that the annuity of £411, as uplifted by the trustees, should be applied, in the first instance, in payment of the premiums. The residue of the annuity, in so far as it did not exceed the legal interest of £5000, was to be paid to Mrs Macintosh, secluding her husband's jus mariti. In the event of the annuity being redeemed, or the sum insured on the annuitant's life becoming payable in the lifetime of Mrs Macintosh, her husband, his heirs and successors, were taken bound, on receiving an assignment to the insurance on her life, to reinvest the full sum of £5000 in terms of the Duke of Gordon's bond of provision; and on the other hand, in the event of the annuity subsisting till her death, the sum insured on her life was to be employed, pro tanto, in payment of the bond which her husband had granted for the £5000. The residue of that bond, so far as not provided for by the sums recovered from the insurance on Mrs Macintosh's life, was to be provided for "by a sale or transfer of the said annuity, or such part thereof as may be requisite for that purpose, and that within such time after the death of Mrs Macintosh as the parties concerned may agree upon, and the remainder of said annuity, or of the prices or proceeds thereof, if the whole is sold, shall belong or be assigned over to the said Lachlan Macintosh, his heirs or assignees, and his foresaid bond for the said sum of £5000 Sterling shall be delivered up to him discharged."

Two children were born of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Macintosh, but one only, a son, survived his father, who died intestate in 1832. Thereafter, Mr William Paul was appointed factor loco tutoris to the son, who continued to reside with his mother till circumstances occurred which the Court deemed sufficient to warrant his removal. An order to that effect was given, but Mrs Macintosh secretly withdrew with him to Boulogne, where he died in 1839, while measures were in progress to enforce the authority of the Court. In the meantime, the trustees, Captain Anderson and Mr Hackney Kerr, having died, an application was made to the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor. Mr James Graham was accordingly appointed ad interim, and brought the present process of multiplepinding for the purpose of having it determined to whom the fee of the £5000, and the relative securities, belonged. In this process he called as competing claimants, Mrs Macintosh and Captain Thomas Macintosh, the only surviving brother and sole next of kin of her late husband, Mr Lachlan Macintosh. Appearance was also made by James Macintosh, who was the son of Mr Lachlan Macintosh's immediate elder brother, and claimed as heir of conquest, on the supposition that the sum had been rendered heritable. During the dependence James Macintosh died; and as he was succeeded by Captain Thomas Macintosh, the competition was ultimately limited to the two parties originally called. A preliminary objection was taken by Captain Macintosh, on the ground that Mr Graham, who only held the appointment of judicial factor ad interim, had not a sufficient title to raise the process,—more especially as the permanent appointment had been conferred not on him but on Mr Kenneth Mackenzie. The Lord Ordinary repelled the objection, and held the summons as a condescendence by Mr Mackenzie of the fund in medio.

Mrs Macintosh claimed—1. The fee of the £5000 contained in the Duke of Gordon's bond of provision, or at least one-half thereof as jus relicta, or as due to her by the rules of succession applicable to the domicile of her son at the time of his death.

2. In the event of its being found that she had a liferent interest merely in the fund, she claimed that the annuity be paid over to her by the judicial factor, under deduction of such a proportion only of the premiums of insurance as may correspond to her interest in the fund as liferentrix.

3. In the same event, she claimed her jus relicta from the policy for £2500.

Captain Macintosh claimed the principal sum of £5000 as the fiar of the provisions contained in the Duke of Gordon's bond, and the subsequent deeds executed in relation thereto.

The Lord Ordinary ordered mutual cases on the whole cause.

Pleaded by Mrs Macintosh—

1. The sum was plainly designed as a provision for her. It was bestowed on her account. She was the daughter of the granter, and she was also, per expressum, the grantee. The affection of the granter towards her, embodied into an intention to make a suitable provision for her, was the inductive cause of granting the bond. The granter accordingly bound himself and his heirs "to make payment to the said Jane Gordon." This is a perfect, and, so far as she is concerned, an absolute and unqualified obligation to pay the sum to her. It may be quite true, that failing the claimant, the granter did intend the sum to go to the issue of the marriage, and that, failing both the claimant and issue, he meant to give a contingent interest to the husband; but it never can be maintained that he intended to promote either the right of the heir of a deceased child, or the right of the heir of the husband, over the right of his own daughter. 2. Independently of the intention, the words used vest the fee in her according to the established rule in law, that a conveyance to a parent in liferent, and to children nascituri in fee, without a nomination of trustees, or the use of the term allenary, or other terms to signify that the parent is himself constituted trustee for the children, vests the fee in the parent. It may be said that the bond does contain an appointment of trustees; but then it ought to be observed, that these trustees were not constituted creditors. The granter does not convey the sum to them in the event of its being paid up. On the contrary, he framed the bond so as to make and keep his daughter the creditor, and the only creditor. He vested no fiduciary right in any one, either for the behoof of the children, or, failing them, for behoof of Mr Macintosh. The sole object of the appointment of trustees was to secure the reinvestment of the fund, in the event of its being paid up, so that it might not be dissipated, but reserved entire for the use of his daughter. A strong confirmation of this view is the fact, that the jus mariti is expressly excluded. As Mrs Macintosh is prepared to rest her case substantially on the plea that the fee vested in her, it seems unnecessary to enlarge on the alternative heads of her claim.

Pleaded by Captain Macintosh—

The effect of the destination in the bond was to vest the fee of the £5000 in the son as the sole issue of the marriage. Even in feudal rights, to which the technical rule as to a fee never being in pendente properly applies, whenever the words of conveyance to a parent, and to children nascituri of a liferent and fee respectively, are such as clearly import a limitation of the parent's right, the fee, though ex necessitate in the parent, is only fiduciary. When the conveyance is of a sum of money, where of course no feudal technicality interferes, the intention, expressed or presumed, of the granter alone regulates the conveyance. Accordingly, it will be found, that wherever there is an indication of intention to secure the fee to the children, whether by words restraining the right of the parent, or providing for implement to the children, the destination is held to give a beneficial destination to the latter. In the case of a trust unaccompanied with taxative expressions, it has been held that the effect of it is to give the fee to the children. In the present case, not merely does the whole tenor of the bond show that it was intended to give a bare right of liferent to Mrs Macintosh, and to protect the fee for the issue of the marriage, but there is also a trust created sufficient to keep separate and distinct the several estates of liferent and fee. Were it possible to put a different construction on the conveyance, the more probable construction would be, that the fee vested not in this wife, but in the husband as the persona dignior.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"4th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this multiplepounding, and thereafter advised the revised cases, writs produced, and whole process—Finds that the late Alexander Duke of Gordon, in 1825, granted a personal bond for £5000 Sterling in favour of Jane Gordon, his acknowledged daughter, afterwards wife of Lachlan Macintosh, which bond proceeded solely on the narrative of 'the love, favour, and affection which his Grace had and bore to the said Jane Gordon,' and on no other inductive cause; and that on that narrative the Duke bound and obliged himself, and his heirs, 'to make payment to the said Jane Gordon at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the said intended marriage, of the sum of £5000 Sterling, and that to the said Jane Gordon, in liferent, during all the days of her lifetime, excluding the jus mariti of the said Lachlan Macintosh, her intended husband, and to the children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, in fee, and that in such proportions as the said Jane Gordon and Lachlan Macintosh shall appoint, by any writing under their hands, and failing thereof, to the said children equally among them, share and share alike, or failing issue of the said intended marriage, then to the said Lachlan Macintosh in fee.' That it was farther provided in a subsequent clause of the said bond, that in case the said Duke, or his forebears, should 'incline to pay up the foresaid sum of £5000, he shall be entitled to do so at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, on giving six months' notice to that effect, and in that event, the foresaid sum of £5000 shall be again lent out and reinvested on good and sufficient security, at the sight, and to the satisfaction of the Most Noble George Marquis of Huntly, Adam Gordon, Esq. of Newton, and Captain John Anderson of Candacraig, or the survivors or survivor of them, the security to be taken in the same terms as are above expressed; and in order to secure the reinvestment of the foresaid sum of £5000 as aforesaid, it is hereby declared to be necessary that the discharge to me or my forebears shall be granted with the consent of the said George Marquis of Huntly, Adam Gordon, and Captain John Anderson, or the survivors or survivor of them, as trustees for the purpose of carrying the said reinvestment into effect.' Finds that the said Lachlan Macintosh was, soon after the date of the said bond, married to the said Jane Gordon, but that it does not appear from any documents produced, or otherwise, that he made any settlement on his spouse on that occasion: Finds that, notwithstanding the seclusion of his jus mariti contained in the said bond, the said Lachlan Macintosh was allowed, by the only trustee who acted under the said bond, to intromit with and uplift the said sum of £5000 in the year 1830, on a consent obtained from Mrs. Macintosh during her coverture; that the said sum was invested by Macintosh in the purchase of a redeemable annuity from Thomas Fraser, Esq., then of Lovat, now Lord Lovat; and the repayment of the capital was secured on certain policies of insurance effected by Macintosh on the life of Lovat and his wife, the premiums of which were annually provided for out of the annuities payable by Lord Lovat in consideration of the said £5000: Finds that the marriage between the said Mrs Jane Gordon and Lachlan Macintosh was dissolved by the death of Macintosh in 1832, and that Alexander Adam Gordon Macintosh was the only surviving child of the marriage, but that he died in pupillarity in 1839: Finds that the legal rights of Mrs Jane Gordon in the sum, as secured to her by the said bond at the date of the marriage, cannot be affected by the transactions of the said Lachlan Macintosh subsequent thereto, which were hazardous and prejudicial to her, and unauthorised by the bond, and that the husband's heir cannot found on any deed or deeds of consent obtained by him from his wife stante matrimonio: Finds that Mrs Jane Gordon is now entitled to repudiate and recal the same, and that she has, by a competent deed produced, recalled her consent: Finds that according to the terms and conception of the said original deed, and under the admitted state of the fact, that both the child of the marriage and the said Lachlan Macintosh have predeceased his wife, the prospective but contingent interest of these parties, under the substitution in the bond, has now ceased, and that the sole interest in the fund secured by the said bond, and the right of uplifting, disposing, and burdening the same at pleasure, is vested in the claimant Mrs Jane Gordon; and in respect it is not denied that the fund in medio consists of money to be realised under the foresaid policies, which must be held as a surrogatum for the amount of the original bond, uplifted by Lachlan Macintosh as aforesaid, finds, on the whole matter, that the same is now claimable by the said Mrs Jane Gordon, and prefers her accordingly to the fund in medio: Finds no expenses hitherto incurred due to either party, and decerns.

"Note.—The claim of Mrs Macintosh to the property and control of her own fortune, under the whole circumstances articulately detailed in the interlocutor, appear to the Lord Ordinary to be so strongly founded in justice, that he should have regretted if any rules of strict law had prevented him from giving effect to it. But it is apprehended that the authorities which fix the legal construction of the principal documents on which the question turns, decisively support the plea of Mrs Macintosh.

"In the outset, it is supposed to be quite clear that the rights of this lady must be ascertained and governed by the terms of the bond under which the original portion was bestowed on her by her father. The fund stood on that bond at the date of the marriage. The jus mariti of the husband was strictly excluded, and therefore no transaction or arrangement which be prevailed on his wife to give her consent to, stante matrimonio, can affect her legal rights as previously constituted.

"The next and chief question in debate is, what was the extent of the right vested in Mrs Macintosh under the Duke's bond of 1825? The heir-at-law of Lachlan Macintosh contends that Jane Gordon was effectually, and in apt and formal terms, excluded from the fee of the sum provided under this bond—that this was held by her as a trustee for the child of the marriage, whom failing, for Lachlan Macintosh;—while Mrs Macintosh maintains that the fee was vested in her for her own behoof, subject to such limitation in her use or control of the fund as the peculiar terms of the bond (subject to renewal in the events specified) may import in law. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that Mrs Macintosh's plea is well founded on every consideration of weight in the law, whether founded on the presumed intention of the granter of the bond, or on the authorities and precedents which fix the legal meaning and import of an obligation and destination expressed in the terms used in the bond which is now the subject of construction.

"In the first place, it is hardly possible to suppose that any rational parent granting a provision to a daughter in the terms of this bond, could seriously intend that in case of the predecease of her husband a few years after the marriage, and of the death of the children of the marriage in pupillarity, the fee of the provision should be claimable by the collateral and distant heirs of the first husband, thus depriving a woman still in youth, and likely to form another connexion in life, of the capital of the whole provision. If that extraordinary arrangement had been contemplated by the father, there were various ways of carrying his intentions into effect; but most assuredly the bond in that case never would have been expressed in the terms in which it was here framed. But,

"In the next place, it is apprehended that the clauses in the bond, according to their legitimate and established construction in our practice, were sufficiently calculated to preserve every interest which the parties must be presumed to have had in view at its date; and as these interests no longer exist, Mrs Macintosh is now left in the free and uncontrolled right of the provision secured to her by her father. The material clauses of this bond deserve to be separately considered.

"1. In the leading and obligatory clause of the bond, the Duke became bound to 'make payment to the said Jane Gordon, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the said intended marriage, of the sum of £5000 Sterling, and that to the said Jane Gordon in liferent, during all the days of her lifetime, excluding the jus mariti of the said Lachlan Macintosh her intended husband, and to the children to be procreated of the said intended marriage in fee, and that in such proportions as the said Jane Gordon and Lachlan Macintosh shall appoint by any writing,' &c., 'or failing issue of the said intended marriage, to the said Lachlan Macintosh in fee.'

"Now, if that clause stood per se, it is supposed that no lawyer could seriously entertain a doubt that the payee of the bond, though ex figura verborum a liferentrix, was truly and legally the fiar. There have, it is supposed, been thousands of instances, since the case of Newlands in 1794, in which similar destinations to parents in liferent, and to children nascituri in fee, have occurred in practice, and no party has for many years attempted to question their legal effect. They have been invariably held to vest a fee in the nominal liferenter. The case of Cutbbertson in 1781 (Dict. p. 4279), quoted in Mrs Macintosh's case, is an early precedent in point; but the case of Lindsay, in 1807, (App. to Morison, voce Fiar, No. 1) appears to be a still stronger exemplification of the leaning of the law to hold a fee as vested in the nominal liferentrix under a destination to a party in liferent, and her children nascituri in fee. There, William Lamberton having given money to his married daughter in trust, to purchase a tenement, the conveyance, as arranged, was taken 'to William Lamberton (the father) during all the days of his life, and after his decease, to his daughter Janet Lamberton, also in liferent during all the days of her life, and to the children already procreated or to be procreated of the marriage between her and David Lindsay, equally among them, in fee.' There was a power reserved to William the father, without consent of the daughter, to alter or innovate the destination, or even to sell or burden the premises. He never did so; but on his death, Janet the daughter sold the tenement, when a declarator was brought to try her right; and the Court, with only one dissentient voice, found that the fee was in Janet.

"In short, upon these and other authorities of daily citation, it is thought that the import of such a destination as that which is set forth in the obligatory clause of the present bond, is now irreversibly fixed, and that no question as to its import could now be safely mooted.

"2. But the whole difficulty of the present case is said to arise from another provision in the bond, which now deserves particular attention. The clause referred to, is that whereby the noble granter of the bond stipulated that he should be at liberty to pay up the capital sum, and that so often as the sum was paid up, and as the existing security was changed, 'it should be again lent out and reinvested on good and sufficient security, at the sight and to the satisfaction of the Most Noble George Marquis of Huntly' (and certain other gentlemen named), 'the security to be taken in the same terms as are above expressed.'

"Here it will be observed, that no provision was made for any new restraint being introduced into the title. The security was to be granted on every renewal, precisely in the same terms as the original bond. But the plea of the heir-at-law of the husband is, that this stipulation had the effect of converting Mrs Macintosh's right into that of a mere liferentrix, and that it reduced such fee as was technically vested in her into a fiduciary fee for the children nascituri, in the first instance, and failing them, for Macintosh the husband, and his heirs-at-law.

"It seems, however, to be contrary to every sound and legitimate inference, to hold that this was the real meaning of the parties in the clause under consideration. The bond appears to have been prepared by the agent before this Court of a nobleman of extensive property, at a time when it had long been understood by the profession that a destination in similar terms carried the fee to the nominal liferentrix, and it was matter of equal notoriety at that period, that parties who intended to limit a provision about to be given to a young relative, to a liferent only, were bound either to direct the conveyance to be given for 'liferent use alienarily,' as laid down in the case of Newlands, or otherwise to convey the subject or fund directly to trustees, as in the case of Seton (Dict. p. 4219), who would have held the fund securely for behoof of all to whom any ultimate right was intended to be given. But when the bond was not so expressed, it follows on every principle of law and right construction, that it was framed for another purpose, which, if discoverable, must receive effect from this Court.

"In this inquiry, it is well known that prohibitions to uplift money secured by bonds in special terms, and obligations to reinvest the fund if paid up, have not been of very frequent occurrence in modern practice; but in the earlier periods of our law these were not uncommon. In the Dictionary there is a whole section on the effect of 'prohibitions to alter,' and 'to uplift without consent,' and of clauses 'of return,' &c. (Dict. 430-4), and the import of all the decisions seems to come to this, that such clauses were intended to prevent gratuitous alienations; but that they could not affect the previous and legal right vested in the original creditor or payee, at least so far as to prevent the property or fund so vested in him from being attached for his onerous debts and deeds, or even alienated by the creditor for just and useful purposes. In illustration of this doctrine, reference may be made to the case of Drummond (Dict. p. 4307), which is reported at great length, both by Stair and Gilmour, and to the cases of Strachan in 1683 (p. 4310), and Strachan in 1714 (p. 4312)—all reported under the same title of the Dictionary.

"It is conceived that these authorities sufficiently indicate the legal import and extent of the obligation to keep up and renew the security in the present case. That stipulation could not have been inserted for the purpose of diestringing the disponee or creditor of the right vested in her by the obligatory clause of the bond. On the contrary, it provides anxiously for the repetition and renewal of the security in the precise terms of the original right. The rights of the parties in the fund, therefore, must be judged of in the same manner as if the Duke of Gordon had retained the fund upon the original bond, without paying up the capital till the present period; in that event the question would have occurred purely, and without any speciality, if the fee or right of property in this fund now remained with Mrs Jane Gordon, the favoured party, or if it had passed to the heirs of her deceased husband, who were strangers in blood to her and her father. Could onerous creditors contracting with Jane Gordon, not have attached this fund as now free and disencumbered of every burden and interest previously existing in third parties? Or would Mrs Jane Macintosh be viewed as a mere fiduciary for her husband's collateral heirs?

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the widow's plea on these points would have been insuperable. She was, by the conception of the original bond, constituted in proper technical terms the fiar of the fund; and though there was a substitution fenced with a certain prohibitory clause, which effectually prevented her from altering the destination, it is at least questionable if her creditors would have been legally restrained, even if the marriage had subsisted, from attaching the fund for any properly onerous contraction of hers; and still less can she be prevented from alienating the subject, when the parties have predeceased her, whose contingent interest, now at an end, was manifestly the sole cause of any limitation imposed on her by her father, in the uplifting and disposal of her portion.

"The case is treated by the heir-at-law as if the clauses of the bond in the present instance were equivalent to a formal and irrevocable conveyance of the fund in trust, to the parties authorised to superintend the reinvestments. But if the legal construction of the bond before suggested be correct, there is an important distinction between the cases. The bond imposed a certain restraint upon the wife, but it did not in law entirely exclude her administration and power over the fund for onerous causes, as a conveyance to stranger trustees would have done. This apparently was not intended. It might have been greatly against the interest of Mrs Macintosh's children themselves, whose ultimate advantage was obviously contemplated in this bond, so to restrain the fiar; as it might be necessary for her to raise or borrow money on the bond, to educate or establish them in the world, or for other purposes beneficial to herself and her family. Hence the appointment of third parties to advise the fiar in uplifting and reinvesting the capital, was proper, as her husband's jus mariti was excluded, and it was probably thought expedient to put some restraint on her against unnecessary and gratuitous alienations. But such a provision cannot change the legal character of the right conferred on the payee under the principal clause of the bond, or raise the mere spes of substitutes under a contingent destination into an immediate right of fee.

"Finally, even if the sum in the bond here, instead of being made payable directly to Jane Gordon, had been at first conveyed by the Duke of Gordon, in proper and formal terms, to trustees, for behoof of the same parties who are called under the substitution in the bond, it is probable that the claim of Mrs Macintosh, in the events which have now emerged, would have been equally well founded. Even if the Duke of Gordon had placed £5000 in the hands of trustees, for behoof of his daughter in life during all the days of her life, and of the children of the marriage, whom failing, of Lachlan Macintosh, her husband, in fee (without any mention of heirs), it is clear that such a provision would not have been exigible from the trustees till Mrs Macintosh's death; and if so, no jus crediti would have vested in any of the substitutes till the period of payment, as laid down by the First Division of the Court in the late cause of Wright and Ogilvie, which was elaborately argued and well considered. (See Rep., 9th July 1840). But if, as has happened here, all the substitutes die without issue prior to the term of payment, it follows that the provision, in so far as any contingent interest was given to substitutes, would lapse, and so leave the fund (if there had been a trust) to be claimable in absolute property by the party for whose primary behoof it was created.

"Indeed, even when a trust has been constituted over a wife's property in an antenuptial contract of marriage, or (semble) in any other deed in contemplation of marriage, it may be recalled or put an end to by the radical owner of the subject, on the dissolution of the marriage, when the interests have come to an end in respect of which the trust was created. This was almost the unanimous opinion of the Court in the case of Mrs Torry Anderson of Tushielaw in 1837 (See Reports, 2d June 1837), in which it was held that while a trust made by a bride of her property, in an antenuptial contract of marriage, could not be recalled pending the marriage, it might unquestionably be revoked after the dissolution of the marriage, when no party had any longer an interest to maintain the trust. That principle might have applied to the circumstances of the present case as they now stand, even if a formal trust had been created; but the parties did not think it necessary to constitute any such stringent security when the marriage of the claimant took place.

"In every view, therefore, which the Lord Ordinary can take of this case, he is of opinion that there are ample grounds, in point of law, for sustaining the claim of Mrs Macintosh."

Captain Macintosh reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—It is certain that the word alienarily does not occur here. This is a fact of great importance; but I apprehend that in the most of those cases in which that word has been considered necessary, in order to restrict the parent's right to a bare life-ferent, the kind of property in question was land. There may be some room for doubting if the rule applies as strongly to the case of a money provision. A question occurred lately in the Second Division as to the construction of a will, and we all concurred in thinking, that if from the words of the deed it appeared that nothing more was intended than to give a life-ferent, effect must be given to the intention, even in the absence of taxative words. I am aware that we cannot trench on the case of Newlands; but I have some doubts whether the present case can be considered identical with it. The matter certainly does not appear so clear to me as it does to the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Gillies.—I am quite decided that the interlocutor is right. Effect ought certainly to be given to the will of the granter; but I have no doubt that in this case, that will was just as the Lord Ordinary has interpreted it. I cannot conceive that the granter wished his daughter to be deprived of the fee. I dare say he did not contemplate the event which has happened, of the issue of the marriage becoming extinct during the mother's life. Had he done so, it is probable that he might have provided more distinctly for the consequences. But the Lord Ordinary's note is so full and satisfactory, that I have little to add. I may only observe, that though the provision was granted in contemplation of the marriage, it was also for love and favour to the daughter. That was the granter's motive; and it is altogether inconsistent with it, to suppose that he wished to deprive her of the fee, and leave it to go to utter strangers. This I cannot believe. Then the payment is not only to be made to Jane Gordon, but it is to be made secluding the jus mariti; and I am satisfied that the whole clause regarding the reinvestment was framed for the purpose of giving effect to this seclusion. Taking these two things into view—first, the exclusion of the jus mariti, and then the declaration of love and favour, as the sole or chief object of the provision—I can have no doubt that the fee is in Mrs Macintosh. I must also say, that I see no ground for the distinction between heritable and moveable in questions of this nature. The case of Newlands stands untouched, and has been followed in various instances analogous to the present.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. This is the case of a money provision granted by a father to his daughter on the occasion of her marriage. It is directed to be paid to the daughter in liferent, and her children nascituri in fee; and the question is, whether it belongs to the daughter or to the heirs of her children predeceasing,—that is, whether the fee is vested in her or not? If it did vest in her, it is in her yet. If it did not, she has no right. The heirs of her children must take the fee. Now I think that the fee was in her. It was established as a general point by the case of Newlands, that where a grant is made in this way to a parent in liferent, and the children nascituri in fee, the fee is in the parent, unless the word alienari be used, or some other word of full and entire equivalence. That decision has been adhered to over and over again, in subsequent cases; and these decisions have regulated the practice of conveyancing. The rule was introduced from a legal necessity, contrary to what may have been presumed to be the intention of the granter. But after it was established, and deeds came to be drawn by skillful professional conveyancers, the intention of the granter must be supposed to have been according to the technical construction of the terms employed. That very remark was made in the case of Duff, in 1810; and in that case, though there were some special grounds for doubting whether the terms were not intended to be used in a different sense, they received their common effect. Are there then sufficient specialties in the present case to overrule, in the first place, the difficulty that the fee must have been in pendente, unless it vested in Mrs Macintosh; and in the second place, the presumption that the words were used in their technical sense? I rather think, if we are to guess, from a view of the whole deed, at the meaning of the granter, that it was that his daughter should have the fee. It is true that the grant was in contemplation of the marriage of the granter's daughter, but it also bears a narrative of love and favour to her, and it was in lieu of all former provisions in her favour, which are revoked accordingly. Favour to the husband is not described as one of the causes of granting, nor any thing granted on the part of the husband to the wife. Then there is another grant of an annuity of £200 to his daughter, over and above the provision of £5000, and in both there is a careful exclusion of the husband's jus mariti. No weight is to be attached to the circumstance, that failing her having children, the provision was to go to her husband; for this was no great mark of favour, seeing that, as she was a natural child, she could have no other heirs except her children, to take the fee vested in her. But then it is said that there was here a trust constituted—not directly, indeed, but contingently. If that were true, there would be something in it; still it would be a curious thing, that a trust which was to have the effect of overturning the ordinary effect of the destination, should only be a contingent one. But it is not true. A trust would have taken away the objection that the fee was in pendente. But all that was provided was, that the money should be reinvested at the sight of certain friends, in case it should suit the granter to pay it up. They were not to hold the money as trustees, but only to see it reinvested. That does not remove in the least degree the difficulty of the fee being in pendente; nor is it a solid ground for presuming the granter's intention to have been in favour of the husband. The only argument that struck me was, that if she be the fiar, she must have power to uplift the money herself. But this difficulty applies in some degree, whoever is fiar; and even though the daughter was fiar, I think the provision as to the money being reinvested might be intended as a check upon her, to prevent the payment of it for the granter's convenience, throwing it loose into her hands. It would be too much to infer from this that there was to be no fee in the wife, or that there was intention in favour of the husband at her expense.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is, whether the fee was in the wife or in the children? On looking at the terms of the deed, I am clear that it was in the wife. We are not entitled to suppose that the intention of the granter was different from the import of the technical words employed. These are evidently to be interpreted as conveying a fee to the wife, and I see nothing in the condition as to the reinvestment, to cast any doubt on this interpretation. What the effect of the check might have been, had the wife endeavoured to use her rights as fiar, without regarding it, is a different question; but here all we have to determine is, where the fee vested? I am clear that it vested in the wife.

Lord President.—After hearing your Lordships, I feel bound to say that my doubts are removed, and that I am also disposed to adhere to the interlocutor.

The Court adhered.

No. 44.—GEORGE DILLON HEARNE KIRKALDY, Suspender and Advocate, v. MRS CATHERINE MARSHALL AND OTHERS, Chargers and Respondents.

Trust—Catholic Creditor—Ranking—A trust-settlement for family purposes, by a party who proved to have died insolvent, having been taken up by the trustees, and administered by them on a general understanding with the creditors, and for their behoof, a creditor holding a personal and heritable security for the same debt, claimed on the personal security for the whole amount. A multipointing was afterwards raised by certain creditors in name of the trustees, and the same creditor again lodged his claim to rank for the full amount of the debt, without deducting a payment which he had in the meantime received from the heritable security—Held that the ranking was good.

Abraham Middleton, plumber in Dundee, died in August 1832, leaving a general disposition and settlement of his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, with instructions, after paying his debts and funeral expenses, to divide the residue among his children. The trustees, after entering on the management, saw reason to doubt the solvency of the trust-estate, and published an advertisement calling a meeting of Mr Middleton's creditors "to consider of the state of the trust-affairs, and advise as to the best course to be pursued for the interest of all concerned." They at the same time desired all who had claims on the estate to lodge them, with affidavits of verity, and those indebted to it to make payment. Claims and affidavits were accordingly lodged; and at a meeting of the creditors, on the 29th September 1832, it was resolved that the trustees should proceed to realise the estate, and distribute the funds among the creditors.

One of the debts due by Mr Middleton was a sum of £2000 which he had borrowed in 1825 from Mrs and Miss Kirkaldy, and for which he had granted his personal obligation, and also a bond and disposition in security over certain heritable subjects in Dundee. On the 19th September, previous to the above meeting of creditors, Mr G. D. H. Kirkaldy, who had acquired right to the debt, intimated the assignation of rents to the tenants, and shortly after, having made requisition of payment both upon the trustees and Mr Middleton's heir-at-law, entered to possession.

On the 6th July 1833, Mrs Catherine Marshall, one of Mr Middleton's daughters and residuary legatees, with certain of his creditors, brought a process of multiplepinding in name of the trustees before the Magistrates of Dundee. At this time Mr Kirkaldy had not lodged his claim with the trustees; but on the 3d August following, he lodged it with an affidavit, in which, founding on the bond and disposition in security, he deponed, "that no part of the said principal sum of £2000 Sterling, nor of the said interest thereof from the said term of Whitsunday (1832), to the said 9th day of August in the year 1832, amounting to £23. 11s., has been paid, or in any way compensated to the deponent," "and he claimed to be ranked on the personal estate for the said two sums, amounting together to the sum of £2023. 11s., without prejudice always to the security held by the deponent over the property in the Nethergate Street of Dundee;" "but with the understanding always, "that the deponent is not to draw or retain more than full payment of the said debt, with subsequent interest, and the expenses incurred to him in recovering the debt from the personal estate and the said heritable property."

On the 5th August, at another meeting of the creditors called by the trustees in consequence of the raising of the process of multiplepinding, it was resolved by a considerable majority, that "a process of multiplepinding is premature and unnecessary, and calculated rather to hamper and retard than to facilitate and expedite the winding up of the estate;" that the administration of the trustees had been satisfactory; and that a petition should be presented in their name against an interlocutor which the Magistrates had pronounced sustaining the process, and ordering a condescendence of the fund in medio. A petition was accordingly presented, but was refused on the 20th November 1833. About a month previous (16th October), Mr Kirkaldy, with concurrence of the trustees, brought the heritable subjects to sale. The price obtained was £2140, and the disposition to the purchaser, granted also with concurrence of the trustees, bore to be "without prejudice always to the ranking lately claimed by me" (the present claimant), "for the said principal sum, and interest due thereon, at the time of the said Abraham Middleton's death, upon his personal estate, under the management of his said trustees, the said ranking and claim being hereby expressly reserved, to the effect of enabling me to obtain payment and reimbursement of whatever sum the said principal sum, with the interest remaining due to me, and the expenses which I have incurred in relation thereto, and which are justly chargeable under the said bond, shall exceed the price now received by me from the said Andrew How" (the purchaser) "as above mentioned, but no farther."

Another meeting of the creditors was held on the 30th November 1833, and adjourned to 4th January 1834, against which time the trustees were directed to make up a state of the funds, to scrutinize the claims given in, and prepare a scheme of division. At this adjourned meeting Mr Kirkaldy's agent gave in a letter, in which he stated, that

"presuming that the dividend on Mr Kirkaldy's ranking will amount to more than £131. 12. 9., I have on his part to state, that he restricts his dividend to that sum, or to whatever less sum shall appear to be due to him on an inspection of the accounts to be rendered," &c.

This amount, afterwards restricted on account of an error calculi to £129. 12. 2., was entered by the meeting as an objected claim, and was accordingly reserved in April 1834, when the trustees made payment of 5s. per pound to the other creditors whose claims were not disputed, on their granting a discharge. Meantime the process of multiplepinding continued in dependence; and an interlocutor having been pronounced fixing the term within which claims were to be lodged, Mr Kirkaldy, on the 18th January 1835, gave in a claim and affidavit in terms similar to that which he had formerly given in to the trustees. The claim was objected to by certain of the creditors, on the ground that Mr Kirkaldy was not entitled to be ranked on the fund in medio for the full original debt owing under the bond and disposition in security, but only for the balance remaining unpaid when the claim was lodged. After a variety of pleadings, the Magistrates having ordered a report to be made on the claim, found "in terms thereof, that the just amount of the debt for which the claimant G. D. H. Kirkaldy is entitled to be ranked along with the other ordinary creditors of the deceased, according to the judgments of this court, of date 6th July and 3d August 1836, is £103. 11. 8;" and quoad ultra sustained the objections, and rejected the claim. Afterwards, in October 1838, the Magistrates pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Having considered the account of the expenses found due by the claimant, Mr G. D. H. Kirkaldy, to the objectors to his claim, with the report thereon, and whole process, approves of the report, and, in terms thereof, taxes the said expenses at £24. 17. 8½., and decerns."

Mr Kirkaldy having received a charge for the amount, with the expense of extract, brought a suspension, in which he prayed the Court "simpliciter to suspend the foresaid pretended decret, letters of horning and charge, and whole grounds and warrants thereof." The chargers objected to the suspension as incompetent, on the ground that the merits were not before the Court, and Mr Kirkaldy presented a note of advocacy, which was passed by the Lord Ordinary on the bills "ob contingentiam, without prejudice to any objection on the ground that all the parties have not been named in the advocacy as respondents." The record was afterwards closed on revised reasons of suspension and advocacy, and answers.

The suspender and advocator pleaded—1. As the respondents were the only parties who appeared and opposed the claim of the complainer in the Court below, and are the sole chargers in the suspension, it was not necessary to direct the advocacy against any other parties. 2. The multiplepinding was, under the circumstances, both inexpedient and incompetent, and ought to have been dismissed by the Magistrates, reserving to any alleged creditor or legatee to institute an action of count and reckoning against the trustees: Crichton v. Stewart, 4th March 1836; Stobbie's Trustees v. McCall, 12th December 1838; and the com-plainers as a creditor, and as in right of the trustees, who on behalf of the complainer and other creditors opposed the competency of the action, is entitled to plead that objection; and separatim, he is entitled to state this, and every competent objection to the legality of the decree under which he is charged to pay expenses. 3. The respondent, Mrs Marshall, has no title to appear or to oppose the complainer, or to charge for expenses. 4. No mere creditor is entitled to object to the debt of another creditor (more especially where no objection is made by the debtor), unless such creditor has competing diligence; and therefore the respondents have no title to object to the claim of the complainer; and at all events, the respondents, on the supposition that Mr Middleton died solvent, have no such title; and it is only on the footing that he died bankrupt that they have any such pretension. 5. The complainer, as a creditor on the insolvent estate of Mr Middleton for the full amount of his debt, in terms of the personal obligation, was entitled to draw a dividend thereon, and his right to do so was not affected by the circumstance that he held a pledge or security for the more effectually obtaining full payment; and the circumstance that he subsequently realised the value of that pledge or security cannot affect his claim, to the effect of preventing him from recovering 20s. in the pound.

The respondents pleaded—1. The advocator has not called the proper parties, in respect that, while it is sought in this advocacy to overturn the multiplepointing funditus, it is not directed against the creditors, who unanimously resolved that the estate should be administered under it, nor against the trustees who made, or the creditors who received payment from the funds on the faith of that resolution. 2. The advocator is barred from objecting to the competency of the multiplepointing,—(1.) In respect that he not only made appearance in the multiplepointing to plead his case upon the merits, and made up a record without either objecting to the jurisdiction or advocating the judgment on the competency which had already been pronounced, but likewise in his pleadings expressly admitted the jurisdiction of the Court: (2.) In respect he cannot both claim a dividend under the minutes of 30th November 1833 and 4th January 1834, and at the same time repudiate the arrangements and common measures resolved upon at that meeting: (3.) In respect he has not called the parties with whom the question of jurisdiction was tried in the Court below. 3. A multiplepointing is competently brought in the Court which has jurisdiction over the fund, or the holders of the fund, these being in law defenders, and all claimants pursuers. 4. The complainer was not entitled to be ranked on the moveable estate, except after deducting the sum which he had received from the sale of the heritable property.

" 22d June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, and whole process, and made avizandum, repels the reasons of advocacy founded on the alleged want of title or interest in the respondents to insist in their objections to the complainer's claim of ranking, or on the incompetency of the process of multiplepointing, as for defect of jurisdiction in the Magistrates. But, in respect to the substantial merits of that claim of ranking itself, Finds, Primo, That the trust-deed executed by Middleton, though originally intended and taken up as a mere family settlement, came, very soon after his death, and prior to any of the proceedings founded on in this action, to be recognised and administered exclusively as a trust for creditors on an insolvent estate, and was acceded to as such apparently by all the creditors, and in particular by the whole parties to this process, who not only left the entire property in the hands of the trustees, and lodged claims upon it as in their custody, but actually received from them an equal dividend of 5s. in the pound of their admitted debts, and had set apart for them a similar dividend on such of their claims as were disputed;—and that the legal effects of this adoption and recognition of the trust cannot be at all affected by the circumstance that the multiplepointing against certain judgments in which this advocacy has been presented, was raised in the name of the said trustees by certain of the creditors: Finds, Secundo, That on the 3d of August 1833, a claim and affidavit was lodged with the said trustees by the present complainer for the whole amount of his debt of £2000, with interest thereon then due; and that subsequently, viz., on the 16th October 1833, the said complainer, with concurrence of the trustees, sold by public roup the heritable property disposed to him in security of the said debt, under the powers of sale contained in his bond, and on 30th November thereafter executed a disposition (also with concurrence of the trustees) in favour of the purchaser, in which it was set forth that the said sale, and the complainer's consequent receipt of the price, should be without prejudice to the 'ranking lately claimed by him for the whole principal sum and interest upon the personal estate of the debtor, under the management of his said trustees,—which claim and ranking is expressly reserved, to the effect of his obtaining full payment of the said sum and interest: Finds, Tertio, That the legal effect of the adoption of this trust by the whole creditors, and of their practical accession thereto, was to vest the whole personal estate of the debtor in the trustees, for behoof of, and for equal distribution (according to their existing preferences) among the whole acceding creditors, and to constitute the property so vested as a fund attached and secured for their rateable payment, in the same way and to the same effect as if the same had been attached by separate diligence, used simultaneously at the instance of each of the said creditors: And finds, Quarto, That, in these circumstances, the ranking originally claimed by any of the creditors on the said insolvent estate cannot, if correctly made at the time, be restricted or diminished by any subsequent recoveries obtained by them from separate securities held by them, either from third parties or over particular properties belonging to the debtor, but must subsist and be allowed to their full original extent, to the effect of enabling them to draw any sum not exceeding 20s. in the pound of their whole debt and interest: And therefore advocates the cause; alters the interlocutors of the Magistrates complained of, and finds the complainer entitled still to be ranked for the whole amount of his original claim, to the effect of recovering full payment of the balance of his whole debt; and finds him accordingly entitled now to receive the sum set apart for this contingent claim, when the dividend of 5s. in the pound was paid (in January 1834) to the creditors whose claims were not disputed; and decerns in the ranking and preference accordingly: Finds the complainer entitled to expenses, subject to modification, both in this Court and before the Magistrates: Allows an account to be given in, and remits to the auditor for his taxation and report.

" Note.—The Lord Ordinary having expressed pretty fully, in the body of the interlocutor, the views upon which it proceeds, does not think it necessary to add any farther exposition of these views, or any remarks on the authorities, to which very copious references were made in the course of the argument. The hinging point of the case is, whether, by the recognition and adoption of the trust, there was actually an attachment of the trust-funds for behoof of the creditors, equivalent to what might have been effected by separate pari passu diligence at the instance of each, and a security then constituted in their favour over these funds, such as would have been created by the use of such diligence? For it was not at last disputed that, when there is once such an attachment and security, the ranking originally obtained on these attached funds cannot be restricted (except by being discharged on full payment) by any subsequent recoveries from other and separate securities. Now, on the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary cannot doubt that the trust-funds were so attached and secured in this case, just as effectually as if the trustees had obtained a joint mandate or commission from the whole acceding creditors to use diligence for their behoof, and had accordingly led adjudications of the heritage, and proceeded by poindings and arrestment to secure the whole moveables for their satisfaction. The adoption of the trust, and especially the actual receipt of an equal and rateable dividend from the hands of the trustees, implied, he thinks, all this, and truly imported an assignment of their several rights to the trustees (in trust), and a renunciation of all such separate diligence as could alone bring the actual possession of the said trustees, and their right to distribute the property, into question.

"As to expenses, the Lord Ordinary contemplates a very large modification of those incurred in the Inferior-court, where the proceedings of the complainer were in many ways objectionable; and even in this Court there are grounds, he thinks, for a very considerable restriction."

The respondents reclaimed, except in so far as the interlocutor repelled the reasons of advocacy.

At advising,

Lord President.—After giving all the attention in my power to this case, and to the arguments urged against the interlocutor, I am not able to see any thing in the special circumstances of the case that ought to induce us to alter it. The general rule of law is not disputed. The Bankrupt Statutes have introduced a new principle of ranking, which of course regulates all the cases properly falling under these Statutes; but the Legislature has not thought proper to extend that principle to rankings at common law, according to which it is well known to be a clear and indisputable rule, that a creditor holding separate securities for the same debt, is entitled to rank upon all of them without deduction, to the effect of drawing full payment. Here Mr Kirkaldy holds two securities; and the only question therefore is, whether there is any thing, in the special circumstances of the case, to debar him from ranking fully for both? The Lord Ordinary has taken these circumstances into view, and has, I think, disposed of them correctly. First, it appears, that though Mr Middleton's deed was merely a family settlement, and did not contemplate the appointment of trustees for the behoof of his creditors, there afterwards came to be an understanding among the creditors that the trustees under the settlement should continue the management for their behoof. This is proved by the special resolution of a meeting called by the trustees to consider the state of the trust-affairs, and adopt measures for the behoof of all concerned. Mr Kirkaldy accordingly gives in a claim to the trustees for the whole amount of the debt, and the trustees receive it without exception. No doubt afterwards, when a composition of five shillings in the pound was paid by the trustees, the sum effieiring to Mr Kirkaldy's claim was reserved, because an objection had been taken to it, on the ground that, by the sale of the heritable property, payment of the greater part of it had been realised, and that the claim ought to be restricted to the balance. But then it is most material to observe, that in the disposition to the purchase of the property, there was inserted, with the concurrence of the trustees, an express reservation, bearing, that it was granted without prejudice to Mr Kirkaldy's claim to rank for the full amount of the debt. The process of multiplepoinding, and the lateness of the period at which Mr Kirkaldy lodged his claim in it, cannot in any way affect the validity of this reservation.

Lord Gillies.—I concur, and think it unnecessary, after what has been said, to make any observations.

Lord Mackenzie.—I also think the interlocutor is right, though I am not prepared, perhaps, to adopt all the reasons on which it is founded. The general rule of law, as to the effect of a double ranking, it is impossible to disturb, though I don't pretend to comprehend the principle which led to the adoption of it.

Lord Fullerton.—I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right in its conclusion, though I have some doubt of the principle on which, in part at least, he rests it. The interlocutor, after laying down various propositions in which I concur, finds, "that the legal effect of the adoption of this trust by the whole creditors, and of their practical accession thereto, was to vest the whole personal estate of the debtor in the trustees, for behoof of, and for equal distribution (according to their existing preferences) among the whole acceding creditors, and to constitute the property so vested as a fund attached and secured for their rateable payment, in the same way and to the same effect as if the same had been attached by separate diligence used simultaneously at the instance of each of the said creditors." And in the note, he certainly holds this to be the point on which the judgment in favour of the claimant turns: "The hinging point of the case is, whether, by the recognition and adoption of the trust, there was actually an attachment of the trust-funds for behoof of the creditors, equivalent to what might have been effected by separate pari passu diligence at the instance of each, and a security then constituted in their favour over these funds, such as would have been created by the use of such diligence?" Now, certainly, if the trust-deed could be viewed in this light, there would be an end to all questions. On that view it is admitted, even by the opposite party, that the judgment must be in favour of Kirkaldy. Accordingly, the argument against the interlocutor was directed to show, that a trust-deed of this kind produced no such effect, and formed no such security as that assumed by the Lord Ordinary. I think it would be difficult to show that it did. I have great doubts, indeed, whether a trust like this, merely for the objects of a family settlement, could be converted, even by the circumstance of creditors claiming under it, into a security excluding all separate diligence, and "equivalent to separate pari passu diligence of each." But then I do not think that essential to the success of the claimant Kirkaldy, or that the existence of a security over the general fund having such an effect, is the indispensable condition of his ranking on that fund for the full amount of his debt, after taking benefit of the separate security. I think the competency of that double claim rests on the indisputable fact, that there was here a competition and ranking of creditors on an estate which was insolvent, or treated as insolvent. Indeed, if it had not been so, there could have been no room for the present question. It certainly seems at first sight singular that a creditor should, after getting payment of part of his debt, be allowed, for any purpose, to found upon it as subsisting to its full amount. When a debtor makes, and a creditor receives a partial payment, the debt is diminished by that amount. And if the creditor holds a security, the security is proportionally diminished,—that is, it is only a security for the balance. When it is said, in some of the cases referred to, that the security remains certain, though the debt is diminished, it can mean nothing more than that the totality of the ipsam corpus of the subject forming the security remains available to the creditor, though it is a security for a smaller sum. A party holding a pledge for a debt, and taking a partial payment, retains the full right of the pledge; but it remains a pledge only for the balance. Accordingly, if, in this case, Middleton had paid part of this debt in his lifetime, or if Kirkaldy had, during his lifetime, or even before the ranking and competition, sold the lands and got the price, his subsequent claim of ranking must have been limited to the balance. But where a competition of creditors, and a ranking of those creditors, occurs, a different principle is let in. There are no means of payment to which, ex hypothesi, the funds are inadequate. For the claim of payment which existed against the debtor, there is substituted, as against the competing creditor, a claim to share the fund of division. And the proportional share of each creditor on the fund is estimated according to the amount of his debt as it stood when the ranking commenced. Accordingly, in the ordinary case of sequestration, the dividends, as paid, are not subtracted from the amount of each debt; but on each successive fund of division emerging, each creditor is rated on it according to the amount of his original debt. This leads to no difficulty when the estate is all massed together, and where all the creditors share on the same principle. But the difficulty arises, where, by separate securities or preferences, there is a separation of one part of the estate from the mass, and certain creditors, holding those preferences or securities, are entitled to share the fund covered by those securities, to the exclusion of the great body of the creditors. Then the question arises, whether the creditors who have taken the separate fund, shall be bound to deduct the value of the security, or a payment from the amount of the debt for which they would otherwise have ranked on the general fund, or shall be entitled to rank on both funds,—the fund of security, and the general mass of the estate,—according to their original debts. Different systems of law have adopted different principles on this point. In sequestrations, the former, which is more consistent with the equalization of the rights of creditors, has been introduced by Statute. But the rule of the common law has been framed on different principles. According to it the creditors who have shared or appropriated one part of the property of the bankrupt, are still, in ranking on the residue, entitled to share according to the ratio of their whole original debts; always under the condition that, by so ranking, they shall not draw more than full payment. And whatever may be thought of this in equity, it involves no absolute inconsistency. There being in such cases, as has been already observed, no question of payment to which the whole estate is confessedly inadequate, but of division, the principle just referred to does no more than allow each preferable creditor to rank and share on each of the separate funds of division according to the ratio of his original debt, just as each creditor ranks in a sequestration for his whole debt on each successively arising fund of division. Nothing brings out this principle more clearly than such cases as those of the Earl of Loudoun against the Creditors of Gilston, and the ranking of Auchinbreck's Creditors, in which a pari passu adjudger, who had drawn a payment from funds not covered by the adjudication, was still found entitled, in competition with the co-adjudgers, to rank on the adjudged property for the full amount of the debt. Now, it does not appear to me to be indispensable, in order to let in the operation of this principle, that there should be two or more absolutely effectual securities. That is indeed one case of the application of the principle. But there is room for it on the broader ground, wherever there is insolvency and a ranking of creditors, and where one part of the debtor's property or effects is separated, by diligence or securities in favour of one or more creditors, from the general mass of the effects. In every case of the kind there are two funds of appropriation or division,—the one divisible among the creditors secured separately, and the other divisible among the general body. The ranking on each is different; that on the first being confined to the creditor, or creditors secured,—that on the latter extended to the whole body of creditors, including those secured. But in both the ratio of the ranking, as in every ranking, is the same,—viz., the amount of the original debt of each creditor. On these grounds, I think the claimant, Kirkaldy, was entitled to rank on the general fund with the other creditors for the full amount of his original debt, whether the trust could be held to be equivalent to complete diligence in security or not. It is admitted, at all events, to have practically operated as a division of, and ranking on, an insolvent estate. Indeed, if it were not insolvent, there could be no room for the present question. And though Kirkaldy took the full benefit of the one fund of division—the estate covered by his security—because on it he had no competition; he was still entitled to rank on the mass of the estate along with the general body of the creditors; and being so entitled, I think he must rank according to the ratio which at common law is involved in any ranking, viz., the amount of his original debt. This admits of being brought to another test, which seems conclusive. It is not pretended that here the other creditors could have compelled the claimant, Kirkaldy, either to sell the estate, or to value and deduct the security from his debt before ranking, if the estate had remained unsold. On the contrary, it seemed to be admitted, that he might have ranked first for the full amount of his debt, drawn the dividend, and still have, after that, taken the full benefit of the security by selling and drawing the price. Now, this appears to me utterly inexplicable on any sound or consistent principle. If the price of the estate sold before the ranking was to be considered as a partial payment, obliging the claimant to deduct, his holding the estate then remaining unsold must have been considered, on the very same principle, as an appropriation of part of the insolvent's property, which he was bound to value and deduct. It seems utterly impossible, on any rational principle, to treat differently the price and the subject from which it was produced; and I cannot see how a different rule should be let in, merely by the circumstance, ex concessis in the option of the preferable creditor, of selling before or after the ranking. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to, though I am not disposed to rest it on the narrow ground of the trust-deed operating as an absolute security, or being equivalent to diligence for behoof of all the creditors, but on the broad principle, that there was here a ranking on an insolvent estate, which the claimant was entitled to share according to the ratio of his original debt, though he had previously taken the benefit of a separate security.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, except in so far as it finds the complainer entitled now to receive the sums set apart for answering his claim, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note: Find the complainer entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit the account to the auditor to tax, and report to the Lord Ordinary; quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties farther as to the amount of the sum which the complainer is now entitled to draw, and to do therein as he shall see just."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 45.—JOHN SWAN, Suspender, v. ALEXANDER BLAIR, for behoof of Bank of Scotland, Changer.

Stamp Act, 55 Geo. III. c. 184, Part 1st, p. 66.—Bank—Banker's Draft—Found, 1. That drafts upon a banker in the form of a mere order, without any mention either of the bearer or of a particular payee, are to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer, in the sense, and within the benefit of the Act 55 Geo. III. c. 184: 2. That drafts in that form do not lose their privilege from their bearing, after and apart from the signature of the drawer, a memorandum in his handwriting, such as "per A B." But that an order having such addition in the body of it, and before the signature, is payable only to the party mentioned, and is not entitled to the statutory privilege as payable to the bearer: 3. That drafts payable to A B, E F, "or to the bearer," are to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer.

Vide ante, Vol. VII. p. 200, 5th February 1835, and Vol. VIII. p. 4, 6th July 1835.

The suspender, on the 16th June 1819, became cautioner for Mr William Martin in a cash-credit bond to the Bank of Scotland for £600. Mr Martin became bankrupt in 1831; and the present process is a suspension of a charge given to his cautioner by the treasurer of the bank, to make payment to him of the sums of £552. 2. 8. of principal, and £137. 15. 11. of interest, due under the bond. The mode by which Mr Martin operated upon the account was by means of printed drafts of a particular form, furnished to him by the bank, and bearing the place "Dumfries," as that at which they were apparently issued. Various reasons of suspension were stated, but were all reserved with the exception of one relating to the form of the drafts, upon which the balance charged for arises, and which, it was alleged, were in violation of the Stamp Acts. These Statutes impose a particular duty on all bills, promissory-notes, orders, drafts, or other documents, under the following exception:

"All drafts or orders for the payment of any sum of money to the bearer on demand, and drawn upon any banker or bankers, or any person or persons acting as a banker, who shall reside or transact the business of a banker within ten miles of the place where such drafts or orders shall be issued, provided such place shall be specified in such drafts or orders, and provided the same shall bear date on or before the day on which the same shall be issued, and provided the same do not direct the payment to be made by bills or promissory-notes."

The drafts challenged were in the following forms:

"£100. Dumfries, 30th June 1819.
"Debit my account with the Bank of Scotland, with the sum of one hundred pounds Sterling, p. James Martin, writer, Dumfries."

"To John Barker, Esq., agent, } "WM. MARTIN.
Dumfries. } "Indorsed JAS. MARTIN."

"£173 Stg. Dumfries, 17th Jan. 1820.
"Debit my account in the Bank of Scotland, with one hundred and seventy-three pounds Sterling."

"To J. Barker, Esq., agent for the } "WM. MARTIN.
Bank of Scotland, Dumfries. } "p. JAS. JAMIESON."
"One hundred and seventy-three.
"Indorsed JAS. JAMIESON."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"20th March 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, and whole process, for the purpose of considering whether any of the reasons of suspension admit of being finally disposed of on the documents and admissions in process, and what judgment should be pronounced upon any such reasons,—Finds, 1mo, That drafts drawn in the form of a mere order, to debit the drawer's account with a particular sum, and without any mention either 'of the bearer,' or of a particular payee, are to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer, in the sense, and within the benefit of the Act of 55 Geo. III. c. 184: Finds, 2do, That drafts in that form ought not to lose the privileges conferred by that Act, merely from their bearing on the lower part of the paper, below, and quite apart from the signature or address, a memorandum, note or jotting, in the handwriting of the drawer, consisting of such words as 'per James Martin,' or 'James Thomson,' or any other individual: But that such an order having an addition or direction of this kind inserted in the body of it before the signature, and as a sequel or continuous part of the order itself, must be regarded as drawn payable only to the party mentioned in such addition, and not entitled, therefore, to the statutory privilege as payable to the bearer: Finds, 3tio, That drafts made payable to James Martin, James Thomson (or any other individual), 'or to the bearer,' ought to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer, in the sense of the Statute referred to, and as such entitled to the same privileges as if made payable to the bearer only, and without the mention of any individual; but that drafts made payable to James Martin (or any other individual), therein described, merely as the bearer, must be held to be drafts payable only to the individual so specified, and consequently not within the benefit of the Act; and before further answer as to the reasons of suspension founded on the form and tenor of the different drafts to which objections have been stated, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may explain to what particular drafts the preceding findings should be applied, and the practical result of this application on the validity of the charge: Quoad ultra, finds that none of the other reasons of suspension can be properly disposed of on the documents and admissions in process, nor until the disputed facts in regard to them are settled by farther proof."

Both parties reclaimed,—the suspender against the first part, and the charger against the second part of the second finding.

At advising, the suspender argued, that the cheques exempted from the Stamp Act were not negotiable. They were meant to be evidence of payments between the drawer and the bank, but not in any question between the drawer and payee, or the bank and payee;

but the making them payable to a payee nominatim, was making them evidence of the payment, and that whether the payee was named after the signature of the drawer or in the body of the order, and before the signature of the drawer.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—As to the first form, in which the direction to make payment to James Martin is inserted in the body of the draft, and before the signature of the drawer, the bank could not honour the draft without thereby proving payment to James Martin, which would be eliding the receipt-stamp. In the second form, the bank may honour the draft without thereby proving payment to Jamieson; and should the document be afterwards presented as evidence of payment by reason of his indorsation, it would not be admitted.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal, as unnecessary in this cause, part of the third finding in the interlocutor complained of, relative to the draft made payable to James Martin, therein described, merely as a bearer: Quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the desire of both notes, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

No. 46.—JAMES LUMSDEN, Complainer, v. MRS STUART or LORIMER and HUSBAND, Respondents.

Process—Interlocutor—Error—Suspension and Interdict.

Vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 534.

On the 8th July last, the Court in this case remitted to the Lord Ordinary to pass the bill of suspension, but per incuriam omitted to continue the interdict in the meantime. On the application of the complainer the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"The Lords having considered a note for the suspender, stating that in the interlocutor of the 8th of July last, there had been an omission per incuriam to declare that in the meantime the interdict should be continued,—do in supplement now declare to that effect accordingly, and direct the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

Act. Marshall.—[J.W.]

9th December 1841.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 47.—GEORGE MARQUIS OF TWEEDDALE, Pursuer, v. ALEXANDER BEATSON and OTHERS, Defenders.

Superior and Vassal—Reddendo—Circumstances in which the word hordeum, in the reddendo of a charter of the sixteenth century, held to mean not bear or bigg, but barley.

In 1580, the Commendator of the Abbey of Dunfermline, with consent of the convent, granted a charter conveying to David Durie of Durie, and his heirs-male, the office of heritable bailie of the regality of Dunfermline, together with various feu-duties and dry multures payable to the abbey from certain lands within the regality. These feu-duties and multures are stated to consist of certain quantities "hordei." The charter further provided, that the bailie, and his successors in office, should have free entertainment in the monastery, for themselves and twelve followers, horse and foot, in meat and drink, and suitable lodging and accommodation, whilst they should happen to be detained at the three yearly head courts, and other courts of the regality, for the administration of justice in their said office, at the sole expense of the commendator and his successors. At the Reformation, the abbey of Dunfermline was annexed to the Crown, and erected into a temporal lordship by James VI., who, in 1593, conveyed it to his queen, Anne of Denmark. In 1611, while the office of bailie was possessed by Alexander Seton Earl of Dunfermline, an agreement was entered into, by which Queen Anne, as Lady of Dunfermline, commuted the above provision for the entertainment of the bailie and his followers into a grant, inter alia, of the whole kain, capons and poultry, payable from the regality. The office and emoluments of bailie, after being enjoyed by several Earls of Dunfermline, were appraised in 1665 by John Earl and afterwards Marquis of Tweeddale, in whose family they have since continued. From 1641, the bailie had enjoyed, along with the emoluments properly belonging to his office, a Crown lease of the whole feu and teind-duties of the regality of Dunfermline. In this way, the whole feu-duties, &c., payable from the regality, were levied by the bailie, and massed together, without distinguishing between those which properly belonged to him as bailie, and those which belonged to him as lessee. The Crown lease expired in 1780, when a submission was entered into between the bailie and the vassals, and the amount of the duties ascertained. Some of the vassals who had not been properly made parties to the submission, denied the accuracy of the award, and in 1801 an action was brought against one of them, in order to have the general question tried. The late Marquis of Tweeddale died in 1804; and the question with the vassals never having been decided, the present Marquis brought this action, in which he concluded that the defenders should be decerned to pay the cumulo duties, farms and others, from Whitsunday 1804, and thereafter with interest since the same were rendered litigious in 1801, but under deduction of certain payments to account: Or, alternatively, that the duties and others should be subdivided among the defenders in proportion to their respective possessions, the portions so ascertained declared due by the defenders respectively, and they decerned to make payment of the same, with interest, and under deduction as aforesaid.

The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties, made a remit before answer to Mr Allan Menzies, W.S., who gave in a report, exhibiting, in terms of the remit, 1. The cumulo duties, farms, and others payable to the Crown, and those vested in the pursuer. 2. The proportions of the said cumulo duties, farms, and others effeiring to the lands of the several defenders, specifying separately the amount of the said proportions payable to the Crown, and the amount payable to the pursuer. 3. A state of the several defenders' accounts for their respective proportions of the above, showing, (1.) The amount paid by them, or their predecessors, to the Crown and to the pursuer; (2.) The amount still due to the Crown and to the pursuer. In an appendix, explaining the principles on which the amounts due by the defenders had been calculated, the reporter observed:

"A question has been raised in the course of this investigation, as to the kind of grain in which the victual farms are payable, viz., Whether in barley or in bear?—the pursuer holding that the term 'hordeum,' used in the titles, is capable of either interpretation, and therefore explicable by practice; and that the conversion having always been at the highest regality fiars, the term must be held to import the best grain of the kind; while one of the defenders maintains, on the other hand, that at the date of the old charters, in which the term 'hordeum' occurs, no barley was grown in Scotland, and therefore the grain intended must have been bear or bigg.

"The reporter submits the following observations on the point:—

"The word 'barley' is used in agricultural treatises as a generic term, applicable not only to the species of grain commonly known by that name, but also to the inferior kinds called bear and bigg. The grains are distinguished in the Encyclopædia Britannica (new edition) as 'Hordeum Distichon, two-rowed barley, which is the kind most extensively cultivated; and Hordeum Tetrastrichon, four-rowed barley, often called bear or bigg, the culture of which is for the most part confined to inferior soils, or to situations where the climate is unfavourable to the former species.' As the term thus embraces the whole genus, the case appears to be one in which the principle of exposition, by reference to the usage or practice of the parties, must be resorted to, in order to determine the species intended.

"The accounts of Sir Henry Wardlaw, before referred to, show that the victual due by the abbey's vassals, comprehended two kinds of bear, viz., 'ferme beir' and 'teind beir'; and the rental-books produced, which go back to the year 1727, show that these duties were, from that date until 1780, converted at prices fixed for the lordship of Dunfermline, exhibiting, without variation, the farm bear as of a higher value than the teind bear.

"No fiars prices of barley appear to have been struck in the county of Fife until the year 1790. In previous years the price of bear is given, and in that year the best sort is called barley bear; and there are also prices given for two inferior kinds, called blanded or bramble bear, and rough bear.

"The reporter has only had an opportunity of comparing the regality prices with the county fiars for crops 1780 and 1781, and these are respectively as follows, viz.:

	Regality.		County Fiars.
	Farm Bear.	Teind Bear.
1780, . .	£ s. d. 0 13 4	£ s. d. 0 11 0	£ s. d. 0 9 9
1781, . .	0 13 0	0 11 0	0 9 6

"It thus appears that the farm bear, at the price of which these victual duties were converted, was rated in the regality rental at a rate exceeding by more than twenty-six per cent., the only kind of bear contained in the county fiars prices.

"The presumption thus raised in favour of the pursuer's argument is confirmed by the later practice of the parties, which appears to leave no room for doubt. The rental, dated 13th October 1800, prepared by William Keith, accountant, in the submission to him, states the feu-farm bear (which includes the victual farms here in question,) as convertible at £8. 13s. 6d. Scots, or 14s. 5½d. Sterling per boll. The feu-duties included in this rental having lain over unsettled, for crops 1781 and 1793, and the intervening crops, the above rule of conversion was the average price for these unsettled crops; and it is found that Mr Keith's rate is exactly the average of the county fiars prices for the years referred to, the price of bear being taken, until that of barley began to be struck, and the price of barley thereafter. Mr Wemyss, one of the defenders, and the author of Mr Greenhill's trustees, and another of the defenders litigating this case, made a payment, on 17th August 1812, of the amount ascertained by a state prepared by Mr Martin, his own agent, in which the price stated by Mr Keith is adopted throughout; and although the application of that price to later crops than those of which it was the average rate, is erroneous, the fact shows the understanding that the victual farm was payable in barley. In like manner, Mrs Aytoun, the other defender who has appeared, has produced receipts for feu-duties from 1798 to 1815, paid by her predecessor; and it is shown, by states of these feu-duties, which are also in process, that the portion of them, consisting of victual, was converted at the fiars prices of barley.

"In these circumstances, the reporter has proceeded upon the principle sanctioned by the practice of the parties, adopting the fiars prices of bear, until those of barley began to be struck, and the latter thereafter."

Objections to the report were lodged by Mr Wemyss of Cuttlehill, the trustees of the late Alexander Greenhill, and Mrs Aytoun of Inchdairnie,—the leading objection being, that the word "hordeum," used in the reddendo of the charters, had been interpreted to mean "barley," whereas, from the date of the charters, it could only have meant "bear or bigg."

"17th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the objections to the report by Mr Menzies,—Primo, As to the objections by Mrs Aytoun of Inchdairnie, sustains the first objection, viz., that the receipts founded on by her must be held to operate as a discharge of all claim against the lands to which these receipts apply, prior to the year 1816: Sustains her second objection, viz., that she can only be called to account, at the fiar conversion, for four bolls of bear, and not of barley: Repels her third objection, that the capons ought not to be charged at three shillings each: Secundo, As to the objections of Robert Wemyss, Esquire of Cuttlehill, sustains his first objection, that he is only liable for the fiar conversion of bolls of bear, and not of barley: Finds that his second objection, viz., that under the summons the demand against him cannot go beyond the year 1804, is superseded by the statement made at the bar by the pursuer, that he makes no claim prior to this period: Finds that his third objection, viz., that the demand against him cannot be carried beyond 10th November 1794, is superseded by the same statement: Tertio, As to the objection by the executors of the late Greenhill, finds that they can only be charged with the fiar conversion of bear, and not of barley: Quoad ultra, approves of the report: Finds no expenses due to either party in discussing these objections, and decrees.

"Note.—The only point (as it appears to the Lord Ordinary) which is attended with any difficulty, is, as to the meaning that is now to be attached to the word hordeum in the titles. The parties have declined adducing evidence to explain it. In this situation, and looking to general history alone, the Lord Ordinary thinks that barley, as a separate grain, was not known anciently in Scotland, and therefore he holds hordeum to be bear, which was the grain of the country at the date of these titles."

When the cause was first advised, it was delayed, at the suggestion of the Lord President, in order that parties might have an opportunity of bringing under the notice of the Court a passage in Sir Robert Sibbald's "Scotia Illustrata,"—an authority to which they had not adverted, and to which his Lordship's attention had been called by Lord Meadowbank. In that part of the work where he treats of plants "in Scotia sponte nascentes," he says, Lib. I. Par. ii. c. 8, p. 30:

"Hordeum distichum J. B. Distichum quod spica binos ordines habeat Plinio B. P. common barley. Officialis est."

"Hordeum polystichon J. B. Polystichum Hibernum B. P. Bear—Barley."

The cause was again advised:

Lord President.—After hearing counsel in this case, the Court took time to consider that part of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of,—namely, that part sustaining the objection of the defenders, that payment ought to be made as for the fiars conversion of bear, and not barley. Upon again considering the case, I am satisfied that the reporter, Mr Menzies, is correct, and that the interlocutor must be altered. The stipulation contained in the charter is, that the vassals shall pay to the baillie of the regality a certain number of bolls of a grain designated by the word Hordeum. The ordinary, and indeed the only translation of the word, as given by Ainsworth in his Dictionary, is barley, and it does not seem to be disputed that it may mean different sorts of that grain. But though it may mean barley as now grown and known, it is maintained that no barley was grown in Scotland in the sixteenth century; and in support of this an appeal is made to the fact, that it was only in 1790 that the fiars of barley were struck for the first time in Fife. The circumstance of fiars not being struck, is no evidence of the non-existence of barley in Scotland, or in any particular district of it. In some counties, till very recently, no fiars but those of wheat have been struck, but it will not be pretended that in these counties barley was not grown. But in addition to the statement of Sir John Sinclair in his Treatise on Agriculture, that "the two-sided species denominated barley, has long been grown in Scotland," reference has also been made to Sir Robert Sibbald's Work, entitled "Scotia Illustrata," to which my attention was called by Lord Meadowbank. The work is dated 1684; and in chapter 8, p. 30, where he is treating of plants and herbs growing spontaneously in Scotland, he mentions, "Hordeum Distichum—Distichum quod spica binos ordines habeat," which he translates common barley. Such is this author's statement of what was produced in Scotland in early times; and its being designated under the word hordeum, clearly shows that the word is applicable to both of the varieties which grow in Scotland. Why then presume that the inferior species must be held to be meant by the reddendo in question? The evidence produced from the old rentals, and from the mode in which payment was wont to be made, is all the other way, as it is indisputably clear, that while there was a marked difference in the values of farm and teind bear, the duties in question were uniformly exacted and paid in farm bear,—i. e., in the kind bearing the highest price. Conformably to this was the understanding of parties; for in the settlement which was made in 1820, the amount of grain payable was estimated in barley. I am therefore satisfied that the vassals are liable to be charged for the highest species of grain denominated by the word hordeum; and that as both bear and barley are designated by this term, the latter is the species which, under the reddendo in the charters, the vassals are bound to pay. The species exigible being the best possible that could be grown by superior cultivation, why should not the species which is now grown be exigible?

Lord Gillies.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. The word hordeum evidently applies both to bear and barley, which, indeed, are not different sorts of grain, but merely different varieties of the same species. In the same way, there are many varieties of the other kinds of grain, as wheat, which is red or white, with awns or without them; but it would be absurd to hold, that if at the date of a charter the worst of these species happened to be the only kind grown, all future payments of the reddendo should be estimated as payable only in that species. I have no doubt whatever that barley was cultivated at a very early period in Fife—as early, at least, as in any part of Scotland. One striking proof of the superior cultivation in Fife I have heard stated. It is said that there is a property in the east of that county, the rental of which was as high at the beginning of the eighteenth century as at the beginning of the nineteenth.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The reddendo is a grain called hordeum of a certain quantity, and also, as is evident from the documents produced, of a good quality. In these circumstances, I have no doubt that the payment must be made in barley. I think it quite certain that barley was grown in Scotland at the date of the charters. Indeed I think this more certain than that bear was grown at that period; for I am convinced that barley is the older of the two. Barley was certainly grown on the continent from the earliest times; and it is quite incredible, that when Scotsmen were importing wheat, they should have omitted also to import barley, which, it is well known, was much more profitable than bear, and was equally capable of being grown, at least on good land. Unless there had been an Act of Parliament expressly prohibiting the introduction and growth of barley, I do not see how it could have been kept out at a time when it was a common crop both on the continent and in England. It seems probable that the word bear, though now appropriated to mean bigg, originally had an interpretation as extensive as hordeum, and meant both bigg and barley. If so, the vassals can make nothing of the use of the word bear in the old rentals. I agree with Lord Gillies, that bigg and barley are not different species of grain, but merely varieties of the same species. That being the case, it seems absurd to maintain, that because an inferior species was grown in an imperfect state of agriculture, it must be held to be the species in which payment is to be made ever after. On the same principle, it might be maintained, that in Old Scotland there was no manuring—no draining, &c., and that, therefore, as the grain grown without them must have been of inferior quality, all grain now payable under old charters may also be of inferior quality.

Lord Fullerton.—I am very much of the same opinion. I don't found much on the classical meaning of the word hordeum; for though it is evident that it includes both species of grain, it is also evident, both from the old rentals of Sir Henry Wardlaw, and also from the dispositions, that when hordeum was translated into Scotch, the word used was bear, at least so far down as 1780, when the submission was made to Mr Keith. The important question then, is, not what is the meaning of the word hordeum, but what is the meaning of the word bear? Was it restricted to what is now called bigg, or was it applicable to both bigg and barley? My opinion is, that it did include both; and I think this is confirmed by one of the entries in the old rentals, in which the name used by Sir Henry Wardlaw is barley bear. This much is certain—the kind understood to be payable was grain of the best quality; for in all the rentals where a higher and lower price are mentioned, the estimate is always made the higher price; and in 1780, when the two prices were 13s. 4d. and 9s. 9d., the conversion was made at 13s. 4d. Afterwards, when fiars of barley began to be struck, the payment was made according to these fiars. Attending, therefore, to the evidence that barley was grown in Scotland at the date of the charters,—that the grain, when designated as bear, was always taken at the highest price,—and that, after the fiars of barley began to be struck, the estimate was made in barley,—I am satisfied that the reporter has taken the correct view, and that the interlocutor, in so far as it sustains the objection to that view, must be altered.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as re-claimed against: Repel the whole objections to Mr Menzies' report, except only the first objection stated by Mrs Aytoun, which stands sustained, and also the second and third objections for Mr Wemyss, which are superseded by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment on these points has not been submitted to review: Find that the vicual duty payable by the defenders under their charters is barley, and not bear: Find the pursuer entitled to the expenses of the discussion applicable to this last finding, as against the defenders, Greenhill's trustees and Mr Wemyss; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor to tax and report; and, quoad ultra, reserve all other questions of expense till the final issue of the cause; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther therein as to his Lordship may seem just.”

Act. H. Robertson.—Alt. Anderson.—[J.W.]

9th December 1841.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 49.—LIEUT.-GEN. DUNCAN DARROCH, Pursuer,
v. ANDREW RANKEN, Defender.

Property—Marches—Superior and Vassal—Warrandice—A party feued a piece of ground, described as extending “nine feet in breadth on each of the east and west sides, and bounded by the public road on the south, by the shore ground of Diverts on the north,” and amounting in measure, along with other portions of the subject feued, to “two acres four falls and four yards, computing each fall to contain thirty-six superficial yards.” The superior brought a declarator that he had the only good and undoubted right to the whole of the ground on the north side of the public road, at a distance of more than nine feet from the north edge thereof. The vassal alleged that the road trustees, in virtue of previous possession, and also of their statutory powers, had the right to extend the road from its present breadth of thirty feet to forty feet, and that the decree of the superior should be so qualified as to preserve the right of the vassal to ground nine feet beyond the full breadth of the road, or so far as nineteen feet from the existing line—Held that the subject feued was specifically limited, and that the contemplated proceedings of the trustees were irrelevant to qualify the decree as craved.

The pursuer's predecessor, Angus Darroch of Gourock, disposed in feu to the defender three pieces of ground lying on the south side of the public road from Greenock to the Cloch, and also a small piece of ground on the north or opposite side of the road, which is thus described in the feu-contract:

“All and whole that piece of ground lying between the said public road and the sea-shore, and directly opposite to, and on the north of the ground first above described, of the following mensurations,—viz., 406 feet fronting to and on the north side of the said road; the like number of feet along the shore on the north, and nine feet in breadth on each of the east and west sides, and bounded as follows,—viz., by the said public road on the south; by the shore ground of Diverts on the north; by the lands of Midtown on the east, and by the lands of Diverts on the west.”

The feu-contract also bears, that the said four pieces of ground thereby disposed, amount in measure to “two acres four falls and four yards, computing each fall to contain thirty-six square superficial yards;” and the reddendo is declared to be “the sum of £32. 8. 3. Sterling, being at the rate of two shillings Sterling per fall of feu-duty yearly.” The breadth of the ground on the north side of the road, between the road and the high-water mark of ordinary tides, varies considerably. But where it is narrowest it seems to exceed nine feet.

The present action was brought to have it found and declared “that the pursuer has the only good and undoubted right to the whole of the said ground on the north side of the public road, at a distance of more than nine feet from the north side or edge thereof, and that the defender has no right to any part of the said ground at a distance of more than nine feet from the present north side or edge of the road."

It was stated in defence, that "ever since the date of the contract, the whole ground between the north side of the road and the sea has been used and occupied by the defender for the purpose for which it is almost alone applicable, viz., communication with, and access to, the sea and sea-shore. The defender, at considerable expense, built a quay or landing place at the point, and he, his family and boatmen, have been in the constant practice of using the whole ground in passing to and from the sea. It has been also used for carting gravel for walks, and sea-ware for the garden, hauling up boats, tracking, and using bathing-houses," &c. Further, it was alleged, that "at the date of the feu-contract, the actually existing public road, along which the stripe is declared to be, was, as it continues to be, only thirty feet in breadth. But according to the Acts of Parliament for forming and maintaining the road, as well as under the General Turnpike Act, the trustees were and are entitled to make it of the breadth of forty feet. The trustees have intimated their intention of acting upon this right, and claim to make the road of the full breadth of forty feet, without even so much as compensation, on the allegation that it formerly went over this vacant piece of ground now in question, which is the fact. If this operation takes place according to the plan proposed, the nine feet of stripe running along the north side of the road, to which the pursuer alleges the defender is confined, will be taken into the public road, and wholly evicted from the defender."

Pleaded by the pursuer—1. The defender, by the feu-contract founded on, having right only to the limited extent of ground on the north side of the public road thereby conveyed to him, as bounded and described in that deed, and this without any servitude of any description upon or over the ground beyond it, is not entitled to encroach upon, or occupy any ground to the northward of the ground so feued to him, and lying between it and the shore, and decree of declarator to that effect, and to the effect that all the ground lying to the northward of the defender's feu, and between it and the shore, belongs to the pursuer, in virtue of the titles he has condescended on, ought to be pronounced. 2. What has been stated by the defender in reference to the breadth to which he alleges that the public road may be extended, on the alleged contemplated proceedings of the trustees, can afford no ground, even if true, for not pronouncing decree as craved, or for qualifying that decree in any way.

Pleaded by the defender—1. The claim made in the present action is unfounded, inasmuch as the feu-contract libelled on conveys to the defender the whole ground on the north side of the road down to the sea or proper sea-shore. 2. Even supposing the defender's right to be not so extensive, he is at least entitled to carry his ground nine feet beyond the full breadth of the public road, or so far as nineteen feet from the existing line of road, and the defender would be entitled to insist that any decree obtained by the pursuer should be qualified accordingly. 3. At all events, before the pursuer can insist in his present claim, he must have the public road authoritatively confined to its existing situation, and secure the defender's possession of the nine feet in breadth beyond the existing line, against the claim of eviction made by the road trustees. 4. Supposing the pursuer were to establish a right of property in the ground claimed by him, the defender would be still entitled to exercise a right of servitude over the same, to the effect of preserving it open and unenclosed for the purpose of walking thereon, and of access to and communication with the sea; and any decree to be obtained by the pursuer should be qualified accordingly.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with note annexed:

"20th May 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, and made avizandum, repels the defences, and finds, declares, ordains and decerns, in terms of the libel: Finds the defender liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—This seems a clear case.

"1. The property that has descended to the pursuer comprehends, along its boundary seaward, what the defender himself describes (stat. 2) as 'a small strip of what is called sea-green, of varying breadth, but generally not more than a very few yards.' It is not disputed,—however the parties may differ as to the precise extent,—that the average breadth of this sea-green, at all events, exceeds nine feet. Indeed, in his second plea, the defender contends for a right 'to carry his ground nine feet beyond the full breadth of the public road, or as far as nineteen feet from the existing line of road;' thereby necessarily assuming that there is a sufficient breadth of ground, to the extent of ten feet at least, over and above the nine feet which are here in dispute.

"2. Of this property the defender feued, from a predecessor of the pursuer, a patch, specifically limited both as to boundary and measurement,—it being described as extending 'nine feet in breadth on each of the east and west sides, and bounded as follows, viz.,—by the said public road on the south; by the shore ground of Diverts on the north,' &c., 'and amounting in measure,' along with certain other portions of the subject feued, to an exact and anxiously definite statement of 'two acres four falls and four yards, computing each fall to contain thirty-six superficial yards.'

"3. It is thought to be quite desperate on the defender's part, to contend that such a grant was intended to give him the entire 'shore ground of Diverts,' in place of only a small portion of it, bounded by the rest; or, in other words, to give him the whole space of ground between the road and the sea,—no matter how much its actual breadth might happen to exceed the stipulated and limited measurement of nine feet. And equally so is it for him to pretend that, if the property did not pass, he has at least a right of servitude over it. The feu-right must be construed on the strength of its own expressed words, and not upon any gloss to which the defender may now find it convenient to resort, with reference to the supposed, but not expressed, meaning of the parties. Even, however, as a question of intent, it seems impossible to deny that the superior could mean nothing else than to reserve to himself all that he did not in terminis convey. In truth, the defender's letters (in process), after his present encroachment was first challenged, are conclusive as to his own understanding, viz., that he had no right whatever, either in property or servitude, beyond the express breadth of nine feet for which he had contracted, and for more than which he confessedly had not paid. See especially his letters of 15th January and 19th April 1839: in the latter of which he says,—'As soon as you can produce to me a certificate under the hand of the agent for the trustees, or the surveyor of the road, specifying the precise breadth of said road, we can easily ascertain the precise position of my stripe.' 'I claim nothing more, and I want nothing more than what is conveyed to me by the feu-contract,'—meaning plainly neither more nor less than the specific stripe of nine feet south from, and along the line of the road which he mentions.

"4. It is, in truth, to some alleged proposal of the road trustees to widen this road, and thereby to incorporate and cut off the original space of nine feet conveyed to the defender, rather than to any doubt as to the import or effect of the conveyance itself, that the whole of the present dispute may be traced. The defender's own statement (stat. 10.) is this,—‘At the date of the feu-contract, the actually existing public road, along which the stripe is declared to lie, was, as it continues to be, only thirty feet in breadth. But according to the Acts of Parliament, &c., the trustees were and are entitled to make it of the breadth of forty feet.’ Now, what the defender is in reality contending for in the present case is, a right to have nine feet beyond this road, as it may exist, after being widened, as a surrogatum for the nine feet which were actually conveyed by the feu-right, beyond the road as it existed at its own date. But this will not do. For if he got all that was conveyed, it matters nothing that the road trustees, in the exercise of their statutory powers, either propose to take, or have actually taken from him what, until taken, was sufficient to satisfy the description of the subject in the feu-contract. If, indeed, the defender could establish that the superior was not in titulo at the date of the contract, and that the nine feet which were thereby conveyed, in reality then belonged to the trustees, who had accordingly since evicted them, that might have raised a different case. But even there the defender's remedy would have been an action on his warrandice in respect of the eviction; whereas, it appears from the record, that there has as yet been no eviction in the legal sense, the defender distinctly setting forth (stat. 8), that ‘ever since the date of the contract, the whole ground between the north side of the road and the sea has been used and occupied by him.’ As it is, however, the road trustees appear to have no other right, as regards their widening of the road here in dispute, than they would have as to any other existing road of only thirty feet in breadth. They may widen it,—that is to say, paying compensation to the proprietor. But such proprietor can have no recourse on that account against his author. It is not from defect in the title that the property is taken from him, but from the inherent condition attaching to all property, however undoubted the legal title, and from the exercise of powers, vested on public grounds, in the road trustees, to take such property, let it for the time belong to whom it may. In short, as regards any interference on the part of the road trustees, if a breadth of nine feet had been taken from the defender along the south, instead of along the north side of the road in question, he might just as well have contended, that he was in that case entitled to compensate himself at the expense of the pursuer's estate seaward, as in the actual circumstances under which the present question has arisen.”

The defender reclaimed, and argued.—That the intention of parties was, that the defender should get nine feet from the road northwards, so as to protect him against buildings being erected opposite the south side. But this object will be defeated if the trustees resume possession of the whole forty feet, which they have intimated their intention to do. The declarator is founded upon an unfair and untrue construction of the contract.

Replied.—The question is, is the defender entitled to any other nine feet than those which he got at the date of the contract? It is agreed that the road was then only thirty feet wide; and the contract has regard to the road as it then existed. Supposing the trustees to resolve upon exercising their statutory powers, they may throw the additional breadth of road upon the south side, as well as upon the north. Both by the private Act applicable to this road, passed in 1803, and also by the General Turnpike Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 43, § 61, compensation must be paid. But apart from the road Acts altogether, the parties contracted for a stripe of nine feet along the road, bounded by the shore ground of Diverts on the north. The defender got possession, and there was nothing to have hindered the superior from feuing forthwith behind the nine feet. Ranken maintains that his was a shifting feu; but he was bound to know that the trustees had the power to widen the road.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It is of great importance to understand the allegations put upon the record, for the feu-charter appears to be one susceptible of explanation by proof of the extent of possession. Where there is a discrepancy in the mensuration, it is competent to explain the extent of the right by proof of possession. The stripe here given, is not one of the breadth of nine feet uniformly along the road, but nine feet at each of the ends; and the ground between the road and the sea-shore is said to vary considerably in breadth. The pursuer says, on the one hand, that his tenants were in use to pasture it; while, on the other hand, the defender makes a distinct averment of possession,—that he had built a quay,—and that he, his family and boatmen, had been in the constant practice of using the whole ground in passing to and from the sea, carting gravel, hauling up boats, tracking, and using bathing-houses. This is exactly a case in which it is relevant to allow a proof of possession in order to explain any discrepancy in the mensuration. But although this be the case upon the record, the defender has not adhered to it; he now asks only nine feet from the road, supposing the road to be altered as proposed by the trustees. This is a very different point. The road was thirty feet wide when he contracted, and he got nine feet to the north of it; but he now says, that in respect of the right of the trustees, arising from previous possession, I must be held to have contracted upon the supposition of the probability of their taking forty feet, and that I am entitled to nine feet beyond whatever they take. Now what is the fact? The road it is admitted was only thirty feet, and this was apparent. If Darroch feued the nine feet immediately to the north of the road, and it should turn out that this was not his feu, then the remedy is, not other nine feet, but an action of damages on the warrandice. If, on the other hand, the trustees take the ground feued, in virtue of their statutory powers, this won't give rise to any claim against the pursuer for other nine feet; it can only found a claim against the trustees for the statutory compensation. But where is there a relevant averment to support the defender's construction of the contract. The right of the trustees to resume, or their power to take possession of forty feet, does not solve the question as to what was the ground feued under this contract, or the extent of it. The defender appears to have abandoned the only averments on which an issue might have been framed, and there is now no relevant defence against this declarator.

Lord Moncreiff.—If the measurement specified in the contract was meant to fix the feu-duty by acres and falls, how is it possible that it does not also fix the extent of ground. If the defender occupies more, does he pay for more. There is no power to raise the feu-duty: the nature of the contract is a measured boundary. I do not think there is any relevant averment on record to warrant a proof of possession, in order to interpret a contract so very clear and explicit as this. There is no relevancy in the statement, that the trustees have power to widen the road. If they do so under their statutory powers, the defender will receive the statutory compensation. If they evict his feu, under their right of previous possession, he will have his action against the superior on the clause of warrandice.

Lord Meadowbank.—Looking at the contract, it appeared to me that the shore land of Diverts was to be the northern boundary of the defender. But what he now claims, requires that he should have a shifting boundary. In my opinion he has no case.

Lord Medwyn.—I have great hesitation in holding that this contract requires to be interpreted by a proof of possession, or that there is any relevant averment on the record to entitle the defender to such a proof. The ground feued lies between the road and the sea-shore,—not the whole ground, but a stripe of nine feet along the road. It is described as nine feet at each end, but I think the breadth was uniform along the whole extent; and the northern boundary, it will be observed, is not the sea-shore, but the shore ground of Diverts. The measurement is very precise, and I don't think any thing further is required to enable us to construe the extent of the right. The avermments made by the defender, at least, are not sufficient to make us construe it differently from the measurement. Neither is there any substantive averment that the trustees had right to forty feet of road, from previous possession.

The Court adhered, with expenses.

No. 50.—DONALD LINDSAY, (Marquis of Huntly's Trustee), Pursuer, v. JOHN WEBSTER, Defender.

Bankrupt—Sequestration—Reduction on Act 1621—Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Rent.—A landlord, five years previous to his bankruptcy, addressed a letter to his factor, authorising him to give his tenants a deduction of twenty per cent. from their rents for the bygone year, and to acquaint them that the deduction would be continued during the currency of their leases.—Found that the abatement of rent was in the fair and bona fide administration of the estate at the time, and could not be objected to by the trustee of the landlord under his sequestration.

In 1826, the defender became tenant, under the Marquis of Huntly, then Earl of Aboyne, of the lands of Meadows, for the period of nineteen years from Martinmas 1826. The rent to be paid was £240 per annum. In 1834, the Marquis addressed a letter to his factor, Mr Hillocks, in the following terms :

" Finhaven, 7th November 1834.

" Mr HILLOCKS,—I hereby empower you to discharge the tenants on the estate of Finhaven, by giving them a deduction of rent of 20 per cent., and discharging them accordingly for crop 1833. And, with the exception of Bogardo, I hereby authorise you to acquaint the tenants that I am to continue that deduction during the currency of their several leases."

(Signed) " ABOYNE."

Amongst others, the defender had the letter communicated to him; and year by year the stipulated deduction was given him down to Lord Huntly's bankruptcy in 1839. Thereafter, a process of sequestration was raised against the defender by the present pursuer, as Lord Huntly's trustee, in which the full rents stipulated in the lease were concluded for. The defender pleaded his right to the abatement given in the letter; and the Sheriff of Forfarshire, before whom the process depended, gave effect to the plea. The judgment of the Sheriff was advocated by the trustee; and with the view of aiding the advocacy, the present process of reduction was brought. The summons concludes to have it found and declared that the letter or authority is null and void,—is not holograph of the Marquis,—is not duly signed or tested,—and is otherwise defective in the solemnities required by law. The second is :

" That at and prior to the date of granting the said letter or authority, the said George Marquis of Huntly, then Earl of Aboyne, was in insolvent and bankrupt circumstances, and the same was granted without any true, just, or necessary cause, without a just consideration therefor, and after contracting lawful debts to various creditors, for whose behoof the pursuer is trustee as aforesaid. And the same was so granted to the hurt and prejudice of the said just and lawful creditors, and of the pursuer, as trustee for their behoof, for which reasons, as well as others, the pursuer is entitled to have the said document, above recited, reduced and set aside; and, accordingly, the said letter or authority is null and reducible at common law, and in terms of the Act of Parliament 1621, cap. 18, the Act of Parliament 1696, cap. 5, the Act of 54 Geo. III.

cap. 137, and the said Act in the third year of our reign above mentioned, or one or other of them,—to all of which Acts reference is hereby specially made, and which are hereby held as repeated brevitatis causa."

In defence it was maintained, that although the letter be not holograph, nor signed with the statutory solemnities, it is subscribed by the Marquis, and the signature is admitted. Moreover, rei interventus took place on the faith of it, and it is therefore as completely effectual as the most formal document. The alleged insolvency of Lord Huntly, at the date of the letter, is not admitted; at all events, there is no ground for applying the Statute 1621, which refers to "alienations, dispositions, assignations, and translations whatever, made by the debtor of any of his lands, teinds, reversions, actions, debts or goods whatever, to any conjunct or confident person, without true, just, and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid." The letter in question was manifestly not granted to a conjunct or confident person. As little is there any room for applying the Statute 1696, which applies to securities for prior debts, which is not the case here; and where the debtor has become notour bankrupt, which is not alleged. Again, to warrant a reduction on the head of common law, it would be necessary to establish something fraudulently done on the part of the bankrupt, and the person with whom he contracted, for the purpose of prejudicing the general body of creditors. It is not alleged, however, that the defender was aware of Lord Huntly's being a bankrupt, nor is it even said that Lord Huntly himself was aware of his alleged insolvency.

The reduction and advocacy having been conjoined, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 24th June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in these conjoined processes—In respect, 1st, That the Marquis of Huntly, at the time that the rents of the defenders were restricted, was in possession, and in full administration of the estate of Finhaven: 2d, That no positive averment is made, and still less any specific statement set forth on record, either in this Court or in the Inferior-court, to show that the Noble Marquis, by the restriction of rent authorised by his letter to his factor, dated 7th December 1834, reduced the rents to a lower rate than was proper and justifiable, in a fair and bona fide administration of the estate at the time, or that he acted from any motive or view unduly to favour the tenants at the expense of his creditors, real and personal, having an interest in his estate and affairs: Finds that the pursuer is not entitled to object to the rent as restricted by the said letter of the Marquis of Huntly in 1834, libelled on: Therefore, in the advocacy, adheres to the interlocutor of the Sheriff; remits the cause to the Sheriff simpliciter; and in the reduction, repels the reasons of reduction; sustains the defences, and assolvies the defender from the action of reduction: Finds the defender entitled to expenses, both in the advocacy and reduction, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns."

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued—That singular successors, and creditors-adjudgers, are bound by the lease, or any thing indorsed upon it, but not by a letter such as that founded on; Macleod, 1 Sh. App. 213. An onerous contract, though improbable, may be made good by rei interventus; but can the tenants say here, I have given an onerous consideration for it, and have acted upon it?

Answered—The defender is here in a question, not with heritable but personal creditors. The letter would have been binding against Lord Huntly, and can the personal creditors take the benefit of the lease without the restriction? There was nothing to prevent Lord Huntly from giving up the lease, and granting a new one at the reduced rent. Substantially he did the same thing, and nothing more.

Lord Moncreiff.—I don't always admit the distinctions taken between a purchaser and an adjudging creditor. But here the abatement had actually taken effect, and been acted upon for years before sequestration.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Sequestration is a measure severe enough in itself, without being made rescissory of the best acts of a man's life,—his acts of justice and generosity.

Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn concurred.

The Court adhered, with expenses.

No. 51.—JAMES STEWART of Burgh, Pursuer, v. THOMAS POLLEXFEN, surviving Trustee of the late James Stewart of Burgh, Defender.

Trust—Trustees—Powers—Liability—Bona Fides—A party executed a trust-deed, in which he directed his trustees to invest the whole residue of his funds "in the purchase of lands in Orkney, or any other place they should judge expedient," and to convey them to his heir of entail. The trustees purchased the superior-duties affecting the entailed estate, and which were payable in kind; but it having been found that this was an application of the funds which they had no power to make by virtue of the trust-deed, and that they must account to the heir of entail for the capital sum of money applied in the purchase—Held that they must also account for interest on the capital sum, according to the rate which had been payable on heritable bonds, and that, instead thereof, the heir of entail was not bound to accept of the produce of the subject purchased.

Continuation of case, No. 235, Vol. XIII. p. 543.

On the 14th July last, the Court found that the purchase of feu-duties by the trustees of the late James Stewart of Burgh, was in violation of the direction in the trust-deed to invest the residue of the trust-funds in the purchase of lands, and, therefore, that the trustees must account for the capital sum so applied. But in reference to the question, whether they were to be liable for interest on the said capital sum since the date of the purchase, and if so, at what rate, parties were appointed to be farther heard.

Dean of Faculty (Wood), for the defender, argued—

That the second finding of the Lord Ordinary proceeds upon the assumption of mala fides on the part of the trustees, but this view was not entertained by the Court: on the contrary, it was assumed that the trustees had acted in bona fide. The payment of these duties in kind formed a burden of a very grievous nature upon the entailed estate, and the offer of their redemption required to be accepted within a very limited time. Mr Laing and Mr Clark were both of opinion that the purchase of them formed a good temporary investment of the trust-funds under the deed. The heir ever since has had not only the pecuniary benefit arising from the purchase, but something beyond money—relief from cumbersome and vexatious burdens. At and subsequent to the date of the purchase, the subjects yielded a fair return: they were purchased for £3025, and yielded annually £118. The protecting clause in the deed is unusually broad, and, joined to the bona fides of the trustees, ought to protect them against any claim other than for the actual fruits of the subject. If a party possesses bona fide, on a colourable title, the property of another, the true owner may recover the property, but not the fruits; and so, also, a party paying bona fide to a person who is the colourable creditor, is protected against any claim for second payment at the instance of the true creditor: Ersk. III. 4. 3. In the case of the Duke of Roxburgh (2 Sh. App. p. 18), part of the entailed estate was inadvertently comprehended under the trust, but bona fides protected the trustee against a claim for restitution of the fruits at the instance of the heir of entail. The pursuer was major in 1832, and was previously under curators of his own appointment: he was bound, therefore, to have given notice that he meant to challenge the investment earlier than 1838, when the present action was raised. Finally, if the trustees are to be liable in interest as an accessory of the principal sum, what is to be the rate? Are they to be liable in five per cent.? If the money had been invested in land in Orkney, the heir would have been in a worse situation than if he were compelled to accept the profits of the feu-duties. At the utmost, the trustees cannot be liable for more than would have been drawn on an heritable bond, viz., three and a-half per cent.; but, in the special circumstances of the case, they ought not to be found liable for more than bank interest.

Solicitor-General (McNeill)—

By a previous judgment of the Court it has been found, that the purchase made by the trustees was an unwarrantable and illegal application of the trust-funds, and that the trustees are bound to replace the capital sum. Now, I desiderate the authority for holding that they are not also bound to replace the interest of the capital so applied. The principle of bona fides, as to fructus percepti, is not applicable here: Ersk. II. 1. 25. That principle proceeds upon the supposition of the parties spending what they believe to be their own; but here, confessedly, the application is of another person's funds, and that unwarrantably. The trustees do not pretend a right to the fruits, as in the case of a bona fide possessor. Bona fides exempts altogether from accounting; but no such exemption is pretended here. Between the two cases there is therefore no parallel. I don't say they are bound to account for the highest rate of interest; but the pursuer is entitled to the fair proceeds of the capital sum, according to the state of the market.

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—This is a very hard case against gratuitous trustees. We have affirmed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, finding that they had no power under the trust-deed to apply the trust-funds to the purchase of feu-duties, but we did not affirm the interlocutor in so far as it finds that they did so without any reasonable ground; for, believing that they had power, I think they acted under the belief that they had the power; but the heir rejects the purchase, and I see no principle of law for holding that they are not bound to account for the interest as well as the capital sum. I do not think that the case falls under the principle of bona fide consumption. If a party acquires a property onerously, and consumes the fruits, he is not liable to be called upon for restitution; but here there is an unwarrantable investment of another person's funds, and I don't see that the principle of bona fides applies. The trustees admit that they are liable to account for the profits; and the only dispute is as to their liability for interest instead; but the profits never came into their hands so as to admit of being consumed. Believing that they had the power to make the investment, I think they must be liable only for the rate which would have been drawn upon an heritable bond. As to the claim for accumulation, I cannot lay out of view the improvement which has arisen to the estate from the redemption of these duties, and therefore I would reject that claim.

Lord Moncreiff.—It is very probable that what is proposed by Lord Medwyn may come near the equity of the case. But I am of a different opinion as to the liability of the trustees, and think that they are bound only for the produce. I grant that the purchase was not a legal investment of the trust-funds, or within their powers. This has been already held in law; but it was held also that they made the purchase in perfect bona fides, and under the belief that it was for the benefit of the family. They were neither negligent, nor had any sinister purpose, but were solely under a misapprehension as to their legal powers. They now make good the money so invested, and, meanwhile, the heir has enjoyed the estate freed from these burdens, and unmolested by third parties—by Lord Dundas or others. The rule of law is firmly settled, that if a party has a reasonable title, and, believing himself proprietor, has consumed the fruits, he cannot be called upon to repeat by the true owner. In the case of Bonny, 1760 (Dict. 1728), there were arrears of rent due, and yet the extruded proprietor recovered these in preference to the true owner. In the case of Swinton, legacies were paid away, which, but for the bona fide possession of the legatees, ought to have been restored. In Dick v. Cook, the party obtained a declarator, and entered into possession. The decree was found to be null, and a claim was made for the rents according to the rental; but it was found that he was liable to account only for what he received. There are also the familiar cases of persons paying to wrong creditors, and many others. The general principle is, that a party possessing on an ostensible title, is not bound to restore the fruits; and surely the strongest of all possible cases is that of a party possessing and using property which is not his own. The present case is much simpler, and the equity is plain and clear. The pursuer seems to mistake the point, when he supposes that the subject of the trustees' possession was the feu-duties. The subject is the price which they are called upon to repay out of their own pockets, and the fruits of which they have consumed in their own families in perfect bona fides. If no fruits at all had been found due, this would have assimilated the case to the others; but here the defenders themselves reap nothing but labour and anxiety. They take no produce: their hands are entirely clean. Is not this much stronger than the case of Bonny—of Swinton, and others? They made a mistake in law, and they replace the fund misapplied:—is not this a severe enough penalty without being subjected also in interest? It is a fortiori of all the cases. There may be a difficulty as to the teind-duties; but having given to the heir all that they themselves got, it would only be a difficulty. After all, it will be difficult to do justice between the parties. The heir has derived a benefit which cannot be estimated. If it is to be by interest, it must be according to the rate which has been payable on bonds. I see no ground for accumulation. That would neither give effect to the bona fides of the trustees, nor to the protecting clause in the trust-deed.

Lord Meadowbank.—I never meant to attribute any thing like an immoral or dishonest purpose to these trustees; but after what we have already found, that the purchase of these duties was illegal and unwarrantable, we cannot give them the benefit of perfect bona fides. We have now nothing to do with the purchase: that is ius tertii. The only remaining point is, that the trustees having had money belonging to the estate in their pockets for a number of years, are they to be liable in interest? I agree with the opinion of Lord Medwyn.

Lord Justice-Clerk requested to be allowed to decline, in consequence of having been counsel in the cause.

Lord Moncreiff observed, that it was ruled in the case of President Blair, that the being counsel in the cause was no disqualification; but if his Lordship wished to decline, there could be no objection to his doing so.

The Court found that the trustees were liable in interest on the capital sum, according to the rate which had been payable upon heritable bonds.

No. 52.—JAMES CORBETT PORTERFIELD of Porterfield, Pursuer, v. NATHANIEL GORDON PORTERFIELD and OTHERS, Defenders.

Entail—Construction.—The maker of an entail called to the succession a number of substitutes, reserving to himself the power to alter the succession, except as to the first five substitutions; as to which the said order of succession is declared unalterable by himself, or his son the institute, or by the heirs of tailzie above mentioned—Held that “the heirs above mentioned” denoted not merely the first five substitutions, but the heirs generally; and that the prohibition against altering the succession was binding upon the sixth and succeeding substitutes.

Entail—Resolutive Clause.—At the conclusion of a general resolutive clause there followed a directory clause as to the way in which the heirs succeeding upon a contravention may make up titles to the estate,—the direction to the next heir being to establish his right without respect to “any innovation, alteration or change, by the person contravening, or any acts of commission or omission, or any acts or deeds whatsoever, which may import any contravention of the above-written clause irritant”—Held that this directory clause formed no part of the resolutive clause, and that the omitting to enumerate therein sales or debts, did not exempt those acts from the prohibitions of the entail.

Entail—Precept of Sasine—Statute 1685.—In the precept of sasine there was no express mention of the resolutive clause—the mandate being merely to give sasine “with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned”—Held that these words comprehend both the irritant and resolutive clauses.

The deceased Alexander Porterfield of that ilk, executed an entail, contained in a contract of marriage between William Porterfield, Esq., his son, and Miss Julian Steill, dated the 19th and 21st October 1721, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies the 12th December thereafter. The clause of destination called to the succession

“the heirs-mala procreate or to be procreate of the said marriage betwixt the said William Porterfield and Julian Steel; whilks failing, the heirs-male of the body of the said William Porterfield of any other marriage; whilks failing, the heirs-male of the body of the said Alexander Porterfield; whilks failing, the eldest heir-female of the body of the said William Porterfield, and the descendants of the body of the said eldest heir-female, without division; whilks failing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said William Porterfield, and the descendants of the body of the said next heir-female successive, all without division; whilks failing, any other heirs of tailzie to be nominated and appointed by the said Alexander Porterfield, by writ under his hand, at any time in his lifetime, in his liege poustie; whilks failing, the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Alexander Porterfield, and the descendants of the body of the said eldest heir-female, without division; whilks failing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said Alexander Porterfield, and the descendants of the body of the said next heir-female, without division; whilks also failing, the said William Porterfield his nearest lawful heirs and assignees whatsoever.”

Full powers were reserved by Alexander Porterfield to alter the order of succession, except the heirs-male and female of his son William's body, and the heirs-male of his own body:

“And furder, reserving full power and liberty to the said Alexander Porterfield, at any time in his lifetime, he being in liege poustie, to alter, innovate or change the order, course and succession of the hail heirs of tailzie above specified, except the heirs-male and female of his son's body, and the heirs-male descending of the said Alexander Porterfield his own body, and that by writ under his hand, notwithstanding of this present right of fee, and infeftments to follow hereupon, in favours of the said William Porterfield, and the heirs of tailzie above specified; declaring always, likeas it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said William Porterfield, and his heirs and successors, shall be obliged to take the rights, securities, and infeftments of the saids bail lands and others above mentioned, with the burden of the irritancies and provisions herein contained, to and in favours of such heirs of tailzie as the said Alexander Porterfield shall so nominate and appoint, failing the heirs, male and female, of the said William Porterfield his body, and the heirs-male of the body of the said Alexander Porterfield, as said is, as to which heirs, male and female, of the body of the said William Porterfield, and the heirs-male of the body of the said Alexander Porterfield, the aforesaid succession is hereby declared unalterable by the said Alexander Porterfield, or by the said William Porterfield, and the heirs of tailzie above mentioned, conform to the clauses irritant after mentioned."

The irritant and resolute clauses are in the usual terms; and in the event of any contravention, the entail proceeds with the following directory as to the making up titles to the estate by the heir succeeding:

"And it shall be leisum to the next heir of tailzie to establish the right of the saids lands and others foresaids, with the pertinents, in his or her person, and that either by declarator or serving heir to the person who died last vest and seised in the lands and others foresaids, immediately before the contravener, or by adjudication, or any other manner of way, consisting with the laws and practiqs of this kingdom for the time, without respect to the person contravening, or the descendants of his or her body, and without respect to any innovation, alteration or change foresaid, to be made by the person so contravening; and without the burden of any acts of commission or omission, or any other act or deed whatsoever, which, according to the law, may be interpret to import any contravention of the above-written clause irritant."

The precept of sasine is, to give infeftment "to the said William Porterfield, and the heirs of tailzie above mentioned, in the order above set down, and with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned."

In 1742, Alexander Porterfield executed a deed of nomination, referring to the entail of 1721, and nominating certain other heirs, among whom was Jean Porterfield, the eldest daughter of the entailer, from whom the present pursuer is descended. Alexander Porterfield died on the 14th of May 1743. Besides his eldest son William, in whose favour the deed of entail was executed, he had a second son named John. William died without issue in 1752. His brother John had predeceased him, but left a son, Boyd Porterfield, who succeeded his uncle William.

Boyd Porterfield was succeeded by his son Alexander, who died in 1815, without issue; on which event the lines of succession in the two deeds of 1721 and 1742 separated, and a competition for the entailed estates arose betwixt Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, who was the son of the eldest daughter of Boyd Porterfield and Mr Corbett, the father of the pursuer, who was the descendant of Jean Porterfield, the eldest daughter of Alexander Porterfield, the entailer, and spouse of James Corbett of Tollcross. Mr Corbett claimed to be served heir under the nomination contained in the deed of 1742. Sir Michael Shaw Stewart claimed to be served under the destination in the original deed of 1721. Both claimants died during the litigation which ensued,—Mr Corbett, the pursuer's father, having, however, lived upwards of three years after the succession opened to him. But the eldest sons of each claimant took up the respective pleas of their fathers; and after a long litigation, the pursuer of the present action was preferred to the succession on 13th November 1829.

The pursuer, conceiving that the entail is defective, raised the present action, concluding to have it found and declared that he has full and undoubted right and power to make up and complete in his person valid titles to the lands and others in fee-simple. The conclusions of the summons were supported on four grounds—1st, That the prohibition against altering the succession applied exclusively to the first five branches of the destination contained in the original deed: 2d, That the terms "heirs of tailzie above specified," "heirs of tailzie above mentioned," being so restricted in the clause prohibiting alterations of the succession, the meaning of the subsequent words, "hail heirs of tailzie above mentioned," "any others, the members of tailzie above mentioned," are thereby fixed, and thus the prohibitions throughout the whole entail are limited to the five first substitutions: 3d, That the resolute clause, while it enumerates certain acts of contravention,— "innovation, alteration, or change foresaid,"—does not comprehend selling,—the "acts of commission or omission, or any other act or deed," being applicable only to feudal delinquencies: 4th, That the precept of sasine does not refer to, or comprehend the resolute clause, "with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th March 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record and whole process, and made avizandum, sustains the defences; assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decerns; finds no expenses due.

"Note.—The pursuer objects to the validity of the entail on four several grounds. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that he has not succeeded in any of them.

"The first was, that the prohibition (and irritancies) against altering the order of succession applied only to the first five substitutions; and that, as these are all now exhausted, he was at liberty to alter all that remained. The second, which rests on a more extensive application of the same principle, is, that the whole fetters and limitations of the deed are directed against the said five first substitutions only; and that he who has succeeded under the sixth, is therefore free from the whole of these limitations. He was at one time understood to claim a special exemption for this sixth branch (that of heirs to be named, and afterwards actually named by the entailer). But he did not insist upon this at the argument, and rested this part of the case on the two propositions now stated. They came naturally to be considered together; and it would be difficult to say which rests on the most insufficient foundation.

"The basis of both is in a clause on p. 11 of the printed entail, beginning at the marginal letter B, and ending between E and F. The sole and plain object of this clause is to give Alexander Porterfield (the entailer) full power to alter the order of succession of the whole heirs previously specified, with the exception of the first five substitutions, which includes the issue, male and female, of his son's body, and his own issue male. This is the whole object and effect of the clause. But it is expressed with an unfortunate anxiety and redundancy of useless words, which certainly add nothing to its clearness, though the Lord Ordinary cannot think that they raise such obscurity as to give colour or countenance to the pursuer's extravagant attempt to construe out of them a permission to him, and indeed to all the prior and postponed heirs, to alter the latter branches of the destination at their pleasure.

"There are various clauses of surplusage, to some of which it may be objected, that they have no very distinct meaning; and of all of which it may certainly be said, that they can have no actual effect; though least of all the effect contended for by the pursuer. The first and sufficing provision is, that Alexander Porterfield shall have power and liberty, at any time of his life, to innovate and alter the whole order of succession above specified, except only as to the first five substitutions; and this, it will scarcely be disputed, was of itself unequivocal and complete. But the conveyancer, in his anxiety, thinks fit to add,—‘as to which (these five first branches) the said order of succession is hereby declared to be unalterable by the said Alexander Porterfield. Though superfluous, there was no great harm, perhaps, or excess of caution in this. But this becomes rather questionable, when we go on and find it anxiously provided, in addition, that the said privileged substitutions shall also be unalterable,—1st, ‘By the said William Porterfield,’ (the son); or, 2dly, ‘By the heirs of tailzie above mentioned, conform to the clauses irritant after mentioned.’ Considering that the whole clause is a mere qualification or limitation of the general power of alteration previously given to Alexander Porterfield the entailor, and to him only, it is abundantly evident that the whole of these last declarations are mere surplussage, and amount to no more than an emphatic, but idle announcement, that the five privileged substitutions shall be absolutely unalterable; that is, not alterable either by him or any one else who may be called to the succession; a very needless, but certainly a very innocent, because an entirely inoperative, declaration.

“But the pursuer will have it, that ‘the heirs of tailzie above mentioned,’ who are thus idly precluded from altering the first five substitutions (they never having had any power to alter at all), can only mean the heirs included in these very substitutions, since no such power could possibly be assumed by any that came after; in respect that the whole of these previous substitutions must have run out and been exhausted before they were called to the succession. The Lord Ordinary is perfectly satisfied that no such views were in the mind of the party who introduced these words, and that they meant no more than that these first substitutions should not be altered by any body, without stopping to consider whether all the persons included in this most general prohibition could possibly have attempted to do so or not. But it is worth observing, that the imputed absurdity, whatever it may be, would be very little mended by adopting the views of the pursuer, since the prohibition would still apply to all the members of the first five branches, while it is obvious that it must have been just as impossible for those under the fourth or the fifth to have attempted to alter the first, second, or third, as for those of the sixth or seventh branch to have altered that of the fifth, while those of the fifth itself could have nothing to alter at all. The concluding words, in short, meant merely that the privileged substitutions should not be altered at all; while all that came after the declaration that they should not be altered by Alexander Porterfield, was, for any practical purpose, palpably superfluous and ineffectual. The only conjecture by which the Lord Ordinary can at all account for the idle redundancy of these last expressions, is suggested by the reference there made to the ‘clauses irritant’ that were to follow; and is, that as no express prohibition against altering the order of succession had yet been introduced, it might have been thought right to intimate that Alexander Porterfield, who had obtained a special power of alteration, was to be precluded from exercising it, as to these first five branches, by this express reservation, while all the other parties were to be disabled from touching them (or any of the other substitutions), by virtue of the general prohibitions and irritancies which were to ensue; the effect or application of which, however, could never be narrowed or affected by this needless and anticipating reference.

“But even if all this were doubtful, upon what principle does the pursuer propose to construe, out of this anxious and unnecessary prohibition to alter certain substitutions, an actual power or permission to alter all the rest? But for these words, it is not disputed that all the substitutions would be unalterable, except by Alexander Porterfield alone. The words, however, are words of intensive prohibition, or refusal of power, and nothing else; and how, therefore, can they possibly import an actual permission, to all and every of the heirs, to do away with the whole latter part of the destination, and even with that sixth branch, for the privilege of introducing which, provision is so anxiously made in various parts of the deed? Because it is said that neither Alexander Porterfield, nor his son William, nor any of the other heirs, shall alter the five first substitutions, the pursuer actually maintains that the power of altering all the other substitutions must be held to be conferred, not merely upon all the members of the five first, but upon them, and all who may be afterwards called to the succession; and that, in consequence of this most stringent prohibition, the leading part of the clause, which, as it actually stands, merely gives power to Alexander Porterfield alone, at any time of his life, to alter all the other substitutions, must be read as if it had expressly provided that the same powers should be given to one and all of the heirs and members of tailzie, from William Porterfield down to the last nominatim substitute, inclusive.

“It is a very sound maxim in law, that exceptio firmat regulam in casibus non exceptis,—but it is only applicable to cases in which the regula itself is laid down with clearness and precision; and where is the rule that gives all the members of this entail a general power to alter all the substitutions, except the five first? Such a power no doubt is given to Alexander Porterfield, and the exception may accordingly confirm the rule as to him. But there is no such power given either by words or implication to any of the heirs; and the prohibition as to them is not therefore an exception at all, but a mere partial anticipation of the general provision by which all alteration is afterwards interdicted as to them. It is remarkable, too, and if the matter were not otherwise clear, would be per se decisive, that Alexander Porterfield, being neither an heir (or institute) of entail, nor continuing in the fee of the lands (for his right is reduced to a mere liferent), was neither, on the one hand, within the fetters, nor on the other, entitled, but for them to effect the descent of the property. His right to alter the succession (pro parte), and the limitations on that right, are both, therefore, the mere creatures of express contract and stipulation, and consequently, bear no analogy to the rights and limitations of these rights, which might afterwards vest in, or attach to, those who might actually take up the tailzied fee. The concluding words of the clause so often referred to, accordingly show that this distinction was fully in the view of the entailor: since, after giving the power, and restraining it by express words in the case of Alexander, he refers for the parallel restraints to be imposed on the heirs, to the subsequent prohibitions and irritancies, by which he could be in no way affected.

“The Lord Ordinary therefore holds it to be abundantly clear, that it is impossible to sustain the pursuer’s leading proposition, that it is only the five first substitutions in this deed that are protected from alteration; or that, when William Porterfield, ‘and all the heirs or members of tailzie above mentioned,’ are afterwards (as at p. 12, E F) expressly prohibited from ‘altering, innovating, or changing the foresaid tailzie and order of succession above prescribed,’ this is only meant of the succession under these five substitutions. The words of the particular clauses, as well as the frame, policy, and structure of the whole deed, are utterly exclusive, it is thought, of so strange and extravagant a conclusion.

“But if this be so, there can be still less difficulty as to his second objection, which rests, if possible, upon a yet narrower foundation. Assuming, as the Lord Ordinary thinks quite erroneously, that the words, ‘the heirs of tailzie above mentioned,’ in the close of the clause so often quoted, limiting Alexander’s power of alteration (p. 11, E F), means only the heirs under the five first substitutions, he observes, that this clause happens to stand immediately before those which impose the cardinal prohibitions and irritancies of the entail, and that in some of those (though this, too, is inaccurate in point of fact) the restrictions are laid on the heirs under the same general denomination of ‘the heirs of tailzie above mentioned,’ and upon this assumption he contends, by a monstrous extension (or perversion rather) of the rule laid down in the cases of Tillycoultry, Ballilisk, and others, that in all these restricting clauses the words should have the same limited meaning, which he says they had in the preceding clause, and, consequently, that the whole fetters and limitations should be held applicable only to the members of these first substitutions.

“It is almost unnecessary to specify the many answers that suggest themselves to this extraordinary deduction. But, as it was very much pressed in argument, the Lord Ordinary shall shortly refer to some of them. In the first place, he is satisfied, for the reasons already stated, that the words in the preceding clause, being in themselves most comprehensive and general words, were not those used with any special reference to the heirs of the first substitutions exclusively; and if they were not, the whole ground of inference, and the basis of the objection, falls.

"In the second place, there is no such connection between the clause in which they first occur, being a special clause as to the reserved powers of the entailer, and not relating at all to the rights or disabilities of the heirs, and those which happen immediately to follow, in which all the limitations of the deed are engrossed, as to justify the transference or adoption into those latter clauses of any limited or peculiar meaning, which the context of the first clause may have put upon them in that connection. In all the cases referred to, the clauses into which the limited meaning was adopted, not only had a direct and necessary reference to those from which that limitation was inferred, but were in truth regarded as the sequel and complement of the preceding clauses; and it was entirely upon the ground of this dependence, and substantial integration of the whole as one complex provision, that the judgments in question proceeded. In the present case, however, there is palpably no room for the application of such a principle; and by adopting the views of the pursuer, the whole object and policy of the most elaborate parts of the deed would be wantonly frustrated, instead of being merely rendered into conformity with the other parts, which was the end sought to be accomplished by the decisions in the other cases.

"But, in the third place, and this is all that need be further said on the matter, the words used in the preceding clause, though themselves broad and comprehensive enough for the obvious purpose in view, are not in fact the words, in the first or in the most material of the subsequent clauses, by which the fetters and irritancies are imposed,—the latter words being in every case still more general and comprehensive. The first in order of those subsequent clauses, and that which immediately follows the provisions about Alexander Porterfield, is that which enjoins the bearing of the name and arms; and this is laid expressly (p. 11, G) on 'the haill heirs of tailzie above mentioned, as well female as male, and the whole descendants of their bodies,' which is a marked diversity of expression, and is the phrase actually used to distinguish the whole line of destination, from the first five branches, in the very clause giving Alexander Porterfield his powers of alteration: the words of that provision being, that he should have power 'to alter the order of succession of the haill heirs of tailzie above specified, except the first five substitutions.' This injunction as to the name and arms is also followed up by a special resolutive clause (the mere neglect or omission against which it is directed, not being thought apparently to admit of a proper irritancy), the tenor of which marks still more emphatically the clear and express intention of the maker, that the whole fetters should apply to the whole destination; for it ends by declaring that the heirs succeeding to those forfeited for this contravention, shall be under the like irritancies 'to which the haill heirs of tailzie above mentioned, and the descendants of their bodies, are to be subject and liable, through the haill succession in time coming.'

"It is thought to be quite clear, therefore, that this first penal injunction is not laid on the first five branches alone, but on the whole heirs of destination; and as it stands immediately after the clause supposed to limit the meaning of 'heirs of tailzie above mentioned,' so it breaks the only connection that clause ever had with any other of the limiting clauses, viz., that of juxtaposition, or immediate sequence, and disjoins them in place as much as they almost were in substance and effect. But there is in effect a similar variance in the terms of all the other material clauses. That against altering the order of succession (p. 12, E F), is directed against 'the said William Porterfield, the heirs-male of his body, and any others the members of tailzie above mentioned.' While that against selling or burdening with debt is addressed, in like manner, against 'the said William Porterfield, the heirs-male of his body, and all others the heirs and members of tailzie above mentioned,'—clauses which are not only substantially varied from those in the clauses relied on, but which, both by the particulars with which they begin, and the generality to which they are afterwards so anxiously extended, are plainly irreconcilable with the notion that they were intended to relate, or could relate only to the first five substitutions.

"These two heads dispose of what is most material, and almost all that is peculiar in the argument of the pursuer. The two remaining objections, though more plausible perhaps in themselves, seem to require fewer observations.

"The third is, that, in what the pursuer calls the concluding part of the resolutive clause, there is an attempt to enumerate the acts of contravention against which it shall be operative, but that this is so imperfect as to omit all mention of sales or debts, and that these may therefore be entered into with effect. It may well be doubted whether there is any thing, in the passage referred to, which amounts to an enumeration of particulars, or indicates that such a thing was in contemplation,—the only things mentioned being, 'any innovation, or change, or any acts of commission or omission, or any acts &c. deeds whatsoever, which may import any contravention of the above-written clause irritant,' which is substantially but a general reference to the previous details, and differs in this respect most materially from the case of Skelmorlie and Coilsfield, now under consideration, upon a similar objection (inter alia), of the whole Court.

"But the satisfying answer is, that this alleged imperfect enumeration does not occur in the resolutive clause at all, nor in any clause that is essential to the entail, but in a mere superfluous directory as to the way in which the heirs succeeding upon a contravention may make up titles to the estate, already freed of the whole acts of the contravener, by virtue of the confessedly perfect irritant clause, and of his fee or interest in it by virtue of a resolutive clause, to the completeness of which it is plainly impossible to take any exception. That the directory clause itself is a mere superfluity, in which it is, of course, of no consequence whether there be any enumeration, complete or incomplete, of particulars, is apparent, indeed, from its very tenor, which really enjoins no definite or preferable mode of proceeding whatever, but merely declares that the title may be made up 'either by serving to the last person who did not contravene, or by declarator, or by adjudication, or by any other manner of way consistent with the laws and practice of this kingdom for the time.' In all the cases referred to, where a defective enumeration was found to be altogether ineffectual as to the particulars omitted, and not capable of being cured by subjoining words of a more general description, the defect occurred in the body and vital part, either of the irritant or resolutive clause itself. But both these clauses are singularly complete and perfect in the present case; and both proceeded upon the most general reference to all acts and deeds prohibited, and without any thing bearing the semblance of an enumeration of particulars.

"The fourth or last objection is, that though the Statute requires the irritant and resolutive clauses to be inserted in the procuratories and precepts of sasine, they are not so inserted in this case; and specially, that there is no mention of the resolutive clause in the precept upon which the title was made up,—the mandate being merely to give sasine 'with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned.' Now, the Lord Ordinary has always understood it to be settled, since the case of Murray Kinnymound, reported by Lord Kilkerran (Mor. 15,380), that where the whole restraining clauses are recited at length (as in the case here) in the procuratory, it is enough that they be generally referred to in the precept,—the real precept of sasine and warrant of infeftment in that case being, as Lord Kilkerran observes, the whole deed, which must have been in the hands of the notary at the time. This of course is a conclusive answer as to the want of a detailed repetition of the clauses in the precept; and as to the other objection, that the general reference is only to 'the burdens and provisions, and irritant clauses,' without mention of the resolutive clause, the Lord Ordinary thinks it a satisfactory answer, that in the technical language of the time, in the Statute of 1685 itself, and in various passages of this very entail, the word irritancy is applied indiscriminately to the voidance and annulment, either of the acts of contravention, or of the personal right of the contravener, and in fact is an apt and proper word for describing these several annulments, which (in substance and reality) belong to the same category. It is well known, accordingly, that in the writings of eminent lawyers of that age, what we now call the resolutive clause was frequently called the irritant, and vice versa,—the truth being, that either denomination would describe well enough the object and effect of each,—the right of the contravener being properly enough said to be irritated, and that of the party who would otherwise profit by the act of contravention being in effect resolved. In two several parts of the Statute, accordingly, the words irritant and irritancy are used as denoting the whole fetters and penalties of the tailzie; and in three or four passages of this entail, they are used unequivocally in the same sense. Thus, in the sequel of the clause already referred to in relation to the third objection, it is provided (p. 13, F), that the heirs succeeding upon any contravention shall, in their turn, 'be subject and liable to the same irritancies to which the hail heirs of tailzie are to be subject and liable, through the whole course of succession.' The expression, however, occurs again on two occasions, where the use of it, in this indisputably general sense, is the more remarkable, as it bears an immediate reference to a contravention against which, as consisting in a mere omission, there were no termini habiles for a proper clause irritant (as the law is now understood), and where, accordingly, the prohibition is fenced with nothing but a separate and special clause resolutive. One of these relates to the obligation to bear the name and arms, and has been already referred to for another purpose. After providing that the heir contravening shall omit, lose and tyme all right to the estate, the deed goes on to say (p. 12, D), that the heir succeeding on this contravention, shall himself be obliged instantly 'to assume, bear and wear the said name and arms, under the like irritancies, as the hail heirs above mentioned,' &c. The other is as to the obligation to purge all diligences affecting the lands, to the neglect of which also, as consisting merely in non faciendo, no proper irritant clause (ut nunc loquimur) seems to have been thought applicable. For to that also there is merely annexed a special resolutive clause; in the end of which, after declaring that the heir so neglecting shall omit and lose all right to the lands, it is merely provided that the heirs succeeding (p. 15, G) 'shall be subject and liable to the same irritancy, if they do not purge and redeem the said diligences within six months after their succession by the said contravention,' although the only irritancy provided was that effected by the clause resolutive immediately preceding. There are other passages to the same effect, but these are probably sufficient; and when it is considered that the precept makes a general reference to 'the whole burdens and provisions above mentioned,' which of itself would probably be enough, as well as to 'the clauses irritant' in the plural, there really seems no ground for doubting that this ground of objection is as untenable as any of the others."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Moncreiff.—Although it may be perfectly fair in the pursuer to try this question, it scarcely admits of a doubt. I cannot think that the prohibition against altering the order of succession applies only to the first five substitutions, and not to the heirs to be afterwards named. The whole of that portion of the deed has reference to a particular matter,—the reserved power of the entailor to alter, except as to the heirs of the body of William Porterfield, and the heirs-male of his own body. To render assurance doubly sure, he declares that the order of succession as to these heirs shall not only be unalterable by himself, but also "by William Porterfield, or by the heirs of tailzie above mentioned." This was no doubt useless. But the prohibitions of the entail properly begin after this special clause, and the one relating to the bearing the name and arms of Porterfield. The prohibitions are in the most regular and correct form, and cover all the heirs of tailzie, and amongst others, the heirs to be nominated under the reserved power of the entailor. The second objection is a modification of the first. In regard to the third, the imperfect specification occurs, not in the proper resolutive clause, but in that which regulates the mode in which the next heir is to make up titles to an heir contravening. The same question occurred in the Eglington case, and has been found not to be a good objection. The general words, "deeds of commission or omission," are not sufficient to make a resolutive clause; but here they follow the resolutive clause. The fourth objection is the only point which presents any appearance of difficulty; but I do not think that it is well founded. The rule of the Statute is, that the irritant and resolutive clauses must be inserted in the sasine; but here, as in Murray Kinnymound, 5th July 1784, the clauses are engrossed in the same deed; and in that case, the precept is the whole deed, if reference be made to them in the sasine. The term "irritant clauses" is applicable both to the irritant and resolutive clauses. It is so used in the Statute; and being here used in the plural, it must comprehend both. At the origin of these clauses, they were considered as one clause. On the whole matter, I think it is impossible to give effect to these objections.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court adhered, with expenses.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 53.—ROBERT, JOSEPH and THOMASINA STEPHENSON, Pursuers, v. ARCHIBALD DUNLOP and OTHERS (Roughead's Trustees), Defendants.

Mandate.—Process.—A mandatory held sufficient, because in station and circumstances equal to those of the party.

In 1814, an action was raised by Thomas and William Stephenson, both now deceased, against James Roughead and others, the trustees under their father's settlement. The action fell asleep, and was awakened in 1822. It again fell asleep, and both the original pursuers being dead, the present action of wakening and transference was raised in name of Thomasina and Joseph Stephenson, children of the original pursuer, Thomas Stephenson, and of Robert Stephenson, executor-dative of his uncle, William Stephenson, the other original pursuer, and directed against the original defenders, or their representatives or trustees, and, among others, the trustees of James Roughead. Thomasina Stephenson was resident in Scotland, but both Robert and Joseph Stephenson were resident in England at Alderly Parks, where Robert was employed as farm-steward of the Earl of Derby, and Joseph lived with Robert, without employment. Robert and Joseph Stephenson were accordingly required to sist a mandatory, and proposed Robert Brown, Robert Stephenson's father-in-law, a farm-servant in East-Lothian, with a large family, and no other means than the earnings of his labour. The defenders objected to the sufficiency of the mandatory, but the Lord Ordinary repelled the objection, and sustained Robert Brown "as mandatory for Robert Stephenson and Joseph Stephenson."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—The cases mentioned are direct precedents, and I think we must follow them, in holding that the mandatory need not be of any higher grade than the party. I cannot admit, however, that the mandatory proposed is of the same station as both the parties. As to one of them, I think he is; but as to the other, it does not follow, that because Robert Stephenson was only a farm-servant when he left East-Lothian, we are to consider his station as no better than that of a farm-servant still. It appears that he has been selected by the Earl of Derby to be his steward, and now holds that office, which is certainly much superior to that of the proposed mandatory, who is a common servant, with a family, and earns annually from £20 to £25. This is surely a station much inferior to that of steward to the Earl of Derby.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that Robert Brown is not a sufficient mandatory for Robert Stephenson, and to that extent recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; but find that the said Robert Brown is a sufficient mandatory for the said Joseph Stephenson, and to that extent adhere to the interlocutor; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly; reserving all questions of expenses."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.R.)

No. 54.—JOHN STEWART, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM CUNINGHAME, Defender.

Expenses.—Superior and Vassal—Agent and Client.—A vassal found liable to the agent of the superior for the expense of preparing a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat, though, from the vassal's having afterwards resolved to enter in a different form, the deeds prepared were cancelled.

Messrs Pearson and Robertson, W.S., agents for William Cuninghame of Craigends, to whom the dominium utile of the lands of Fultons belongs, wrote John Stewart, W.S., agent for Major David Ogilvie Stewart, the superior, to the following effect:

"We now beg to send you the titles of the Fultons in the person of the late Mr Cuninghame, conform to inventory, to which you will find a note of the nature of the entry to be granted annexed. You will see from this, that parts of the Fultons lands are now held under entail, in virtue of four ex-cambions made in 1815 and 1819, and the remainder of the lands are still held in fee-simple, under the original titles.

"The draft of a charter was prepared some time ago by Mr Barr, writer, Paisley, and sent to us, which we have revised and made applicable to the part of the lands still held in fee-simple. We now send you the draft revised, that it may be extended and signed.

"With regard to the parts of the lands now under entail (the description of which is just the same as the lands excepted from the fee-simple land's description), we will thank you to prepare and send us for revisal the draft of a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat, which will be to the series of heirs, and with the conditions and restrictions contained in the Craigends' entail, an extract of which is herewith sent.

"We will feel obliged if you would send us the draft of the charter with as little delay as possible."

Mr Stewart prepared drafts of the deeds, and sent them to Messrs Pearson and Robertson, who returned them "revised," and wrote at the same time, inter alia, "The rental of the Fultons is about £600 a-year. We shall be glad to know when the charters are ready for delivery." Mr Stewart afterwards wrote that the deeds were completed, and added—"Major Stewart is entitled to a composition for the entailed lands, in which Mr Cuninghame enters as a singular successor,—the amount of which I will be glad to adjust with you." "Inclosed I send you a note of the fees of both charters, amounting to £38. 10s." In answer, Messrs

Pearson and Robertson expressed their surprise at the claim

"of composition for the entailed part of Fultons, as for an entry of a singular successor. This claim we cannot recognise in any shape, holding it to be clear beyond doubt, that Mr Cuninghame is entitled to an entry in the whole of the Fultons as an heir."

The letter concluded:

"We trust, therefore, that on reconsidering the matter, you will see the propriety of giving up the claim to an entry as singular successor; but should you still adhere to it, we have no objection to refer the point to some respectable practitioner."

Owing to Mr Stewart's absence from home, the letter of Messrs Pearson and Robertson was handed to Mr Christopher Douglas, W.S., who wrote them to the following effect:

"It appears to me that Major Stewart's right to a composition, as on the entry of a singular successor, from Mr Cuninghame, in those parts of the lands which have been entailed, and which had been conveyed by the last vassal to a third party, although now vested in the heir, is well founded. It is solely in the character of a singular successor that he seeks and obtains an entry. Without, however, at present discussing the point farther, I, on behalf of Major Stewart, agree to your suggestion, to refer the question, whether a composition, or what consideration, is payable by Mr Cuninghame on his present entry, to any professional gentleman, to be fixed on; and I beg to suggest any one of the following, all of whom must have had similar points under their consideration, viz., Messrs Andrew Storie, Richard Mackenzie, H. D. Hill, or John Dundas."

Messrs Pearson and Robertson selected Mr Mackenzie "as the referee." A letter of reference was accordingly prepared, in which Messrs Pearson and Robertson for Mr Cuninghame, and Mr Douglas for Major Stewart, submitted to Mr Mackenzie's decision, "whether a composition, as on the entry of a singular successor, or what consideration, is payable by Mr Cuninghame to Major Stewart on the present entry?" Mr Mackenzie pronounced the following award:

"I am of opinion, that as the charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat by Major Ogilvie Stewart, in favour of William Cuninghame, Esq. of Craigends, of the lands of Fultons and others, confirms various titles in favour of parties other than the heir aliique successorum, Mr Cuninghame is liable, on obtaining delivery of the charter and precept, in payment to Major Stewart, the superior, of a year's rent of the lands, in name of composition for the entry." "Note.—The circumstance stated on the part of Mr Cuninghame, that the different parties whose titles were confirmed, although appearing, ex facie, to be singular successors, were merely trustees for the heir-at-law, does not, in my opinion, affect the validity of the claim on the part of the superior."

After the award was pronounced, Messrs Pearson and Robertson wrote Mr Douglas, stating, that in consequence of it,

"we decline entering in the form proposed, which we should never have thought of, had we conceived that the composition of a singular successor was to be required. We are, however, willing to take out a precept of clare constat in these parts of the Fultons, in favour of Mr Cuninghame, as nearest heir to William Cuninghame, his grandfather, the last entered vassal, and we shall then complete the title to the property ourselves, as we best can. Be so good as let us know whether Major Stewart is willing to grant an entry in that form.

"We are also ready to take delivery of the charter, of the fee-simple part of the lands, and to pay the expense of the charter, amounting, as per Mr Stewart's note, to £14. 10s."

Mr Douglas replied, that he considered them barred from resiling by the reference, but he ultimately expressed his readiness

"to extend the late reference to Mr Mackenzie, and in addition to what was there referred to, refer to him, whether, in the circumstances of this case, and according to practice and equity, the whole year's rent of the lands to be entered to, or if not, what proportion thereof ought to be paid by Mr Cuninghame to Major Stewart, on receiving the charter already prepared.

"In proposing this additional reference, I do so on the distinct understanding, that if it is agreed to by you, the award of Mr Mackenzie is to be implemented by both parties."

A second letter of reference was prepared in the following terms:

"On behalf of our respective constituents, we now beg to extend the former reference to you, as to Mr Cuninghame's entry to the entailed lands of Fultons, and hereby refer to your determination, whether, taking into consideration the whole facts and circumstances of the case, and the practice in cases similar to the present, Mr Cuninghame is bound to pay the composition of an heir or singular successor, on obtaining delivery of the charter already prepared. We are," &c. (Signed) "PEARSON and ROBERTSON, for Mr Cuninghame. JOHN STEWART, for Major Stewart."

Mr Mackenzie's award was as follows:

"I am of opinion that Mr Cuninghame is bound to pay the composition exigible upon the entry of a singular successor, on obtaining delivery of the charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat which has been exhibited to me." (Signed) "RICHD. MACKENZIE." "Note.—As directed by the letter of reference, I have taken into consideration the whole facts and circumstances of the case, and the practice in cases similar to the present, and have been favoured with the opinion of six of my brethren who have had more experience of cases of a similar nature than I have, and they were unanimous in concurring with me in opinion, that the superior was entitled, on delivery of the charter, to a composition as upon the entry of a singular successor. But, at the same time, they all concurred with me in thinking, that, in the circumstances of the case, the superior ought to give delivery of the charter upon payment of a restricted composition, and that it would be reasonable that the composition should be restricted to a half-year's free rent of the lands in the charter."

On receiving the award, Messrs Pearson and Robertson sent it to Mr Stewart with a letter, in which they stated:

"We cannot see the least reason whatever why our client should, as Mr Mackenzie proposes, pay one-half the composition of a singular successor. In order, however, to save farther trouble, we are willing to pay a composition of £25 to obtain the charter already prepared, which is more than the expense we should be put to in completing our title in the other way. If you are not inclined to agree to this offer, then we beg to know whether you are willing to grant a precept of clare constat in favour of Mr Cuninghame in the lands, as heir to his grandfather, the last entered vassal. Mr Cuninghame has finally determined to give no more than the above sum for an entry; so that we must hold all farther negotiation at an end for an entry in the form already prepared, if our present offer is refused."

Mr Stewart wrote declining the offer, and added:

"Before I can give you an answer to your query, whether Major Stewart is willing to give Mr Cuninghame a precept of clare as heir to the last entered vassal, it is necessary that the expenses of the charter already prepared, and of the reference, be first paid; and I beg to know whether you are ready to pay them, on receiving the charter cancelled."

Messrs Pearson and Robertson, after stating their determination not to give more than the £25 offered for an entry, concluded their letter as follows:

"With regard to what you say as to payment of the expenses of the charter already prepared, we beg to state, that as our offer has been refused, and we are obliged to be at the expense of obtaining an entry in another form, we shall certainly not agree to pay any part of the expense of this charter, which is of no use to our client, and is only proposed to be delivered to us cancelled."

Mr Stewart brought the present action, concluding for payment of £28. 11. 2. as the amount of his account for preparing the deeds, and of the expenses of the references to Mr Mackenzie.

The defender pleaded—1. The pursuer cannot be held to have been employed by the defender or his agents, but in preparing the entry was acting for his own client, the superior. 2. The pursuer is not entitled to maintain the present action against the defender, who was not his employer. 3. Even supposing the pursuer was directly employed by the defender to prepare the charter libelled on, he is not entitled to demand the expense of that deed from the defender, while he only offers to deliver it cancelled, and of no use. The defender has always been ready to pay the expense of the charter, on receiving delivery of it in a complete and valid state. 4. The defender never agreed, or gave the superior reason to suppose, that he was to consent to pay the composition of a singular successor. On the contrary, from the first he distinctly intimated to the superior's agent that he considered himself only bound to pay the composition of an heir, and that he was to be entered as such. This view of the matter was acquiesced in by the superior and his agent. 5. If the superior intended to demand the composition of a singular successor from the defender, it was his duty to have distinctly intimated this to the defender from the first; and he was in mala fide in going on with the entry, and allowing the defender to suppose he was to be entered as an heir, till the charter was ready for delivery. 6. The award of Mr Mackenzie does not by any means bind the defender to enter as a singular successor, and to pay a composition as such. All that is settled by Mr Mackenzie's award is, that the defender is not entitled to insist on an entry in the form that was originally proposed, unless he consents to pay a composition as a singular successor. The defender has acquiesced in this.

The Lord Ordinary, before answer, remitted to Mr James Moncreiff Melville, W.S., to report,

"Whether when a vassal, being required by a superior to take out an entry, applies to the person pointed out as the superior's agent for an entry with the superior, and transmits his titles for that purpose, the superior's agent is held to have a direct claim for his professional fees in preparing a charter or precept against the vassal; or whether, in practice, the employment of the superior's agent is held to be on behalf of the superior alone, and without any claim against the vassal?"

Mr Melville reported:

"That I understand the agent for the superior, in the case of the vassal being required to take out a charter, and sending his titles for one, has a direct claim against the vassal for his professional fees in preparing the charter; and I have no doubt that in practice the employment of the superior's agent is held not to be in behalf of the superior."

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the report of Mr Melville, repels the defences, and decrees in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds expenses due; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

The defender reclaimed.

VOL. XIV.—No. VII.

When the cause was advised, the Court were satisfied, without calling on the defender, that the pursuer was entitled to payment of his account for preparing the deeds, but desired to hear both parties as to the expenses of the reference, and the pursuer's title to insist for them.

The defender then argued, that the only parties to the reference were the superior and vassal, and that the superior's agent could have no title to insist for them in his own name.

The pursuer answered, that the preparation of the titles, and the references following upon it, were parts of the same transaction, and that the expenses of the former having been found due, those of the latter followed of course.

The Court concurred in the view taken by the pursuer, and adhered.

No. 55.—ALEXANDER FARQUHAR CRAWFORD, Raiser, v. SIR SAMUEL STIRLING and OTHERS (Stirling's Trustees), and MESSRS PEARSON and ROBERTSON, Claimants.

Diligence—Mandate, Implied—Competition—The agents of a proprietor who had become insolvent continued, after arrestment of the rents by certain creditors, to make disbursements on the property, including payments of feu-duty, poors' rates and insurance, and took the receipts as for behoof of the proprietor. In a competition between the agents, claiming the amount of these disbursements, and the arresters—the arresters were preferred.

Captain George Stirling being indebted in a sum of £500, for which he had granted bond to Mr Warrand, Mr Forrester, W.S. (Mr Warrand's curator bonis), raised letters of inhibition and arrestment, and in May 1836 arrested the rents of a house in Windsor Street, of which Captain Stirling was the proprietor. The tenant, Alexander Farquhar Crawford, thereupon brought a process of multiplepoinding, and consigned as the fund in medio the sum of £88. 10s., being the amount of rents due at Martinmas 1836. Claims were lodged in this process by Sir Samuel Stirling and others (trustees under the marriage-contract between Captain Stirling and Mrs Stirling), and also by Messrs William Crawford and Alexander Pearson, two other creditors of Captain Stirling. During the dependence of the process, the trustees under the marriage-contract paid Mr Warrand's debt, on receiving an assignation to it, and to the diligence which had been used to recover it. Thereafter, in March 1839, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor ranking and preferring

“the claimants, the trustees under the marriage-contract between Captain George Stirling and spouse, as onerous assignees of John Forrester, the original claimant, in respect of the bond of 1834, now in the said marriage trustees, and of the several arrestments used in the hands of the raiser by the said John Forrester prior to the assignation by him in their favour, to the whole of the fund in medio.”

Meantime, other rents having fallen due were arrested in January 1838, and on the 25th and 28th January 1839, in the hands of Mrs Crawford, Alexander Far-quhar Crawford's widow, and of the Reverend Thomas Crawford, his executor, who brought a supplementary process of multiplepoinding, and consigned as the fund in medio the rents which had fallen due during the years 1837 and 1838, and also at Whitsunday 1839. Previous to this last date, on the 17th January, decree had been pronounced adjudging Captain Stirling's house in Windsor Street to the trustees under his marriage-contract, and to his other creditors, Messrs William Crawford and Alexander Pearson. In the supplementary multiplepoinding a claim was lodged for Messrs Pearson and Robertson, who claimed to be preferred for the sum of £74 odds, which they had paid during the period embraced by the processes of multiplepoinding, for public burdens, including feu-duty, poors' rates and insurance, payable for the house in Windsor Street, and also for the sum of £11. 8. 7. paid for repairs to Messrs Burke and Son, upholsterers, and which payments, they averred, had been made by them while they had “the charge and management of the said house for the mutual behoof of all concerned,” though the receipts were taken in the proprietor's name. On the other hand, Captain and Mrs Stirling's trustees, averring that these payments, if made by Messrs Pearson and Robertson, had been made by them merely as private agents for Captain Stirling, or perhaps for Messrs William Crawford and Alexander Pearson, claimed, 1st, to be preferred to the sums of £88. 5. 6. and £25. 13. 3., the amount of rent due respectively at Whitsunday and Martinmas 1838; and, 2d, to be preferred pari passu with the other adjudgers, to the half-year's rent due at Whitsunday 1839. In support of this claim

The trustees pleaded—1. The rents in the raiser's hands, of the house, No. 11, Windsor Street, which belongs in property to Captain George Stirling, having been duly attached by the arrestments at the instance of the claimants, and their author Mr Forrester, for payment of the debt contained in the bond founded on by them; and those rents not having been attached at the instance of any other party, the claimants are, in virtue of their said bond and diligence, and the said arrestments, entitled to be preferred to the whole rents in medio falling due at and preceding Martinmas 1838, in payment pro tanto of their debt. 2. The rents falling due subsequently to Martinmas 1838 having been in like manner attached by the arrestments of the claimants, Stirling's trustees, and not attached by any other arrestments, or in any other way, these claimants are entitled to be preferred to them also; at all events, they are entitled to be preferred thereon pari passu with Messrs Crawford and Pearson, the adjudications of both having been led on the same day, and conjointly; and this, whatever the extent of the rights of Messrs Crawford and Pearson, is all that is claimed by Stirling's trustees. 3. Whatever claim or claims may lie to Messrs Pearson and Robertson, or to Messrs Burke and Company, against Captain Stirling, the landlord of the house, for the payments and repairs said to have been made for or on account of Captain Stirling or his property, or against Messrs Crawford and Pearson, if these gentlemen chose to authorise them, no such claim can lie against the bygone rents of the house due to Captain Stirling, and duly attached by the arrestments of Stirling's trustees, and not attached by any other arrest-ments, or otherwise; and multo magis, none such can lie in a question with Stirling's trustees—such payments, if made, having been made without the approbation, or even knowledge of them or their author, Mr Forrester.

Messrs Pearson and Robertson pleaded—1. The payments of public burdens made by the claimants, and the expenses for repairs, having been incurred for the general behoof of all concerned, are proper and preferable debts against the rents of the house falling due during the period. 2. The competing creditors of Captain Stirling having allowed the claimants to make the above payments during the whole of the above period without objection, are not entitled to object to their drawing repayment out of the rents which form the fund in medio.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process,—1mo, Ranks and prefers the claimants, Sir Samuel Stirling and others, as trustees of Captain George Stirling, and of the late Mrs Anne Gray or Stirling, preferably, to the sum of £88. 5. 6., and interest thereof, being the rents due at Whitsunday 1838; and also to the sum of £25. 13. 3., being the rent due at Martinmas 1838, and interest thereof. 2do, Ranks and prefers the said trustees, and Messrs Crawford and Pearson, pari passu, to the sum of £25. 13s. 3d., being the rent due at Whitsunday 1839, and interest thereof: Repels the claim of Crawford and Pearson quoad ultra. 3tio, Repels the claim of Messrs Pearson and Robertson, and finds them liable in the expenses of discussing this claim to Stirling's trustees; and finds these trustees also entitled to expenses in their competition with Messrs Crawford and Pearson, subject to modification; and appoints accounts to be given in; and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report, and decerns.

"Note.—The only disputed point at the debate, was the claim of Messrs Pearson and Robertson. Their claim is founded on their having for a creditor, their client, advanced money to repair the house and to pay its feu-duty, its insurance, and its poor-rates. But the Lord Ordinary does not think that such advances, not secured by any diligence, entitle them to interfere with the arresting creditor. It may be true, that unless these advances had been made there would have been no rent, but still, in making them, the claimants must be held to have looked to the personal credit of their employer, or of the landlord. There would have been no rent if the house had not been finished. But after it is finished, is a creditor of the landlord, who has arrested the rents, liable to be superseded by the mason or carpenter, founding, without any diligence, on the mere fact that they built the tenement?"

Messrs Pearson and Robertson reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—The only question is as to the arrested rents which fell due at Whitsunday and Martinmas 1838, and I cannot see any ground for altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. With regard to these rents, there is no claim entitled to compete with the arrestments, which in themselves are admitted to be unobjectionable. The payments made by the other claimants, were made without any authority from the arresters, and I know of no principle which can entitle them to insist that the claim for these payments must be sustained, to the exclusion of completed arrestments. Had the competition been between the arrester and the superior claiming his feu-duties, the question would have stood in a very different position. But the superior is not in the field at all. Messrs Pearson and Robertson made these payments of their own accord, and the capacity in which they made them, is obvious from the receipts, which bear to be for payments made for behoof of Captain Stirling, and not for behoof of his creditors. I see nothing, therefore, in the circumstances, to take off the effect of the legal diligence completed by the trustees. Any payments made after the property was adjudged, stand on a different footing; but these are not now before us. I confine my opinion entirely to the competition for the rents which fell due before the adjudication; and as to these, I am quite clear that we ought to affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Gillies.—I hold the same opinion, but not without very great doubt. In strict law, Messrs Pearson and Robertson's claim for reimbursement cannot be sustained; but I rather think the equity of the case is with them. Perhaps they made these payments rashly; but having made them for a party in a state of insolvency, and partly to the superior, who, if they had not been made, could have enforced them by carrying off both the rents and the subject, it cannot well be said that the arresters are not locupletiores, to the extent at least of the payments of feu-duty. The payments for poor's rates and for repairs are in a different situation. Still, however, as these payments were made ultroneously, without the concurrence of the arresters, and without any legal compulsion by the superior, though I think there is something like a good claim in equity, I believe we must, on strict principle, adhere to the interlocutor.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have great difficulty—not as to the law, but as to the facts. As to the law, it is clear that when a beneficial payment is made for a proprietor, with or without employment, the party who pays is entitled to come against him; and in the same manner, if a payment is truly made for the benefit of an arrester, though without employment, I have no doubt that the arrester is liable, on the simple ground that the party who paid must be considered as truly his negotiorum gestor. But here there are opposite averments; and the facts are not clear. It is admitted that Pearson and Robertson were agents for the proprietor, and that they took the receipts in the name of the proprietor. Now, it does not follow, that because the rents are arrested, the proprietor is not to pay the burdens affecting the property. On the contrary, he is personally liable, and if he refuse, may be put in jail. In this case, the payment being made nominally for the proprietor, I am afraid it is incumbent on Messrs Pearson and Robertson to prove their averment, that it was "made for the behoof of all concerned," meaning thereby the arresters. I do not see this proved. Had they produced a letter from the superior, saying to all concerned with the property,—“You must pay me my feu-duty, or I will use my rights, and carry off the property from all and sundry;” and had they paid in consequence of that letter, I would have held that to be a payment for the behoof of all concerned, and that not only in the absence of employment, but even in the face of a warning to the contrary. Here, as there is no evidence of the payment having been so made, I hold it impossible that it can compete with the arrestment, though I have a strong feeling of the equity of the claim, and adhere to the interlocutor with great reluctance.

Lord Fullerton.—I am also for adhering, on the ground that the reclaimers have failed to make good their averment, that they made the payments, “while they had the charge and management, for the mutual behoof of all concerned.” Most assuredly, if they had made out this, their claim must have been sustained. If they had been employed by all, their disbursements would have formed a preferable claim against all. They have failed to prove this employment. On the contrary, it appears that they were the agents of the landlord, and took receipts bearing to be for his behoof. In the face of these receipts, I cannot see how they can aver employment by all concerned. It may be observed, however, that had the arresting trustees been founding merely on the marriage-contract, the averment of employment for all concerned might have been more readily presumed; but the trustees, having got an assignation to the £500, are the true creditors in that debt, and entitled to the full benefit of the diligence used upon it. Not being able, then, to hold that the payment was made on the employment of all, I must concur with your Lordships in adhering to the interlocutor.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Before answer as to the claim of preference by Pearson and Robertson for the half-year's feu-duty falling due at Whitsunday 1839, and paid by them on 24th May 1839, over the half-year's rent falling due at Whitsunday 1839, after the adjudications were led,—Remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties on that point, and to do therein as shall be just: Quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note; but find no additional expenses due."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 56.—JOHN MORRISON and WALTER BRECHIN, Suspenders, v. JOHN GREGORY M'KIRDY and JOHN KIRKWOOD, his Factor, Respondents.

Obligation—Contract—Conditional—Lease—Proof—Parole—A party having made an offer for a lease of certain subjects, and given a reference as to his responsibility—Held that this was not a concluded agreement, and that parole evidence was inadmissible to prove that it was.

Walter Brechin took a lease of a stable and coach-house, situated in Hope Street, Glasgow, belonging to Mr M'Kirdy, from his factor John Kirkwood, for one year from Whitsunday 1840 to Whitsunday 1841. In the course of the year, Brechin subset part of the premises to Morrison, and in January 1841 the latter waited upon Kirkwood, and expressed a desire to take the subjects from Whitsunday 1841 to Whitsunday 1842. Kirkwood requested a reference to some one whom he knew, as to his (Morrison's) responsibility, and Morrison named Henry Paul, Esq., manager of the City Bank. No farther communing took place between the parties; and Kirkwood having almost immediately thereafter received another offer which he considered satisfactory, closed with it. On the 29th March, Brechin and Morrison were warned to remove from the premises, but on the removing day in Glasgow, which is the 28th May, the suspenders refused to flit. On the same day the respondents presented a summary petition for removing to the Magistrates of Glasgow, to which process they called as parties, Brechin the tenant, and Morrison as the sub-tenant in whole or in part of the premises. Both parties appeared to defend against this process, and a record was made up on the petition, answers and replies, with various successive additions to these papers. The fact on which Morrison mainly rested his case, was the alleged entry of his name in the factor's rental-book as tenant; and a diligence was granted to recover the notandum-book, as also all letters or other writings relative to the question at issue. On the 28th August 1841, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"Having again considered this process, with the revised answers and revised replies, and documents produced, and that the record has been closed—Finds the averments of the defenders, although proved, would not amount to, or constitute a lease, or title of possession of the premises in question for the current year: Repels the defences as irrelevant and inconsistent, and to all appearance urged mala fide: Grants warrant of ejection against both defenders; ordains and decerns in the terms concluded for in the original petition, reserving to pronounce quoad ultra, with regard to damages and expenses."

With the view of staying the execution of this judgment, a note of suspension was presented. On the 28th September last, the Lord Ordinary refused the note, and found expenses due.

The suspenders reclaimed, and pleaded—That there was a bargain between Morrison and Kirkwood, subject to a reference to Mr Paul, and which, if unfavourable in its result, Kirkwood was bound to communicate to Morrison. Various statements were made upon the record, showing the understanding of parties. The premises were never ticketed to let, and various repairs were undertaken to be made subsequent to Whitsunday 1841; and supposing these statements proved, as at present must be assumed, are they relevant to constitute an agreement for a lease of the subjects for another year?

Replied—The fair construction of the communing is, that if the reference was not satisfactory, there was no bargain. A second meeting was necessary, and there was therefore no concluded bargain. Proof by documents was allowed in the Inferior-court, and the only question now is, can that be supplemented by parole evidence.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a conditional bargain.—Is it competent, therefore, to prove it by parole? The general rule is, that this is incompetent.

Lord Meadowbank concurred in thinking the interlocutor right.

Lord Medwyn.—I don't think there was a bargain. Certainly the utmost it can be called, is a conditional one. What were the respective duties of the parties after the communing. The factor did not apply to Mr Paul, but the offerer did not return and renew his offer. Then there was the warning to remove, which ought to have called him forth to ascertain the result of his reference, and if practicable, to have then concluded an agreement.

Lord Moncreiff.—It appears to me that there is no case for the suspenders. Brechin had the lease of the whole premises, and subset a part of them to Morrison. While in possession of this, he came to Kirkwood and made an offer for the whole. He also gave a reference; and we are told, that unless the reference proved unsatisfactory, the bargain was concluded. But if a servant comes and offers himself to a party, and gives a reference, is he to consider himself hired unless he hears that the reference has not been satisfactory? Nothing farther is alleged to have followed upon this communing, but the warning to remove, and the petition for ejection. Morrison founds on previous possession; but this is nothing to the purpose. He possessed only a part, and it is a new agreement which he wishes to prove by parole. The interlocutor, in my opinion, is perfectly right.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Looking to the Inferior-court record, I rather think there was a bargain, although only a conditional one. A diligence was allowed to recover documentary proof, on the averment that the suspender was entered as tenant in the factor's book. When this book is recovered, it proves insufficient to sustain the averment, and at that stage the suspender asks to be allowed a proof by parole. In my opinion, it is quite incompetent to prove any such bargain by parole.

The Court adhered, with expenses.

No. 57.—FYFE v. WOODMAN.

Process—Suspension and Interdict—Caution—Consignation—Expenses—A party having executed a pointing of furniture, the property of the daughter of his debtor, she presented a suspension and interdict, whereupon the pointing creditor abandoned his diligence—Held that, with the view of trying the question of expenses, the complainant was entitled to have the bill passed without caution or consignation.

Woodman pointed, for a debt due by Fyfe, certain furniture which Fyfe several years previously had made over to his daughters. One of them presented a suspension and interdict against the completing of the diligence, and a note was lodged by the poiding creditor abandoning the poiding, but containing no stipulation that he should be exempted from any claim for expenses. With the view of trying the question of expenses, the Lord Ordinary passed the bill on caution or consignment, and the suspender presented a reclaiming note, praying to have the bill passed simpliciter: Macauley v. Brown, 16th February 1833.

Lord Moncreiff.—If the poiding was abandoned, the case resolves into a common question of expenses, where neither party is entitled to caution. The poiding creditor was bound to know the condition of his debtor.

The Court remitted to pass the bill, without caution or consignment.

Act. Robertson.—Alt. Anderson.—[J.W.]

15th December 1841.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 58.—THOMAS MENZIES, Petitioner, v. JOHN MURDOCH (Livingstone's Trustee), Respondent.

Competition—Statute 1661—Inhibition—Agent and Client—Writer's Hypothec—Held, 1. That inhibition is not a sufficient diligence to establish a preference under the Act 1661: 2. That a writer's hypothec is not struck at by an inhibition, though used previous to it.

Margaret Hynd, wife of James Livingstone, senior, died in 1800, survived by her husband and two children of the marriage—a son David, and a daughter Margaret. In 1803, these children succeeded, under the settlement of their grandfather, David Hynd, to two legacies of £50 each. James Livingstone, senior, married again in 1804, and died in 1822, survived by his daughter, Margaret, of the first marriage, and several children by the second—the eldest being James Livingstone, junior. By his trust-settlement he left only a legacy of £20 to his daughter, Margaret—the residue of his property being conveyed to his second wife and her children. The trustees under the settlement having declined to act, and James Livingstone, junior, having in consequence intromitted generally with his father's succession, Margaret and her husband, Thomas Menzies, in 1824, raised a summons of count and reckoning in the Court of Session, concluding for £400, more or less, as the share of the goods in communion belonging to her in right of her mother, and also for the payment of the two legacies of £50 each, left to her and her brother, since deceased, by her grandfather, and of which she alleged payment to have been made to her father by her grandfather's executors. On the dependence of this action inhibition was used in January 1825. A proof having been led as to the payment of the legacies, a judgment was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in 1831, and affirmed by the Court in 1832, finding that in hoc statu there was no sufficient evidence of their payment to James Livingstone, senior, and assoilzieing the defender from the conclusions with regard to them, but reserving right to the pursuer to bring any action founded on an alleged undue or fraudulent erasure of an article in Livingstone senior's books, relating to the payment of these legacies.

While the other conclusion of the summons, as to the share of the goods in communion, was under discussion, the pursuer, Thomas Menzies, in his own name (his wife, Margaret Livingstone, being now dead), and as administrator-in-law for his children, brought a new action against the defender for payment of the legacies—founding on the reservation with regard to the alleged erasure. This action was raised, and inhibition on the dependence used in 1833.

In February 1837, Mr Thomson Paul, W.S., who had been the defender's agent in these actions, brought an action against him (using inhibition on the dependence) for the payment of his accounts, and obtained decree in absence for £285. 19s. In June following, the defender's estate was sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act; and on the 11th July, the same day when a meeting was held to nominate an interim factor, an interlocutor was pronounced in the original action, decerning for the pursuer to the amount of £296. Against this interlocutor a reclaiming note was presented by the trustee in the defender's sequestration, and the amount decerned for was reduced to £86 odds, with interest from Whitsunday 1809.

Claims having been lodged in the sequestration by Thomas Menzies, Thomson Paul, and Livingstone senior's legatees, a competition arose between them,—Menzies claiming to be preferred as a creditor of the bankrupt's father, and in virtue of an inhibition used within three years of the father's death; and Mr Paul claiming to be preferred in virtue of a hypothec over the title-deeds of certain heritable subjects which had belonged to the bankrupt, and which he had delivered to the trustee under reservation of his hypothec, which he alleged had been acquired by the delivery of the titles to him for that very purpose in 1834. Mr Murdoch, the trustee, in disposing of this competition, pronounced an award, in which he rejected the claim of preference for Mr Menzies, and sustained the claim of Mr Thomson Paul "for his law and business-accounts against the bankrupt, in virtue of his right of hypothec over the title-deeds of the bankrupt's heritable subjects, as preferable to the claim of the said Thomas Menzies, and entitled, so far as such accounts may be sustained, to be ranked primo loco."

Thomas Menzies presented a petition against this award, in which he alleged that Mr Paul had no proper right of hypothec; and if he had, still it could not compete with his inhibition, which had been used before it existed. Answers having been lodged, the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to prepare a record.

Menzies pleaded—

1. The petitioner being a creditor of the bankrupt's father, and having used diligence to secure his debt within three years from the death of the bankrupt's father, is entitled, in virtue of his inhibition, to a preference over the creditors of the bankrupt. Under the Act 1661, cap. 24, inhibition is complete diligence.
2. The petitioner is entitled, in competition, to a preference over those creditors whose debts were contracted posterior to the inhibition used by him and his wife against the bankrupt in January 1825.
3. The petitioner is entitled to be ranked pari passu with any creditors of the bankrupt whose debts were contracted prior to the inhibition used by him against the bankrupt in November 1833, and, secundo loco, in preference to those creditors of the bankrupt whose debts were contracted subsequent to that inhibition.
4. The respondent, Mr Paul, whose claim has been sustained by the trustee, has no right of preference over the petitioner, in virtue of his alleged right of hypothec or otherwise.
5. The respondent, Mr Paul, never at any time held a legal right of hypothec over the title-deeds in question. 6. Supposing that the respondent, Mr Paul, had held a lien over the disposition and settlement executed by the bankrupt's father, his lien over it would have been extinguished when he parted with it. 7. A right of lien over title-deeds is one of retention only, and it does not entitle the holder of the deeds to a preference over other creditors, except in so far as those creditors may have occasion to use the deeds. In the present case, there was no occasion for the use of the deeds alleged to have been in the possession of the respondent, Mr Paul, and his claim of preference, in virtue of his alleged right of lien, ought therefore to be repelled.

The trustee pleaded—

1. The petitioner, Menzies, is not entitled to claim a preference over the price of the heritable subjects belonging to James Livingstone, as being a creditor of his father, or having used diligence in terms of the Statute 1661, c. 24, in respect that he has not, in terms of that Statute, used diligence against the real estate belonging to the defunct within the space of three years after his death,—the inhibition used by him not having been followed up by decree of adjudication, and not being in itself completed diligence against the real estate, which the Statute requires. 2. The petitioner is not entitled to plead that he was not in a condition to obtain completed diligence, on the ground that his action of constitution was opposed, because he might have obtained decree of constitution and adjudication, reserving all objections contra executionem. 3. The inhibition used by the petitioner gives him no preference over those creditors of the bankrupt's father whose debts were contracted prior to its date; and, consequently, the widow and children of Livingstone, senior, who are onerous creditors on his estate, are entitled to be ranked pari passu along with other personal creditors on the estate of his son, who intromitted with the subjects belonging to his father. 4. Assuming that the petitioner is not entitled to a preference over the heritable subjects belonging to the bankrupt, on the ground of being a creditor of the ancestor who had used completed diligence against his estate within the statutory period, his inhibition could give him no preference in competition with the right of hypothec over the title-deeds belonging to the agent of the bankrupt,—that hypothec, if validly constituted, overruling and being preferable to all heritable securities granted by the bankrupt, whether prior or subsequent to the constitution of the right of hypothec. 5. The circumstances stated upon the record prove, that in this case there was a valid and complete right of hypothec over the titles constituted, in the usual course of business, in favour of the law-agent of the bankrupt, several years before the date of the sequestration. 6. In that situation of matters, the agent could not be compelled to part with the title-deeds of the bankrupt, without payment of his business-accounts, or an obligation, with proper security, to pay these accounts when the amount should be ascertained; and the express agreement entered into with the trustee for the creditors, which has never been attempted to be reduced or set aside, but, on the contrary, homologated and acted on by the creditors, effectually preserved to the agent the whole benefit of his right of hypothec, and of consequent preference. 7. The creditors, through their trustee, having become bound to admit the agent's rights of preference, as the condition of obtaining possession of the title-deeds, with a view to a sale of the heritable subjects belonging to the bankrupt, and that agreement having been acted upon, by the agent's having given up the title-deeds, and a sale having taken place in virtue of the titles so put into the hands of the trustee, it is irrelevant to inquire whether a sale could have been effected without these titles, or whether the agent could have made his preference effectual by retaining the titles, and resting upon his right of hypothec. 8. But, in the present case, as no effectual title could have been given to a purchaser, without obtaining possession of the titles in the hands of the agent, the whole creditors derived benefit from the transaction with the agent, inasmuch as the fund in medio, which forms the subject of competition, was thereby realised for the common behoof, and are therefore bound in equity, as well as ex contractu, to implement the obligation undertaken on their behalf by the trustee. 9. In the whole circumstances, the judgment pronounced by the trustee, which was pronounced in terms of the opinions of eminent counsel, and after affording to the petitioner the amplest opportunity of stating any facts or grounds which might lead to a different conclusion, is well founded, and ought to be supported.

The Lord Ordinary ordered minutes of debate, with the view of reporting to the Court.

At advising,

Lord President.—I cannot see any good ground for altering the judgment of the trustee. As to the Act 1661, the petitioner has failed to show that he has done diligence under that Act. The first requisite is, that the diligence be done within three years of the ancestor's death; but it is also requisite that the diligence be effectual and complete. Inhibition is not such a diligence, though it has very important effects. It may be defeated in various ways, and it does not truly affect the estate. I see no good ground, therefore, for the preference claimed over the other creditors of the ancestor. At the utmost, the petitioner is only entitled to rank with them pari passu. Then, as to the deposition of the titles, I don't think the exceptions taken to Mr Paul's right of hypothec can be sustained. Were the question as to a writer's hypothec still open, there are various points connected with it which might require a great deal of consideration; but after the series of decisions which has been pronounced, it would be dangerous, at this time of day, to make the validity of the hypothec depend on the determination of allegations as to the mode in which the custody of the titles was originally acquired. The petitioner seems to maintain, that the hypothec cannot be sustained unless the titles were lodged with the agent in the very process for the expenses of which the hypothec is claimed. I cannot think so. If a party, when not actually bankrupt, goes to his agent confidentially, and raises a fund of credit by depositing his title-deeds, I cannot see how the agent, who incurs expenses in his behalf, relying upon the security of these titles, is to be looked upon as in an unfavourable situation. In the present case, I think the deposition is clearly made out, and that it is therefore just one of the cases where the principle is settled, and we cannot now venture to interfere.

Lord Gillies.—I agree, though I differed with the majority as to some of the cases decided. I believe none of them have been appealed; but the question which they raised is certainly of the greatest moment, and I have still great doubts of its having been rightly settled.

Lord Mackenzie.—If I really thought that sufficient diligence had been done within three years of the ancestor's death, I should not be able to hold that any thing done by the heir could cut the creditor out of the preference which he had thus established. I admit, however, that inhibition is not sufficient diligence in the sense of the Statute. Then, as to the effect of inhibition in a competition between the inhibitor and a writer, with the title-deeds obtained after inhibition, and for debts not relating to land, but for past and future writer accounts, though I agree with your Lordships that we cannot overturn the previous decisions, none of which, as far as I know, have yet been reversed, I must confess that I concur most reluctantly, and solely and simply because I think it necessary stare decisis—I do not say deciso; for I think a single decision should not have prevented us from reconsidering this question. What the principle of the decisions is, I don't profess to understand. Certainly, I could not agree to extend it farther. Now, the question here raised is, whether this right of hypothec is to be preferred to inhibition, and not merely to heritable bonds? and I certainly hesitate to decide in the affirmative, as I think it would extend the right farther than the decisions have yet carried it. One ground for holding that the hypothec prevails over the heritable bond, may be, that the heritable creditor, by allowing the titles to remain with the debtor, is in some degree answerable for the consequences. He should have insisted to have them placed either in his own hands or those of a joint custodian, and so put it out of the debtor's power to hypothecate them with a writer. But this observation does not apply to the case of inhibition. An inhibitor can do no more than inhibit. He cannot prevent the deposition. But then it may be said, that a prohibition to contract heritable debt does not imply a prohibition interpellating the writer from receiving the titles. I rather think the inhibition does imply this; for it expressly prohibits the proprietor, as against all the world, from doing any thing that may lead to the eviction or diminution of the estate. But if the delivery of the titles is to have this effect, it is just a breach of the inhibition. But it is said the titles are only moveable. I don't see how this can be said, seeing that the effect of pledging them, if it be to a writer, is to give him a title to affect the land. Such a pledge given voluntarily after inhibition, is certainly something very like a breach of it. But it is said that the titles give to the agent with whom they are pledged, a right preferable to that even of singular successors; because, being moveable, they must be transferred by delivery; and not being delivered, their remaining in the original proprietor's hands is just the case of a conveyance of moveables retenta possessione. I cannot enter into this view; for I look upon the titles as just a piece of the estate. Then it is said that the beneficiaries under the ancestor's settlement are creditors, and must come in with the petitioner pari passu. I have some doubt as to that. The right given to them was merely gratuitous; and I doubt much if these legatees are entitled, in virtue of the right so conferred, to come in pari passu with onerous creditors. Legacies are always understood to be given under an implied condition that the debts are in the first instance paid.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree in opinion with the majority. The only point before us is the soundness of the judgment pronounced by the trustee in the competition. I have given the point all the attention in my power, and I cannot see any sufficient ground to alter the trustee's judgment. The first competition is between the petitioner and Mr Thomson Paul,—the latter holding a lien over the title-deeds, and the former being in right of a debt due by the father of the bankrupt. The petitioner's right was secured by inhibition in 1825, and Mr Paul's debt was not constituted by decree till 1833. The question which thus arises relates to the general effect of an inhibition in competition with an agent's lien—the one party holding that it is preferable, and the other that it is not. If the question were open, I think it would be difficult to hold the lien as entitled to prevail over the inhibition. It would rather seem that the inhibition should preclude the party inhibited from delivery of his titles, so as to subject them to lien. But the present point is not open, for it has been repeatedly ruled in decided cases; for I cannot see any difference, in point of principle, between those cases and the present. Inhibition does not extend to moveables, and consequently not to objects which are capable of being given in pledge. In order, then, to let in the plea of Mr Menzies, it would be necessary to make out, that titles which have been pledged may be reclaimed, on the ground that they are not heritable but moveable. Now, a great deal might be said in defence of this position, but it has been overruled again and again, in the cases referred to; for in them it was expressly argued, that the titles formed part of the heritable estate, and could not be separated from it, so that the party who had completed a right to the estate, had of course completed a right to the titles, and was entitled to reclaim them wherever they were, whether pledged or not. That argument was overruled, on the ground that they were to be regarded as moveable in a certain sense, and were capable of being pledged to the limited extent of forming a valid security to an agent for his accounts. If, therefore, it has been held that, in a competition with creditors who have done complete diligence, a writer's lien is preferable, the principle applies still more strongly when the competition is limited to the more imperfect diligence of inhibition. The second point raised relates to the effect of inhibition, considered as a diligence used within three years, under the Act 1661. Now I think it is impossible to doubt, that if inhibition were to take effect like adjudication, and were used within the statutory period, an heir would not be entitled to compete with it. The object of the Statute was to separate the property of the ancestor from that of the heir, and keep them separate for three years, during which period, if complete diligence be used, the ancestor's creditors must take in preference to those of the heir. The true meaning then is, that during that period there cannot be any competition between the creditor of the ancestor and the heir—the former being always preferable. But then the other question arises, what is to be considered complete diligence in the sense of the Statute? Is inhibition entitled to be so considered? I cannot think so; and I am supported in this opinion by great authority, viz., by Lord Stair, who expressly says, that by diligence, in the sense of the Statute, must be meant "complete diligence by apprising or adjudication whereupon infestment or charge hath followed." The words of the Statute are, "providing the defunct's creditors do diligence against the apparent heir, and the real estate belonging to the defunct." Now, it is impossible to hold that inhibition is a diligence against the real estate of the defunct. It is merely a personal prohibition against the party inhibited, and is in no sense a diligence against a defunct's estate. In one sense it may be said to be real, as it prevents the subsequent alienation of a real estate; but in another sense, it is merely personal, as it falls by death. Inhibition, therefore, is not a real diligence, according either to the letter or the spirit of the Statute, or to the opinion of Lord Stair. As to the lien itself, I see no good ground for objecting to it; for I cannot see how the lien is to be confined to any particular account of business. It must be held to be a general lien. It is unnecessary to enter into another objection which has been taken, viz., that the trustee might have sold the property without getting possession of the titles. It comes too late; and though the trustee has reserved the question as to the legality of the lien, the petitioner is evidently endeavouring to give that reservation a meaning which it cannot bear. I am therefore inclined to think the trustee is right on both points. As to the question with regard to the character of the beneficiaries under the ancestor's settlement, I think they are not creditors, but gratuitous grantees. Still, quoad the parties competing with them here, they are to be regarded as creditors. No separation of the estates of the ancestor and heir having taken place under the Act 1661, the whole has been massed together, and all the parties now claiming must claim as creditors of the heir. But I cannot see how it can be denied that those claiming under the ancestor's settlement are creditors of the heir. The origin of the debt was no doubt gratuitous on the part of the ancestor; and if the two estates had been separated, and a competition had arisen between these gratuitous grantees and the ancestor's proper creditors, the objection that they were not creditors must have been sustained. The nature of the present competition is very different; and the circumstance of the right being gratuitous or onerous does not come into play. The property came into the hands of the son under the condition that he was to pay the legacies, and that condition, from the moment he intromitted with the property, constituted an obligation against him, and made him the debtor of the legatees. Suppose a person has received money or effects to pay to another party, what is it to him, whether the party to whom he has to pay, is receiving a present or the discharge of an onerous obligation? Quoad them he is a debtor, because the money which has been lodged with him is truly theirs. Here the heir, by intromitting with the father's estate, has become bound by the condition, of paying the legacies to the persons named in the settlement. These parties must therefore be treated as creditors; and it is quite obvious that the inhibition cannot affect their right, which was not used for some years after their right was competently established.

The Court dismissed the petition and complaint.

No. 59.—SIR JAMES BOSWELL, Nominal Raiser and Defender, v. MONTGOMERIE and OTHERS, Claimants and Pursuers.

Expenses.—Process.—A party who ultimately obtained a verdict in his favour, found liable in the expenses of a litigation, in which he endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to show that the cause was unfit for trial by jury.

This case had been tried by a jury, and a verdict returned for the defender, who now moved the Court for expenses generally. The motion was opposed by the pursuer, who maintained, that instead of being liable in the whole expenses to the defender, there were certain branches of the litigation for which the defender was liable in expenses to him. These branches were, 1st, the expenses incurred in trying the question whether the cause was to be tried by a jury or by the Court, on evidence taken by commission. At first the Lord Ordinary had ordered the cause to the jury roll, but the defender reclaimed, and the Court ordered the cause to be retransmitted. The pursuer then appealed to the House of Lords, who reversed the judgment, and ordered the cause to be tried by a jury. The expenses of this litigation, the pursuer maintained, were clearly due to him. 2d, The pursuer alleged that the defender had caused a great deal of unnecessary expense, by causing a multitude of witnesses and documents to be produced in order to prove debts, of the existence of which he ought to have been perfectly satisfied, and which he afterwards at the trial admitted, without going to proof.

Lord President.—I am quite prepared to give my opinion on the first branch of the case, namely, that relating to the expenses incurred in the litigation respecting the mode of trial. The original action was a multipointing, and in that action was raised the question of vitious representation, and consequent liability for the debt. The defender denied both the representation and the debt, and it became necessary for the Lord Ordinary to determine how both points were to be tried,—whether by a jury or an ordinary action, in which the evidence should be taken by commission. His Lordship pronounced an interlocutor, to the terms of which it is necessary to attend. It is as follows: "Having heard parties' procurators on the motion of the defender to retransmit the case to the ordinary roll, on the ground that it involves matters which cannot be satisfactorily investigated by a jury.—In respect that the pursuer does not confine himself to the written evidence in process, but demands a farther proof by witnesses, and that the defender does not maintain that the said written evidence is such as to exclude parole proof, Finds that farther investigation is necessary, and finds that no sufficient cause is assigned by the defender for departing from the general rule for ascertaining disputed questions of fact by the verdict of a jury, and therefore refuses the motion." This interlocutor was reclaimed against, and the Inner-House altered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof on commission. An appeal was taken to the House of Lords, who reversed the judgment, and found that the points raised ought to be tried by a jury. Now I must say, that if I had sat here when the judgment was given, and had concurred in the opinion that the evidence ought to be taken by commission, yet, after the reversal of the House of Lords, I would have found myself bound to hold that a jury trial was the proper mode of deciding the points, and that the party who had opposed that mode could not be entitled to the expenses thereby incurred. The other point, as to the expenses caused by the denial of the constitution of the debt, rests on different grounds.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. I was one of those who concurred in altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I thought that the evidence was of a kind more fit to be taken by a commission than by a jury. In that opinion we were wrong, for the House of Lords reversed our judgment, and returned to that of the Lord Ordinary. Accordingly, the cause went to a jury in the ordinary way; and I think that the party who refused to go, ought to bear the expenses occasioned by the refusal. In giving this opinion, I do not go on the general ground, that whenever a point of form is raised, the expenses ought always to be borne by the losing party. I know that this has been argued, but I cannot assent to it. In questions of jurisdiction, the parties must fight whether they will or no; and the litigation is carried on, not so much for their individual benefit as for the benefit of the Courts whose powers require to be determined. In such cases, I cannot see the justice of subjecting the losing party in expenses. This, however, is not a case of jurisdiction. The cause was going on in the ordinary way, but the defender thought proper to disturb it. He has ultroneously tried a point, and engaged in a litigation which was not necessary, and I think we are doing no more than acting in obedience to the House of Lords, when we find him liable in the expenses.

Lord Gillies.—I concur, though I must say it is not without some degree of reluctance. One thing is clear. The judgment we gave must be held to be wrong, and that of the House of Lords to be right. There is no doubt of that. We must put out of view the judgment which we formerly pronounced, and hold the matter to be in the same situation as if the point had never been raised or disposed of till to-day. At the same time, I recollect our decision perfectly, and may now explain the ground on which it was given. A question of accounting was involved, and we thought a question of that nature could be better decided without a jury than with one. The late Lord President, who had great experience in jury trials, thought it impossible to send the question to a jury. The House of Lords seem to have thought, that whether it involved an accounting or not, it must go to a jury. We must hold they were right in that opinion, and I think it follows as a necessary consequence, that the expenses caused by taking an opposite view, must be borne by the losing party.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. Where a party chooses to raise a point totally apart from the main question, and for that purpose occasions an expensive litigation, he must be understood to do it subject to the penalty of being found liable in expenses if he is wrong. Now it has been found that this litigation was unnecessary, and the expenses incurred by it is therefore just so much dead loss. When the cause was before me in the Outer-House, I thought it ought to go before a jury. I would not have thought so, had it been an ordinary case of accounting, where the only object of going into it was to ascertain the balance which might be due by either party; but the object of the accounting was to determine a matter of fact. On that ground, I thought it a proper case for jury trial. The pursuer, who thought proper to litigate in support of an opposite view, is clearly liable in expenses.

The Court found the defender liable in the expenses of the litigation, as to the mode of trial.

Act. Rutherford, Penney.—Alt. Robertson, T. Mackenzie.—[H.B.]

16th December 1841.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 60.—ARCHIBALD THOMAS FREDERICK FRASER, Pursuer, v. THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THOMAS ALEXANDER BARON LOVAT, Defender.

Proof.—Witness.—A builder, proposed to be examined as a valuator, having been informed by the agent of the party proposing to examine him, of the valuations of previous witnesses, his evidence was held to be inadmissible.

Entail.—Statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51.—Repairs, though made at once, if not more than sufficient for ordinary tear and wear, are not chargeable against the succeeding heir of entail.

Continuation of case, ante, Vol. VIII. p. 45, and Vol. XII. p. 379.

In this action, which related to improvements under the Montgomery Act (10 Geo. III. c. 51), the defender objected to various of the charges as not sanctioned by it. A conjunct probation by commission having been allowed, James Smith, one of the pursuer's witnesses, was objected to on the following grounds:—"That, having been employed by the late Honourable Archibald Fraser of Lovat to execute certain of the works in regard to which it is now proposed to examine him, he (the witness) made some affidavits before a magistrate, which are produced in process, in relation to certain facts connected with the business, and since the former proof in this case, these affidavits have irregularly and improperly been exhibited to the witness along with the documents to which they are attached, and he has been informed by the pursuer's agent of the statements made by witnesses previously examined in this case."

It was answered—"That the affidavits formerly made by the proposed witness, were with the view of being recorded in terms of the Act of Parliament allowing the representatives of heirs of entail to claim from their successors the moneys expended by them in improvements, and which having been made at a time when the present parties were not in the field, it is now competent to adduce the witness in the present proof, more particularly seeing that the proof formerly led by the defender, was led for the purpose of disproving the sums expended for improvements. Further, the examination of the witness is still more competent, from the Court having, while the affidavits were in process, allowed a general proof to the pursuer in support of the claim for improvements. In regard to the objection, that the affidavits and accounts were exhibited to the witness, it is denied that the affidavits were so exhibited, although it is admitted that the witness was precognosced from the accounts to which they bear reference, and it is farther denied that the witness has been told of the evidence of other witnesses. Upon the whole, it is submitted that it is quite competent to examine the witness in support of the accounts in general, and that the objection should be repelled."

Replied—"The first objection is not so much that the witness formerly made affidavits, but that having made affidavits, these were recently shown to him, whereby his evidence must be hampered. The remaining objection, that he had been informed what former witnesses had stated, the objector will endeavour to prove by an examination of the witness in initialibus, as well as the allegation that the affidavits were shown to him recently."

The commissioner, before answer, allowed the defender a proof of his averments, "that the affidavits in question, with the accounts and estimates, were exhibited, and the statements of the previous witnesses mentioned to the proposed witness, accordingly."

James Smith being examined in initialibus, deponed,

"That certain affidavits were shown to him by the pursuer's agent, at least to the best of his recollection, which were emitted by him shortly after he did the work at Lovat: That they related to the new square of offices, and the east front wall, and, as far as he recollects, were appended to copies of the estimate furnished by him; and he adds, if they were shown to him at all, they were so shown at that time: That to the best of his belief, certain accounts were shown to him, with affidavits attached thereto: That he does not recollect the time when this occurred, but it is not many months since: Interrogated, Whether this was when the pursuer's agent was precognoscing the witness? Depones, That it was; but that the pursuer's agent did not put many questions at that time; and upon the deponent stating that he did not recollect much about the matter, he put the said documents into his hands, and showed him the signature. Interrogated for the pursuer, depones, That he has since that time been several times examined by the pursuer's agent: That, to the best of his recollection, he read the oaths, but he is certain that he saw the accounts and estimates: That he does not recollect whether, when he saw the pursuer's agent with the documents, he asked to see them himself, or whether they were offered to him. In reference to the second averment admitted to proof, depones, That he has not been very often examined by the pursuer's agent: not much oftener than by the defender's agent: That he thinks that all his examinations by the pursuer's agent took place since last September, but since September, the defender's agent has not examined him. Interrogated, Whether the pursuer's agent informed him that Mr Thomas Macfarlane, Mr James Hardie, Donald Mackintosh, James Cameron, and David Robertson, or any of them, were examined in reference to this case? Depones, That the pursuer's agent told him that Mr Macfarlane, and Mr Cameron, slater, had been examined, but he is not certain as to the other names. Interrogated, Whether the pursuer's agent told him their estimates were very low? Depones, That he mentioned to him some of the prices which they made of the work, but did not say they were very low: That he did not say he was sure they were wrong: That he does not recollect of his having mentioned anything else; but he recollects that the prices which the pursuer's agent mentioned, as above, were read from a paper." "Interrogated by the commissioner, and requested to state how many interviews he had with the pursuer's agent during which reference was made to the paper above alluded to? Depones, That he thinks it likely there were two interviews at which reference was made to the paper: That he would say that these interviews lasted about an hour each time. Interrogated, How often, during the first of these interviews, reference was made to the paper? Depones, That generally, when interrogating the witness, on both the above interviews, as to the prices of hewing, quarrying, and cartage, he made reference to the paper, and thereafter told the deponent the prices at which the witnesses previously examined had stated them: That he thinks the two occasions above alluded to, were before and after the deponent had been at Beaufort. Interrogated, Whether, after the pursuer's agent stated the prices at which Messrs Macfarlane and Cameron had stated the above branches of work, his attention was called to the prices contained in his own accounts, to which his affidavit was annexed? Depones, That it was; and that he himself considered of the two at the time as in connection: That as far as he remembers, the deponent had his own, his original account in his hand, while the pursuer's agent had the paper aforesaid in his. Interrogated by the commissioner, on the suggestion of the pursuer's agent, and required to state, what the object was in the above comparison? Depones, That the object appeared to him to be, to compare how the prices charged by him in connection with the eastern wall, as to which wall more minute reference was made than to other parts of the work, stood with those mentioned by Macfarlane and Cameron. Depones, That he is not aware of any other object in making the comparison. And being specially interrogated, Whether his object was not to enable him now to make a fair estimate? Depones, That that was not his object, as he did not think his original estimate was an unreasonable one."

The commissioner made avizandum of this initial examination to the Lord Ordinary, who sustained the objection to the witness.

The whole cause having afterwards come before the Court by a reclaiming note,

Lord Gillies.—I have some difficulty. If the examination of the witness were to be confined entirely to the prices, I would think his evidence inadmissible; but it is said that he was also to be examined as to the utility of a wall, as to which there was no tutoring. On the whole, however, I am inclined to think the Lord Ordinary did right in sustaining the objection. It is scarcely possible to determine how far the whole evidence of the witness may not be affected by the tutoring; and I think it sufficient to exclude him, that it affected any part of the evidence given by him, or expected from him. The late Act of Parliament, with regard to evidence, has no application here.

Lord President (Hope).—I am of the same opinion. The witness has been tampered with, and we cannot admit his evidence.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur. The tampering here may not amount to positive corruption, but it was certainly a preparing of the witness, and would give a great advantage to the party doing so. The agent supposed, reasonably enough, that Smith would be a favourable witness, and went to him to put him in a situation to give that favourable evidence in the most advantageous manner. The agent may have thought this allowable, but I think it was not. It amounted to a concoction of testimony between them; for though it was not intended that the evidence should be false, the object unquestionably was, that it might be made better than it otherwise might have been.

Lord Fullerton.—I have great doubt of the correctness of the interlocutor. The objection is, that Smith was informed of the valuation made by other witnesses. Now it is to be observed, that what the witness was to be called to give evidence to was, not matter of fact, but of opinion. The previous witnesses were examined as men of skill, and it was proposed to examine Smith in the same way. Considerable latitude ought to be allowed in cases of this kind, and I cannot see how information of the opinions which others had expressed should disqualify him for giving his own, more especially as these opinions, being estimates of value, were given by witnesses of the opposite party, and would naturally tend, by being low, to put him on his guard against making his too high. The case is much the same as that of a witness who happens to remain in Court, and is removed, but not until he has heard evidence given on some insulated point. As to that point, I should think such a witness disqualified, but I should not think him disqualified absolutely.

The Court sustained the objection.

Among the items of charge by the pursuer was a garden-wall and cascade. To these the following objections were lodged:—"The defender objects to the charges for alleged building and repairing the garden-walls at Beaufort, and works connected therewith, or with the garden at Beaufort, including charges therefor, amounting to £268. 2. 6., contained in the account for 1802-3; and charges for a cascade, &c., amounting to £118. 16. 9., contained in the account for 1804-5, and that on the ground that these were all insufficient and temporary: That the said garden-wall was in a worse condition at the death of the late Lovat than it was when he succeeded to the estate, or before these accounts were incurred: That when the defender succeeded, it was in a ruinous state, having sundry large breaches in it, much of it off the plumb, so as to require to be taken down, and that it neither then was, nor ever had been suitable to the estate, or fit for the accommodation of the heir of entail: That a cascade, as well as other items included in said accounts, was incomplete, perfectly useless, was not of a nature to be charged under the Statute 10 George III. c. 51, had never been sufficiently executed, and was in a state of total ruin when the defender succeeded to the estate."

The pursuer answered—"The first sum mentioned in this article is inaccurately stated. The true sum is £268. 2. 6., of which £36. 6. 3. has already been disallowed, leaving £231. 17. 3. to be affected by the present objection. The second item of £118. 16. 9., which is contained in the account 1804-5, is already disallowed from want of Lovat's signature to the general account for that year. The objections stated are irrelevant, and are denied. The pursuer has only to say in addition, that supposing that the garden-walls were (as the defender avers) in a worse condition at the death of Lovat, when he came into possession of the estate, if the repairs had not been made, the wall would have fallen altogether long before he succeeded to the title. Indeed, it appears from the voucher that the repairs were made to keep it from falling. The late Lovat might have pulled down the old wall and erected new ones in their stead, but this would have been much more expensive. Instead of which he made repairs, which kept the garden sufficiently protected, and without which it would have been no garden at the time of his death."

The Lord Ordinary repelled the objection.

The case being again advised by the Court, the pursuer pleaded, that the objection, besides being unfounded on the merits, was precluded by a final interlocutor of Lord Fullerton, in which his Lordship found (vide ante, Vol. VIII. p. 45), "that the building or repairing of the garden-wall was an improvement falling within the provisions of the Statute;" while the defender maintained, that that interlocutor did nothing more than find that repairs upon a garden-wall might form a proper item of charge under the Statute, without deciding in any way whether the particular charge for repairs here made could be sustained.

Lord Gillies.—I think the interlocutor just goes this length, viz., that a garden-wall is to be held to be included under the term offices, as used in the Statute. If it is in the same situation as offices, it does not surely follow that all the money expended in repairing it must form a good item of charge. As being within the scope and meaning of the Act, the actual expenditure on the garden-wall may be found a good item; but this depends entirely upon the nature of the expenditure, as established by proof. Now I am clear that repairs rendered necessary by ordinary tear and wear are not chargeable under this Statute. Every man—every tenant in the country is bound to bear the expense of tear and wear, and cannot claim deduction on account of it; and I cannot see why the same obligation does not lie upon an heir of entail. If he could show, indeed, that the sum expended was not only for repairing, but also for rebuilding part of the wall which had been thrown down by a flood, the point would be in a different situation; but though something of this kind is alleged, I don't see it forms any part of the charge in the accounts. The whole charge, as I understand it, is only for ordinary tear and wear, and as such I am clear that it cannot be sustained. Lovat was in possession of the estate for twenty years, and a sum of £200 for the repair of a wall of the nature and extent described, does not seem to me at all excessive. I doubt much if such a sum is sufficient to meet ordinary repairs during that period.

Lord President.—I agree entirely in the general principle, that the repairs of ordinary tear and wear do not form a good item of charge under the Statute. My only difficulty is as to the proof of the sum here expended being for ordinary tear and wear. Had it been expended from week to week and month to month during Lovat's possession, I think it would have been very hard indeed, post tantum temporis, to charge it all against the succeeding heir; but it appears that the whole was expended in the course of eighteen months, and regularly registered in 1804 in the Sheriff's register. This fact seems to take this claim out of the general rule, as laid down by Lord Gillies, in which I entirely concur; but the statutory requisites having been complied with, I rather think the charge must be sustained.

Lord Mackenzie.—The expenditure is said to have been made in 1803, but, then, Lovat succeeded in 1792. This is a material fact. He goes on for a number years doing nothing, and then at length he does just what he should have been doing all along. If it were averred that the previous heir had neglected to keep the wall in proper repair, and that he, the heir in possession, being unable to get at him, had been obliged to expend a large slump sum, and after expending it, had still gone on keeping the wall in due repair, I would have been inclined to sustain such a claim; but I am not satisfied that this is the fact. If the only effect of his own just repair was to save him the expense of repairing from time to time, it cannot form a good item of charge under the Statute.

Lord Fullerton.—In the first place, I think it plain that my interlocutor only went to find, that the expenditure on the garden-wall was within the scope of the Statute; and that the parties put this meaning upon it, is evident from the fact that they afterwards went to proof upon this very expenditure. The objection now taken is, that the expenditure was not of the kind contemplated by the Statute, inasmuch as it was only equivalent to expenditure for ordinary tear and wear. I think there is pretty good evidence of this being the fact; and if so, I have no doubt that the claim cannot be sustained. Had the repair been made in consequence of an accident, the case would have been different, but the charges in the account prove that this was not the case. The sum expended is not more than would have been necessary for ordinary repairs, and ought therefore, in my opinion, to be looked upon as merely substituted for it. The fact of the expenditure being made at once, and not successively at short intervals, appears to me to be of no consequence.

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree with the majority, that the repairs given must be held to have been of a temporary nature, for it appears to be admitted that the wall was left by Lovat in no better condition than it was when he succeeded to the estate. He laid out the sum at once, but that was only in lieu of doing it from year to year. His possession was of considerable duration, and in the course of it various repairs of a temporary nature, harling for instance, must have required to be more than once repeated. Could it be maintained that each of these could be charged under this Act? I suspect we must hold that the repairs here charged were of a temporary nature, and as such must be disallowed. At the same time, I must say I have always thought this Statute to be of a very impracticable nature, but we must endeavour to make the best of it.

The Court found that the charges for the garden-wall must be disallowed.

Service—Brieve, Advocation of—Process—Record—Review—Question as to the proper mode of investigating and disposing of objections stated to the service of a tutor-at-law, in an advocacy of a brieve of idiotry; and it being doubted whether the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary in a service be reviewable—Advised to report each step to the Inner-House.

Continuation of case, No. 12, ante, p. 20. The Lord Ordinary reported this case upon two points: 1st, Whether, having been substituted in place of the Macer Court, it was incumbent upon him to conduct the service in the same manner as was observed in that Court, or whether he should proceed as in ordinary processes of advocacy, and make up a record, and leave his interlocutors subject to review? 2d, In what manner he should deal with the objections which had been lodged to the service of the tutor-at-law? They came with great weight, considering the parties by whom they are urged,—the wife, the daughter, and the sister of the party sought to be cognosed. The objections are relevant if proved, but some proof is necessary; and the point for the Court to advise upon, is, in what form the investigation should proceed?

Maitland, for the advocators.—We are here on a question of competency, and we must assume the objections to be relevant and well founded. The point is, in what form are we to get at them? Under the former practice, such objections were disposed of as preliminary: Colquhoun, 22d February 1628; M. 6276. Moncrieff, 23d February 1710; M. 6286. Shepherd, 5th July 1836.

Robertson.—The question now will turn upon the point, whether, if competent, the Court will stop the service on any or all of the objections? We will insist that they be verified instantly.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There are a great variety of objections; and after being considered by the Lord Ordinary, he may either order a condescendence, or proceed in any other way he thinks best.

Lord Moncrieff.—He may order a condescendence as an information.

Lord Medwyn.—The Lord Ordinary is not bound to proceed in brieves according to the Judicature Act. The assessors of the Macer Court, when any difficulty occurred, were in use to order memorials, which were disposed of by making avizandum with them to the Court.

Lord Meadowbank concurred.

Lord Cuninghame.—I will proceed to prepare the case as may appear most proper, and will report every step to the Court, lest there should be a question whether any interlocutor I might pronounce could not be got the better of except by a reduction.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 62.—PLOCK and LOGAN, and MANDATORY, Petitioners, v. JAMES WALLACE, Respondent.

Bankrupt—Sequestration—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 5 and 7—A native of Scotland, who was a partner of a foreign company, received a charge for a company debt, and retired within the Sanctuary. After the lapse of sixty days, a petition for sequestration of his estates was presented by his creditors, but without his own consent—Held that, not having had a dwelling-house or place of business in Scotland within a year before the date of presenting the petition, he was not liable to be sequestrated.

Process—Bankrupt—Sequestration—Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, § 16—Reponing—The Lord Ordinary on the bills having refused a petition for sequestration, a reclaiming note was lodged with the clerk in the Bill-Chamber in place of one of the principal clerks of Session, which was refused to be written upon when moved. Thereupon an application was made to the Lord Ordinary on the bills for leave to submit the interlocutor to review, which, through the foresaid inadvertency, had been allowed to become final—Held competent; and that the provision of the Statute was equally to be applied to interlocutors in a process of sequestration as to any other.

Diligence, Legal—Partnership—Foreign—A bill drawn by a foreign firm upon a firm in London, consisting of the same individuals, was dishonoured. One of the partners having been found in Scotland—Held that a charge given him upon the bill was competent; and a note of suspension, presented without caution or consignment, was refused.

The respondent was a partner of the firm of James

Wallace and Company, wholesale stationers, general merchants and bill brokers, Kingston, Jamaica. He formed a house in London, on which the remittance-bills of Wallace and Company were drawn, and this department was conducted first by Mr Macdonald, a junior partner, in his own name, but afterwards a firm was adopted of Joseph Brooks and Company. Brooks was not a partner, but received £100 a-year for the use of his name. Wallace and Company received in Jamaica, during the last months of 1840, about £50,000 of currency, for which bills were drawn upon Macdonald or Joseph Brooks and Company. On the 21st November 1840, the respondent left Jamaica without making any provision for the bills which he had drawn on London, and arrived in Scotland in the beginning of January 1841. The petitioners are holders of various bills drawn in this manner, and on the 16th February 1841, they gave the respondent a charge on one for £500. The respondent was a native of Scotland, and had, previously to the charge, declared in a judicial examination under a petition against him as in meditatione fugæ, that he had no intention of leaving Scotland for any foreign country. He presented a suspension of the charge, and Pleaded—1. A partner of a company is not liable, in the first instance, for the contents of a bill drawn by the company, supposing the bill to have been duly negotiated. The company must have been first called upon to pay, and have failed to pay, before the partners can be made liable: 2 Bell's Com. p. 619, 5th ed. Bell's Principles, § 356, 357. Thomson on Bills, 2d ed. p. 585 and 749. 2. The complainer, in the circumstances stated, is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country, and cannot be apprehended here on summary diligence for a civil debt, without at all events using arrestments against him ad fundandam jurisdictionem, which the chargers have not done.

In answer it was pleaded—1. A bill in which a company is an obligant, constitutes the debt directly against every partner of the company, and is a warrant for diligence against every such partner and his individual estate, nor is the creditor in any way bound first to discuss the estate of the company: 2d July 1812, Thomson v. Little and Company; 26th May 1836, Anderson v. Currie. More especially is this the case where, as here, the debtor admits that he was a partner of both of the companies, who are the drawers and acceptors, and that both are insolvent,—the estate of the one being, according to his own statement, in the hands of a committee of creditors, and the estate of the other never having been any thing. 2. The complainer was liable to diligence in Scotland for payment of the debt, (1.) in respect that, being a Scotchman ratione originis, and having his family and family establishment still in Scotland, he had been in Scotland more than forty days before the charge was given, and more especially as he declared that he had no intention to return to Jamaica; (2.) in respect that he has found caution to appear in any action which may be raised against him for payment of the debts due to the respondents.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note, in respect that it was presented without caution or consignment, and that the case seemed in other respects to fall within the rule of Thomson, 2d July 1812. On a reclaiming note which was advised the 19th of June last, the Court adhered.

Thereafter, Plock and Logan presented a petition for sequestrating the estates of the respondent, on the ground that the said James Wallace has retired to the Sanctuary, and remained therein for sixty days, within twelve months immediately preceding the date hereof, and is liable to be sequestrated, even if he should not be notour bankrupt, in terms of the 7th section of the Statute, under and on which the present application is made.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"29th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, In respect that it is admitted that the debtor neither carried on business, nor had any dwelling-house or place of business in Scotland within a year previous to presenting this petition, and that he has not been made notour bankrupt, Finds that the mere circumstance of his having retired to the Sanctuary, and remained therein for upwards of sixty days, is not sufficient to make him liable to sequestration without his own consent, and therefore refuses the petition, and decerns; but finds no expenses due.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary thinks that the seventh section of the Statute has merely the effect of putting retirement to the Sanctuary, as there qualified, equivalent to being made notour bankrupt, in reference to that part of the fifth section which specifies what shall be requisite to subject a debtor to sequestration without his own consent, but that it cannot possibly be held to dispense with any of the other requisites there enumerated. Retiring to the Sanctuary is clearly a more equivocal indication of insolvency than being made notour bankrupt; and therefore, if it be held necessary, for the legal sequestration of notour bankrupts, that they must have resided and carried on business in Scotland within twelve months, it is utterly inconceivable that it should have been intended to render debtors, of whose bankruptcy there is no other proof than retirement to the Sanctuary, liable to that process, although they had never carried on business, or had a residence in Scotland in their lives."

The petitioners intended to submit this interlocutor to review in common form, and they accordingly prepared, fee-funded, boxed, and intimated, a reclaiming note against the same, but, from mistake or inadvertency, the note was lodged with the clerk in the Bill-Chamber in place of one of the principal clerks of the Second Division of the Court, and the same was, in consequence, refused to be received or written upon when it came to be moved in course of the rolls, and the reclaiming days were thereby, through mistake or inadvertency, allowed to expire.

The petitioners thereupon made an application to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills, for leave to submit the interlocutor to review, in terms of the Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, § 16. His Lordship granted leave to reclaim, and pronounced the following interlocutor:

"30th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having considered this note, with the answers thereto, and heard parties' procurators, allows the petitioners to submit the interlocutor of 29th July last, pronounced by Lord Jeffrey, as Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills,—and the reclaiming days against which have been allowed to expire from mistake or inadvertency,—to the review of the Second Division of the Court, in terms of 48 Geo. III. cap. 151, § 16.

"Note.—It was not disputed that this case fell properly to be treated as one of inadvertency. And that being the case, the Lord Ordinary sees no reason for holding that the provision of the Statute (which has already been held applicable in the more ordinary Bill-Chamber procedure, Arnott, 25th November 1825, and 4th February 1826,) is not equally to be applied to interlocutors in the process of sequestration under the Bankrupt Act as to any other. The objection, that the Lord Ordinary in such cases being, in vacation, vested with the full powers of the Court, and provision being made for a direct appeal from his judgment, such judgment must necessarily be final, and not subject to review of the Inner-House at all, was overruled, under the former Bankrupt Act, by Robertson's Trustee, 16th June 1827, and Cox, 10th December 1831; and there seems no room for deciding otherwise under the existing Statute. Another objection, that the extraordinary privilege introduced by 48 Geo. III. is superseded and repealed by the peremptory limitation of the reclaiming days in the more recent Judicature Act, is surely untenable. Nor, finally, can the Lord Ordinary discover that any countenance has ever been given to the notion, that the statutory privilege shall be allowed operation only in cases where there is no right of direct appeal from the Lord Ordinary.

"Should the objector, however, be dissatisfied with the view which the Lord Ordinary has thus taken of the case, it will of course be open to him, if so advised, to renew his objections on these heads, when the application to be reponed comes to be considered in the Inner-House.—Brock, 8th July 1826.

"It only remains to be noticed, that, notwithstanding the words of the Statute, the form of the application would seem now to be by reclaiming note, and not by petition.—Bennet, 19th February 1833."

On moving the reclaiming note, the objection to the competency which had been urged before Lord Ivory, was renewed, but not pressed.

On the merits it was pleaded—

That by the fifth section of the Bankrupt Act, the estates of any debtor "subject to the laws of Scotland, who is or has been a merchant," &c., may be sequestrated with the consent of such debtor. Under the former Acts the description was different, and it was held, that to warrant sequestration, the debtor must have been in Scotland, and have carried on business there. The terms used in the Act 1793 are—"if any person in Scotland, being a merchant," &c.; and in the Act 1814,—"if any person, being a merchant or trader in Scotland;" but the words of the present Act are,—"any debtor subject to the laws of Scotland," may be sequestrated with his consent, "or without his consent, provided that he be notour bankrupt, and have carried on business in Scotland in any of the said occupations, and have also, within a year before the date of presenting the petition for sequestration, resided, or had a dwelling-house or place of business in Scotland." By the seventh section it is enacted,—"that if any debtor subject to the laws of Scotland, and falling within any of the said descriptions, and not within any of the said exceptions, shall retire to the Sanctuary, and remain therein for sixty days, either continuously or not, within the space of twelve months, the estate of such debtor, although he be not notour bankrupt, may be sequestrated without his consent." Any debtor, therefore, subject to the laws of Scotland, although he had neither a dwelling-house nor place of business in Scotland, may be sequestrated with his own consent. 2d, Any debtor subject to the laws of Scotland, and retiring within the Sanctuary for sixty days, may be sequestrated without his consent,—the seventh section being a substantive and independent enactment, complete in itself, and not incorporating the fifth section.

On the other hand it was pleaded—

That the seventh section referred back to the previous clauses for a description of the persons who might apply for, or were liable to sequestration. Nor was it admitted that any trader, though subject to the laws of Scotland, could apply for sequestration if he was not carrying on business in Scotland: Bell, II. p. 316. Ewing, 6th February 1802, F. C. Keir, 27th May 1802, F. C.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am satisfied with the interlocutor. I don't enter into the question raised under the first part of the fifth section, as to whether debtors subject to the laws of Scotland can apply for sequestration without having had a place of business in Scotland within a year before the date of presenting the petition. That is not the present case, which depends entirely upon the seventh section, taken in connection with the fifth section. Two things seem to be confounded—the description of the persons who may be sequestrated, and the acts which render them liable to be sequestrated. The retiring to the Sanctuary is one of the acts which render persons of the proper description liable to sequestration; but the carrying on business in Scotland is a part of the general description.

Lord Meadowbank.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord Medwyn.—It would be extraordinary if, while a notour bankrupt could not be sequestrated without having carried on trade in Scotland, a debtor who had merely retired to the Sanctuary could be so.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. I don't think it necessary to go into the question raised on the first part of the fifth section. The seventh section appears to have been inserted for no other purpose than to declare retiring to the Sanctuary equivalent to notour bankruptcy.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for the petitioners, Plock and Logan, with the proceedings, and heard counsel thereon, and on the objection to the competency of the note, Repel that objection to the competency, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of, and refuse the desire of the note: Find the respondent entitled to the expenses of the discussion on the petition before Lord Jeffrey, and to the expenses of opposing the reclaiming note,—of which allow the account to be given in and taxed by the auditor in common form."

Lord Ordinary, Jeffrey.—Act. Rutherford, G. G. Bell; Dundas and Wilson, and William Mason, S.S.C., Agents.—Alt. Deas; Adam Morrison, S.S.C., Agent.—[J.W.]

17th December 1841.

No. 63.—WILLIAM BRAKINRIGG, Pursuer, v. ROBERT DRYBROUGH MENZIES, Defender.

Process.—Arbitration.—Judicial Reference.—Review.—Landlord and Tenant.—In an action of damages at the instance of a tenant against his landlord for breach of agreement, certain issues were adjusted, but instead of impannelling a jury, it was agreed to refer the whole cause to a referee mutually chosen. On the motion to have the authority of the Court interposed to his award, it was objected by the defender, 1st, That he had not allowed a rehearing after issuing his notes, as required, or at least that he had granted it under such conditions as practically amounted to a refusal: 2d, That it would appear from the proof, and the notes issued by him, that he had misunderstood the issues: More particularly, that he had decided upon the supposed liability of the defender, not merely for the subject of the lease being in proper order or repair, but for insufficiency arising from the original malconstruction of the subjects.—Held, That the objections were irrelevant; that the Regulations, 1695, applied equally to an award under a judicial reference as to a decret-arbitral; and that the notes issued by the referee could not be looked into in order to support objections not relevant to set aside the award.

This was an action of damages at the instance of a tenant against his landlord, for failure to deliver in proper condition certain subjects, in terms of a contract of lease between them. The memorandum of agreement provided, that "the mill, machinery and buildings, were to be put in good working order, and set agoing at the expense of the landlord." Regarding the supply of water there was an express provision, that

"a cistern is to be made to supply the engine with water, in the event of any circumstance occurring to prevent the supply as at present from the docks, on the plan pointed out by Professor Russell, or the water to be drawn from the old harbour, or in the option of the landlord, as he may be advised for the best ; but on no account is he to be held responsible in damages for any loss of time or detention that such an alteration may require, or be necessary for the fulfilment of the work, should such an unforeseen circumstance occur, unless said delay is occasioned by the landlord."

No such change occurred, but the supply of water proved inadequate for the mill, either from the malconstruction of the pipes, or from the distance at which the mills were situated from the docks. It was contended for the landlord, that as the lease of the subjects had been taken as they stood, and as nothing was done by him to interfere with the supply, he implemented the contract by giving access to that supply through pipes which were quite sufficient for the purpose.

The following issues were adjusted in the cause :

" It being admitted that, on the 15th day of August 1838, the pursuer took in lease from the defender certain houses, mills and machinery, the property of the defender at Leith, from Whitsunday 1839, for the period and on the conditions stated in the writing, No. 23 of process :

" Whether, in violation of the agreement in the said writing, the defender wrongfully failed to furnish or repair all or any part of the subjects of the said agreement, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer ?

" Whether the pursuer expended the sum of £142. 1. 3., or any part thereof, contained in the account, No. 5 of process, for necessary repairs on the said subjects ; and whether, under the said agreement, the defender is indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer in the said sum of £142. 1. 3., or any part thereof, with interest thereon ?

" Damages claimed under first issue, £2000."

In place of impannelling a jury to try the issues, the parties agreed, by a joint minute, dated 28th July 1841, that " the present cause shall be referred to, and finally decided by, Patrick Robertson, Esq., advocate, as sole referee mutually chosen by them ; it being understood that he shall proceed forthwith to lead the whole evidence, and decide the whole cause, just as if it had gone to trial before the jury."

The authority of the presiding Judge having been interponed accordingly, and the judicial referee having accepted of the reference, evidence was adduced before him on the part of the pursuer and defender. The referee personally visited and inspected the premises in presence of the parties and their agents, both before the proof commenced and after it was closed ; and having heard counsel for the parties, he issued an interlocutor and note explanatory thereof, on the 18th October 1841, finding " that the defender wrongfully failed to deliver over to the pursuer the subjects let, in terms of the agreement, in good working order and tenable condition, and therefore finds damages due, and assesses the pursuer's claim at the sum of £1500 Sterling." The referee further found the defender liable in expenses, and remitted an account thereof to the clerk to the reference to be taxed. On the 4th of November a note was lodged for the defender, craving that the remit to the clerk should be recalled, and that the account of the pursuer's expenses should be remitted to the auditor of the Court of Session, which was given effect to. On the 10th, an application was made by the defender for a rehearing of the whole cause, and on the 12th, the referee appointed the rehearing to proceed on " Monday evening, the 15th instant," or if more convenient for the defender, on the evening thereafter. The defender lodged a note on the 13th, craving the referee to alter the diet to Monday the 22d, and made no appearance on the evening of the 15th. The referee then refused to grant the additional delay craved, and on the 24th he pronounced his final award, finding the defender liable in the sum of £1500 in name of damages, and in the sum of £984. 4. 3. as the modified amount of the whole expenses. A notice of motion to apply the award having been served upon the defender, he lodged a note of objections, which was afterwards amended, and set forth the following reasons :

1. Because, as will appear from the proof and proceedings before the referee, and the notes issued by him, the meaning of the issues has been misunderstood, and the decision of the referee applies not to the questions raised by the issues, or to the matter really involved in the action, but to questions and matters essentially different ; the referee having decided and awarded damages on the supposed breach of an obligation on the part of the defender, which did not form the ground of action, and was not put in issue. More particularly, the referee has decided upon the supposed liability of the defender, not merely for the subject of the lease being in proper order or repair, but for insufficiency arising from the original malconstruction of the subjects, especially as regards the mode by which the water was supplied. 2. Because the award does not contain separate findings applicable to the separate issues which formed the subject of the reference, though requiring distinct and separate consideration and decision, and, in particular, does not contain any finding from which it can with certainty be inferred that the second issue has been the subject of the referee's consideration, or to what extent he has or has not held that issue to be proved, nor consequently to what extent he has found damages to be due in respect of the wrongous failure put in the first issue, and because the issues are not exhausted. 3. Because the defender required to be reheard, as in a cause where the verdict had been against law and evidence, and subject, on that or other grounds, to be set aside ; and it was essential to the justice of the case, that before finally reporting to the Court the view which the referee had formed, the defender should have been allowed the rehearing so required ; and because, although a rehearing was nominally allowed, it was granted under such conditions as virtually and practically amounted to a refusal. More particularly was the defender entitled to have such rehearing, as the terms of the reference required that the case should be decided by the referee " just as if it had gone to trial before the jury." 4. Because, as will appear from the proceedings before the referee, the proof adduced, and his notes, the findings in the award are against evidence, and founded on legal views which are palpably erroneous. In particular, the findings as to damages are contrary to the evidence truly applicable to the issues ; and the legal doctrines to which the referee has given effect, as to the extent of the obligation incumbent on the defender under the agreement of lease—as to the legal effect of the possession of the pursuer under the lease, and payment of rent under it without complaint—as to the extent and nature of the proof required from the defender as to that matter—and his construction of the agreement of parties as to the supply of water to the establishment,—are clearly erroneous. His views as to the absence of blame on the part of the defender, and his award of damages, are irreconcilable. The authority of the Court should not be interponed to the award without hearing the defender in support of the objections, especially seeing that he has never had an opportunity of being heard in support of them. 5. Because, as the referee has delivered his final award, and the reference is exhausted, it must be held to have altogether failed, if on any or all of the grounds above stated the Court should be of opinion that the award should not be enforced ; and the pursuer, in that view, is not entitled to found upon that award, or the reference itself, to any effect or purpose whatever.

In support of the objections it was pleaded—That there was a distinction between a decret-arbitral and a judicial reference. At common law, a reduction of a decreet-arbitral was competent, on the head of iniquity in the Judge, or of enormous lesion to the party: Ersk. IV. 3, 35. This remedy was cut off by Regulations 1695, § 25. But if a judicial reference be different from a submission, the Regulations do not apply. In the latest case, Mackenzie v. Girvan, 19th December 1840, it is admitted that they are not the same to all intents and purposes. In a judicial reference, it is not necessary to bring a reduction of the award as of a decreet-arbitral. It is sufficient to state the objections to it on the motion to the Court to interpose its authority. A judicial reference is a depending process, and no result or effect can flow from the award until the authority of the Court can be interposed. A decreet-arbitral, on the other hand, contains within itself the means of being enforced by registration. If, when an award comes before the Court, a great miscarriage can be shown, is it to be binding on the party or the Court? A judicial reference may be made in different circumstances, and in various terms. Here the minute of reference was very specific. The referee was to become both judge and jury, and was bound to try the cause as if it had been tried by a jury. In jury trial, the parties do not peril their case upon the hazard of a single die. There is the remedy of review in the shape of a motion for a new trial, and a bill of exceptions. The referee ought, therefore, to have granted a rehearing to the parties, as the Court would have done. A judicial reference is part of the proceeding of this Court, which interposes its authority first and last. In Dickson v. Monkland Canal, it was held, that although parties are bound by the reports of persons of skill, yet, if unsatisfactory, the Court is in the practice of remitting the matter back, again and again. The notes which we tender in evidence will show that the arbiter misunderstood the issue. As to the supply of water, the question was, has the pursuer got water such as the pipes could give? whereas the arbiter says, the pipes were inadequate, and the source remote. He gives damage for a bad subject, although that was the subject taken in lease. It is said this only amounts to a misconstruction of the terms of the agreement; but it is a great deal more: it is a mistaking of the issue. The referee puts a different question in issue,—a question which could not have been raised under the summons. This is the gravest of all miscarriages: it is a question of ultra vires. In objecting to the motion, the defender is here under all the privileges of a reduction, and is entitled to redress if he can show that he has sustained great injustice: if he can show, from the notes of the referee himself, that he has misunderstood the agreement and the issues,—that he has answered a question different from that put in the issues, and has awarded damages on a matter not under the summons,—but which may be in itself a good ground of damage if properly laid: East. Vol. III. p. 18. Clyne's Trustees, 2 Shaw and M'Lean, p. 243.

Answered—

The objections embrace two points,—1st, The right to a rehearing; and, 2d, The relevancy of the grounds stated for challenging the award. It is said that a judicial reference is totally distinct from a submission; but by the case of Mackenzie v. Girvan it was settled, that a judicial reference stands, in regard to the grounds upon which it is to be challenged, upon the same footing as a decreet-arbitral. If a party be not heard at all, or in absence of the other party, or if the proof be irregularly taken, these are sufficient grounds of challenge, but they are common both to judicial references and to submissions. In Glenny, 24th February 1825, an award was overthrown because there was no hearing; and the same rule holds as to decreets-arbitral: Langwell v. Sloane, 21st May 1840. Lord Dunmore, 28th January 1835. Speirman, 28th February 1828. The objection here is, not that the referee has not heard, but that he has not sufficiently heard the parties. A rehearing was granted, and the defender declined availing himself of it. There was abundant time for preparation. Two counsel had been employed in arguing the case before; and the notes of the referee were in their hands twenty-three days before that fixed for the rehearing. At all events, the defender ought to have appeared by his counsel, and shown cause for delay. The objections first and fourth, contain no relevant avermert for setting aside the award. Read those objections, and if sufficient, where is the award which may not be set aside? Can any line of distinction be drawn between a great and a small miscarriage? Or is it relevant to aver a misconstruction of the agreement referred, or that the award is against evidence, and proceeds on an error in point of law? This is not the law of Scotland. If it were, a judicial reference, instead of being the end, would in truth be the beginning of strife and litigation: Kirkaldy, 16th June 1809. Morrison, 28th April 1825; W. and S., App. I. p. 143. Low v. Banks, 2d June 1836. Union Canal, 3d December 1836. Alston, 17th December 1839. Colquhoun, 16th June 1825. Mackenzie v. Girvan, 19th December 1840. It is said in the first objection, that it will appear from the notes and proceedings, that the award goes upon what was not in issue; but there is no specific averment that the referee went ultra vires. The issue refers to the agreement, and the construction of it was, therefore, necessarily in issue. Had we gone before a jury, we might have argued on the agreement as to the supply of water. The Judge might have thought our argument wrong, but not on the ground that it was outwith the issue. He might have directed the jury that we took an erroneous view of the import of the agreement; and what more does the referee do than pronounce upon the soundness of such an argument. He may be right or he may be wrong, but it is an error in judgment only; and no distinction can be taken between a great error and a small one; for where is the line to be drawn? In Miller, 4th February 1836, there was an objection, that the arbiter had misunderstood the issue. As to the competency of producing the referee's notes, that is settled by the case of Mackenzie v. Girvan.

At advising,

Lord Meadowbank.—The question raised is very important; and were the objections to this award to be sustained, we would shake the whole law in regard to judicial references. The parties having come to trial, agree by a special minute to refer the matter to Mr Robertson. The terms of the reference are important,—“The parties agree that the present cause shall be referred to, and finally decided by, the said Patrick Robertson, Esq.” After considering the terms of the reference and the law applicable to such references, I can put no other construction upon it than this, that the parties agreed to refer the whole cause, without going through the machinery of jury trial. The reference was entered into in the knowledge of the principles of law applicable to such references. They had before them the case of Mackenzie v. Girvan, by which it was ruled, that if the terms of the award be accurate, and the form regular, and if the referee have determined every thing referred, and nothing but what was referred, then the Regulations of 1695 must be applied. Holding that such was the law then, and is the law now, has any thing been stated to induce us to open up this award? The complaint here is, not that the parties were not heard, but that they were not reheard; and is that sufficient to set aside a decreet-arbitral? I don't say whether a party in a submission is entitled to a rehearing. In the case of Speirman it was found that he was not; but in the present case sufficient opportunity was given;—counsel were not brought to state that it was for their personal convenience that delay was asked. I think the referee did every thing he was called on to do. But taking it in the strictest way, an award could never be set aside on such a ground. Had the referee gone beyond the reference, and had there been a distinct averment to that effect, and had it been made out, we would have been called on to consider the question in a different manner,—we would at least have been bound to entertain it. The issues, together with the whole cause, being referred, the point is, whether we are not bound to look also to the agreement and summons? I can't say that I could have arrived at a different opinion from the referee; but, at best, it was an error of judgment in the interpretation of the agreement. That is not a ground for reducing a decreet-arbitral; and the same rule applies to a judicial reference.

Lord Medwyn.—I entirely agree. A judicial reference partakes so much of the nature of a submission, that nearly the same rules apply to both. The Court will not blindly interpose its authority to a reference, if cause can be shown why it should not. There is a late case where locus penitentiae was held to apply, before the sanction of the Court was interposed to the reference. (Reid v. Pirie Henderson, 26th June 1841.) And on the motion to interpose the authority of the Court to the award, no reduction is necessary for the purpose of opening it up or setting it aside. The Court may remit to the referee to hear parties, or to supply some deficiency. But I know of no distinction between a judicial reference and a submission, to warrant us in refusing to interpose our authority to the award, except upon the grounds stated in the Regulations 1695. As to the rehearing, it is no doubt true, that if the referee refuses to hear the parties, or the one and not the other, this forms a good ground for withholding our authority from the award, but we cannot say to the referee how often he shall hear the parties. The claim to a rehearing, as a matter of right, was repelled in the case Speirman. It is said, that by the terms of the reference, the referee was "to decide the whole cause, just as if it had gone to trial before the jury;" but I cannot understand that this was meant to import into the reference the whole machinery of jury trial, reserving to the Court a power of review, as on a bill of exceptions. I don't think the Court would have interposed its sanction to such a reference. It is said that counsel could not attend; but there was no communication from the counsel to that effect; and in the absence of any such, I cannot think that the referee did wrong in refusing delay. In regard to the award being ultra vires, there is no distinct averment to that effect. It is tried to restrict the reference to the issues: but the whole cause was referred. Accordingly, the award does not allude to the issues. Nothing sufficient is stated to warrant us in allowing the party to look at the notes of the arbiter. If we did so in such a case as the present, a judicial reference, as stated by counsel, would be but the beginning of strife.

Lord Moncreiff.—I agree with all your Lordships, and I don't think any legal ground has been laid to induce us to refuse to interpose our authority to this award. I gave a full opinion on this subject in the case of Mackenzie v. Girvan; and although that judgment is under appeal, I have seen no ground to alter that opinion: on the contrary, it has been confirmed by the discussion in the present case. By a submission a contract is entered into between the parties to abide finally by the decision of the arbiter; and since the Regulations, 1695, no decret-arbitral can be challenged, except on the ground of corruption, bribery or falsehood. Being a contract between the parties, it shall not be disturbed except on grounds which go to the root of the contract. In Sharpe, 3 Dow, p. 107, the essence of the case really consisted in a distinct averment of falsehood, that the arbiter had never heard the parties. There may be on the face of a decret-arbitral such plain injustice, that it is not a fulfilment of the contract. But this is the exception—the rule stands firm, that no error of judgment will suffice to set aside an arbiter's decret. Nothing here is surmised that would affect a decret-arbitral; but it is said this is a judicial reference, and the terms of the reference are special. There no doubt is a difference in some points between a reference and a submission; but the defender gets no benefit by them. The reference is a contract, by which the parties make a bargain to take the judgment of the referee instead of that of the Court. Clearly it is a submission under the Regulations,—undertaken solemnly in the face of the Court. No doubt it is under the cognizance of the Court; but the contract is complete: the parties have transferred the jurisdiction; and all that the Court can do is to see the contract fulfilled. There is no power of review either as to law or fact. This were to divest the referee. I see no distinction, therefore, between a submission and a judicial reference. The last is the more solemn contract of the two. But it is said there are specialties in the reference, and that the referee was to come in place of the judge and jury, and, in some way or other, that the privilege of moving for a new trial after judgment, was reserved. But the determination of the whole cause implies that the referee was not only to be both judge and jury, but that he was to be judge to the end of it. Besides, the reference of a case standing for trial, is surely the strongest of all against a party coming to this Court for review. The inducement in such a case is, to avoid the expense and risk of a new trial and bill of exceptions. Indeed it would be bad policy, after a cause is prepared for trial, to go into a reference if the whole course of jury trial was to be preserved. In Anderson, 6th February 1836, the case was set down for trial, when a reference was made to the Sheriff of Forfar; and after judgment was pronounced, it was tried to challenge the award, among other grounds, that he had departed from the terms of the issues. That was a case of construction of the issues; and there is no difference between it and the present. But the defender wants production of the referee's notes; and he says, I will thereby prove that he misconstrued the agreement, and ultimately decided erroneously. What is this but error of judgment? We can take no cognizance of the grounds of his judgment, for he is the sole judge. I think the defender has no legal right to demand the notes of the arbiter: Alston, 17th December 1839. There is no averment of ultra vires, but a demand for a review of the cause on the evidence. With regard to the rehearing, if the arbiter fairly heard the parties after the proof, it was in his discretion to refuse a farther hearing. But he did allow it; and the opportunity, though given, was not embraced. I have no idea that the Court can look into such particulars.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In explicit terms, I entirely concur with all your Lordships. The minute bears "that the cause shall be referred to, and finally decided by, Patrick Robertson, Esq., as sole referee mutually chosen." This I hold to be, in substance, principle and effect, a submission. There are certain advantages in a judicial reference, as the preserving diligence used upon the summons, &c.; but these do not affect the substance of the contract. I must therefore regard an award in the same light as a decret-arbitral. With reference to the grounds stated for refusing to interpose our authority, we have allowed the referee's notes to be produced, to show that a party was not heard; because that is a relevant objection. Here it is not said that the party was not heard, but only that he was not reheard. Statute has taken from this Court the power to rehear after judgment has been pronounced; and a party before a referee cannot be more favoured. The objection, founded on the demand to be reheard, is not relevant in point of law; and I do not enter into the propriety of refusing it. It is said the reference is in special terms; but the referee had in himself all the functions of judge and jury. It is said, that after considering and disposing of the matter as judge and jury, he must sit as judge to review his own actings. This is altogether extravagant. The whole object of the reference is, to sink the distinction between judge and jury, and get a speedy disposal of the cause. I never can agree that the issues alone were referred. The issues often do not exhaust the cause; and the Court often dispose of a cause after getting an answer to the issue. As to the objection founded on what is called a mis-carriage or misunderstanding, it just comes to this, that the interpretation put upon the agreement by the referee is contrary to law and fact, and that injustice is thereby done. But this is not relevant to set aside an award. As to the question, what would be the effect upon the reference if the award were set aside? the tendency of my opinion is, to hold that the reference would not fall if a good award could be got.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords interpose their authority to the judicial award pronounced by Patrick Robertson, Esq., advocate, the judicial referee in this cause, and, in terms thereof, decern against the defender for payment," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 64.—DUGALD M'KELLAR, Pursuer, v. DONALD M'KELLAR and OTHERS, Defenders.

Reparation—Wrongous Apprehension—Public Officer—Justice of Peace Clerk—Statute 43 Geo. III. c. 141.—An action of damages against a Justice of Peace dismissed, on the ground that he had tendered twopence of damages, and the acts complained of were not libelled to have been done "maliciously, and without any probable cause."

Donald M'Kellar, spirit-dealer, Lochgilhead, on 26th February 1841, presented the following petition to the Justices of the Peace for Argyleshire:

"That John Sinclair, late in the employment of the petitioner as his shopkeeper, has embezzled the property of the petitioner to a considerable amount, and has since absconded. That the petitioner followed the said John Sinclair to Glasgow, where he got him, and recovered upwards of £50 of his money from him, and farther, he informed him that he had deposited £16 of the petitioner's money so embezzled and abstracted by him into the hands of Donald Campbell, saddler, Lochgilhead; also a silver watch, purchased by the said John Sinclair with the petitioner's money, and deposited into the hands of Dugald M'Kellar, student, Lochgilhead; and £4, or upwards, deposited by the said John Sinclair into the hands of Catherine M'Niel, servant in the inn, Lochgilhead.

"That though the said Donald Campbell, Dugald M'Kellar, and Catherine M'Niel admit having the said money and property, so feloniously abstracted from the petitioner by the said John Sinclair, and so deposited into their hands, yet they refuse to give up to the petitioner his said property, so unjustly by them retained.

"May it therefore please your honours to grant warrant to constables of Court to search for, apprehend, and bring the said Donald Campbell, Dugald M'Kellar, and Catherine M'Niel, before the Justices, for examination on the facts before stated, to be by your honours punished for the said disgraceful crime of reset; to ordain each and all of them to deliver up to the petitioner all and every money, goods, gear, and effects, so deposited into their hands by the said John Sinclair; and do otherwise in the matter as to your honours shall appear to be proper."

Neil M'Lachlan, J. P., granted warrant in the following terms:

"Having considered the foregoing petition, grant warrant to constables of Court to search for, apprehend, and bring each of the before-designed Donald Campbell, Dugald M'Kellar, and Catherine M'Niel, complained upon, before the Justices for examination, and grant warrant to cite witnesses for both parties to compare to give evidence in the said matter, with certification."

Dugald M'Kellar was accordingly apprehended, and brought to the Court-room in Lochgilhead, where he saw Mr M'Lachlan and Peter M'Pherson, a shopkeeper in that town, who acts as Justice of Peace-clerk, and was told to appear again on the 2d March. He appeared accordingly, but the Justices pronounced the following deliverance:

"In respect the Court understand this case has been taken up by the public prosecutor, the Justices therefore dismiss this action against the said Donald Campbell, Dugald M'Kellar, and Catherine M'Niel, and free and relieve of this warrant."

Dugald M'Kellar thereafter brought an action of damages against the petitioner, Donald M'Kellar, Mr M'Lachlan and Peter M'Pherson, in which, after narrating the petition and the proceedings under it, and averring, that the deliverance,

"to the effect that the case had been taken up by the public prosecutor, was made on the authority or instigation of the defenders, one or other of them, and was utterly false and unfounded, at least no proceeding has been yet adopted by the public prosecutor, or by the defenders, or by any other party

whatever, against the pursuer, in relation to the matters referred to in the foresaid petition, other than the proceedings which have been described: That the whole of these proceedings on the part of the defenders were utterly lawless, and grossly oppressive and malicious, as respected the pursuer, who was thereby grievously injured in his character, prospects, and feelings: That more particularly, the pretended warrant under and in reference to which the pursuer was apprehended and detained as aforesaid, was inept and entirely extrajudicial; no competent or regular complaint or charge had been preferred against the pursuer at the instance of the public prosecutor, or otherwise; no crime or offence warranting his apprehension or detention as a prisoner for a single moment was laid to his charge; no communication was in any way made to him of any crime or offence having been charged against him; no prosecutor, either public or private, appeared to insist in any charge against him; he was not subjected to any examination, and no declaration was taken down from him; in short, the whole proceedings were from first to last extrajudicial, lawless, and incompetent, got up and resorted to from malicious motives on the part of the defenders, and for the purpose of oppression and concussion as against the pursuer: That by and through the illegal and wrongful acts of the defenders, before detailed, the pursuer has suffered in his means and estate, and his reputation, character, and feelings have been wantonly and maliciously outraged and injured: That more particularly, the pursuer having been, at and about the time the foresaid proceedings were adopted and directed against him, in the course of undergoing his trials before the Presbytery of Inveraray, with a view to obtaining his license as a preacher of the gospel, and the said proceedings having come to the knowledge of the Presbytery, or some of the members thereof, his trials were postponed or superseded, till the pursuer's character and conduct, especially in relation to the foresaid proceedings, should be investigated and reported on by the kirk-session of Lochgilhead, to whom a remit was made for that purpose by the Presbytery; and although, upon the said investigation taking place, the pursuer's character and conduct were cleared and established to the entire satisfaction of the Presbytery, yet his feelings were grievously injured, his mind greatly distressed, his prospects seriously endangered, and a public vindication of his character rendered indispensable: That to enable him to adopt the necessary steps with a view to such vindication, the pursuer, immediately after the lawless proceedings, before detailed, had taken place, applied both verbally and by writing, personally and by his agent, to the defenders for access to the foresaid petition, and warrants or interlocutors, but, on one evasive pretence or other, such access was refused till very recently; and the pursuer was thereby prevented from sooner instituting and following out the present action: That the whole proceedings complained of having been illegally, oppressively, and maliciously got up and carried into effect against the pursuer by the defenders, in manner before particularly set forth and described, and having been productive of serious loss and damage to the pursuer, as before particularly explained, the defenders are liable and responsible to him in reparation;"

he concluded against the defenders "conjunctly and severally, or severally and respectively, and in such terms as may be determined by the Court or a jury," for payment of £500 in name of reparation, damages and solatium.

Messrs M'Lachlan and M'Pherson pleaded the following preliminary defence:—"1. The action ought to be dismissed as against the defenders, Messrs M'Lachlan and M'Pherson, in respect that the summons does not state grounds relevant to support its conclusions as against them, in terms of 43 Geo. III. c. 141, and the subsequent Acts of 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, § 26, and 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. cap. 37, § 13." They afterwards lodged a minute, in which, without departing from their defences, they "with reference to the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 141, and subsequent Acts," judicially tendered "the sum of twopence, in name of damages to the pursuer," and protested that the pursuer should be liable to them in the whole expenses of the suit.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"23d November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the preliminary defences urged for the defenders Neil M'Lachlan, Esq., and Peter M'Pherson,—In respect the defender Mr M'Lachlan has tendered twopence of damages to the pursuer, and in respect it is not specially set forth in the libel that the acts of Mr M'Lachlan, complained of, 'were done maliciously, and without any probable cause'—Sustains the first preliminary defence stated for the said Neil M'Lachlan; and dismisses the action in so far as directed against him, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to either party in the question between the pursuer and Mr M'Lachlan, and decerns; repels the preliminary defences stated for Peter M'Pherson, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the other parties may be heard as to the ulterior procedure for completing a record on the merits; and in respect that Peter M'Pherson has intimated that he does not intend to acquiesce in this interlocutor, finds him liable in the expenses of discussing his preliminary defence, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—It is thought that the case of the defender, Mr M'Lachlan, clearly falls within the protective Statutes, by which Justices and other inferior Magistrates in Scotland are exempted from responsibility for innocent mistakes and errors in the execution of their duty. The law on this subject was long very incomplete in Scotland, but it is now singularly broad and comprehensive.

"By a decision of the House of Lords in 1755, (Duke of Douglas v. Lockhart, Dictionary, p. 7640,) it was fixed that the Act of 24th Geo. II. c. 44, which forms a great safeguard to English Justices, did not apply to Scotland. The only statutory protection, therefore, given to Justices in this part of the kingdom, was that afforded by the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 141, which provides, that in any action brought against Justices for any conviction by their orders, or for any thing done by them in the levying of any penalty in carrying such conviction into effect, the plaintiff should recover 'no greater damages than twopence, unless he shall have expressly alleged that such acts were done maliciously, and without any probable cause.' As that Act was interpreted by the Courts of law in England, it only applied to erroneous or incompetent proceedings of Justices in following up 'convictions,' and not to the numerous other proceedings in matters of police, excise, and summary jurisdiction, in which they are often called upon to act.—See Massey v. Johnston, 12 East. 71. Gray v. Cockson, 16 East. 21.

"This was the state of the law till 1828, when the Act of Geo. IV. cap. 29, was passed, which enacted (§ 26.) that the provisions of an Act made in the 43d year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., entitled 'an Act to render Justices of the Peace more safe in the execution of their duty, shall extend to all inferior Judges and Magistrates in Scotland, in regard to any sentence pronounced, or proceeding had in any criminal trial.' By this Statute the protection, such as it was, which Justices enjoyed by the Act of 1803, was bestowed on all inferior magistrates in Scotland, and it was made competent, not only in proceedings following on convictions, but in regard generally to any proceeding had in any criminal trial. Still, looking to the multifarious duties and powers of Justices, it is obvious that that was but a limited and imperfect remedy.

"It was probably from this view of the law that the Act of 1830 (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. cap. 37,) was passed, which enacted that the said recited Act passed in the 9th year of the reign of his late Majesty, in so far as it provides for rendering 'all judges more safe in the execution of their duty, shall extend to all acts done by any Judge and Magistrates in apprehending any party, or in regard to any criminal cause or proceeding, or to any prosecution' for a pecuniary penalty.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this Statute clearly applies to such a wrong or mistake as the Justice of the Peace fell into in the matter complained of, if indeed there was an error in his proceeding. It is true that the petition presented to him by M'Kellar, as a criminal libel, was incompetent and absurd, in so far as it prayed for the punishment of the parties.

But still it contained information of a serious nature, requiring some investigation, and precautionary measures in a remote district, in which a Justice of Peace was entitled, and perhaps bound, to interfere to a certain effect. It set forth the fraud and breach of trust of a servant, that he had embezzled £52, and deposited part of his master's money with one individual, and a watch, purchased with the embezzled funds, with another; and the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to say that any magistrate was not entitled to order any of the parties to be apprehended for examination, leaving the ulterior proceedings to be regulated by himself after examination. The incompetent part of the prayer, as to punishment, did not absolve the magistrate, in a district where there was no professional Judge, from taking a precognition, even ex proprio motu, on information being laid before him that a crime had been committed, and that a part of the corpora delicti was at that time within his reach. On the contrary, it is notoriously agreeable to the daily practice of Scotland for Justices of Peace to take precognitions, and make preliminary investigations, and it would be of bad example if they were readily exposed to personal prosecutions, even for innocent mistakes in that most important department of their duty. The right and the duty of the Justices of the Peace in Scotland to take precognitions, and the protection they enjoy from the law in so acting, are well explained by Mr Alison, Vol. II. p. 148-9.

"This seems a sufficient answer to the plea, that as the magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the charges set forth in M'Kellar's petition, it must be held that he was not acting as a Justice of Peace at all. But it may be doubted whether in all cases, even of excess of jurisdiction, a Justice is deprived of the benefit of the protecting Statutes. It is often enough to show that he has acted colourably, and in the supposed discharge of his duty, though it may be ultimately found that he had no jurisdiction. Hence in England, a Justice sued for acting as a single Magistrate, when jurisdiction was only given to two Magistrates, was found entitled to the notice required by the Statute to be given to English Justices; Weller, 9 East. 384; and in the case of Wedge against Berkeley, where a Magistrate seized the plaintiff's goods, alleging that they were stolen, and when the jury found that he had no reasonable ground to suppose this, yet as he acted without malice, he was held to have acted as a Magistrate, and to be entitled to the notice which the English Acts require to be given to Justices, (1) Nev. and P., 665.

"There are various decisions in our own Courts, which appear to have proceeded on very strict rules of responsibility attaching to Justices. But while these of course depended on their own specialities, the greater part of those quoted by the pursuer were prior to the Act of 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV. cap. 37, and therefore cannot rule the present question. The later cases, however, of Anderson v. Main (3d February 1837), and of Malonie (21st January 1841), afford examples of the effect given in our Courts to the protective Statutes even in cases of great irregularity.

"As the protective Statutes do not apply to the clerk, and malice is libelled in the summons against him, the action, as against the clerk, is for the present sustained. This case is distinguished from some others that have occurred against clerks of Court, in so far as it appeared in these that the clerk acted solely by instruction of the Magistrates. But a contrary allegation is set forth in this summons. No expenses have been given to the Justice, as the Statute on which the action has been dismissed, does not direct such costs to be given, while the Magistrate, by his tender, declines going to issue on the irregularity of his proceedings on all points.

"As it was stated at the bar that the fate of the pursuer's license from the Presbytery depends on the result of the present action (which seems rather an unreasonable condition), it may be proper to add, that the dismissal of the action, as against the Magistrate, on the grounds now assigned, infers no impropriety on the part of the pursuer. On the contrary, in acquitting the Magistrate at present, the Lord Ordinary assumes the entire innocence of the pursuer."

The pursuer and the defender, M'Pherson, reclaimed—the former in so far as the interlocutor sustained the preliminary defence of Mr M'Lachlan, and the latter in so far as it repelled the preliminary defences stated for him.

At advising, the Court first took up the case of the Judge:

Lord President.—This case requires attention, but I see no sufficient ground for differing from the Lord Ordinary as to the protection afforded by the Statute. It is vain to quote from English practice, unless it could be shown that the circumstances are precisely the same. This much appears to hold in both ends of the island. If the question relates to the form of the proceedings, the Judge is within the protection of the Statute, and unless malice and want of probable cause be expressly libelled, he is entitled, on tendering twopence, to be assoilized. We must not look here for an observance of the strict rules of regular criminal procedure; for when an application was made in the name of a private individual wishing investigation, great allowance must be made for any thing unprofessional in the form of the petition. The Magistrate, without scrutinizing its terms very strictly, was entitled to deal with the statement according to its substantial meaning. The petitioner then tells the whole story,—how his clerk had misconducted himself, and, among other things, how he had purchased a silver watch with his money,—meaning, evidently, money which he had embezzled, and had given this watch to M'Kellar. Although he does not say that M'Kellar was actually concerned in the embezzlement, or that he resettled the watch, well knowing it to have been purchased with embezzled money, it is plain that he meant this, for he says clearly enough, that he kept the proceeds of the embezzlement, and prays for warrant to have him examined and punished. In a formal criminal petition for examination, the addition of the words "to be punished," would be most irregular; but then look at the warrant, the granting of which was the only act done by the Magistrate. I see nothing in it so very disconform to practice. It gives authority to apprehend the pursuer, and bring him up for examination, and, at the same time, to cite witnesses on both sides. So far as the Magistrate is concerned, this is the whole head and front of his offending. Then, what happens on the 2d of March? It is stated that the prosecutor had taken up the question, and the Justices dismiss the action. This is certainly loose phraseology, but it is impossible to mistake its meaning. There was, properly speaking, no action, as an action for debt; but there was a kind of action, or, in other words, a proceeding. I am clear, on the whole, that the Magistrate is within the protection of the Statute; and since the pursuer has not averred that he acted maliciously, or without probable cause, he is entitled, in consequence of his judicial tender, to be assoilized.

The other Judges concurred.

The Court then proceeded to consider the case of Peter M'Pherson, the clerk,—his counsel contending that he was in the same situation as his principal, the Magistrate; while the pursuer's counsel contended that he stood in a different situation, inasmuch as it was libelled in the summons, not only that he acted as clerk, but that he had, moreover, assisted the petitioner in concocting his charge.

Lord President.—I think this charge of concocting, places the clerk in a different situation from the Justice.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as the Magistrate is concerned, and ~~find~~ the defender, the Magistrate, entitled to the expense incurred since the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and modify the same to four guineas: Quoad the defender's reclaiming note, recal the interlocutor therein reclaimed against, so far as therein craved; and remit to the Lord Ordinary, before answer, to receive from the pursuer a specific statement of facts in support of his action against the clerk, and to proceed farther as shall be just."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 67.—CHRISTOPHER SETON, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM DAWSON and OTHERS, Defenders.

Trust—Trustees—Liability—Reparation—Culpa lata—Circumstances held to amount to gross negligence on the part of trustees, so as to render them personally liable for moneys lost to the trust-estate, notwithstanding of the protecting clause in the trust-deed.

The pursuer is the only son of the late Major Christopher Seton of Balmblae. His father died on the 18th May 1819, at which time the pursuer was three years of age.

Major Seton, by his trust-deed and settlement, conveyed his whole property and effects, and particularly his lands of Balmblae, the superiority of Kirkforthar, and a dwelling-house and offices in Falkland, together with all other lands and estate which might belong to him at his death, to Messrs William Blair, Thomas Barland, John M'Ritchie, James Kyd and Robert Taylor, and to such other persons as might be afterwards appointed or assumed as trustees, for the following purposes,—1st, The payment of the testator's debts and funeral charges. 2dly, The payment of such legacies, gifts or provisions, as he might appoint; "and, for that purpose, his trustees were authorised to sell and dispose of such parts of his means and estate, heritable or moveable, as they may think necessary." 3dly, For payment, annually, of such a sum for the support and education of his son, Christopher Seton (the pursuer), as they shall see proper; and upon his son attaining the age of twenty-one years, the trustees were to "denude themselves of the residue of the heritable property herein before conveyed, to and in favour of the said Christopher Seton; whom failing, to the other heirs after mentioned, by a deed of entail in manner after specified." 4thly, On the pursuer attaining majority, the trustees are directed to execute a deed of entail of the truster's remaining heritable property in favour of the pursuer, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, the heirs-female of his body; whom failing, to the defender, Mr Blair, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the defender's son, William, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to any other heir-male of the body of Mrs Blair, who was Major Seton's niece; whom failing, to the heirs-male of his niece, Melvin Seton, wife of the defender, Mr Dawson, and the heirs-male of their bodies; and failing the whole of the heirs-male in the above order of succession, there is a substitution in favour of the heirs-female of the defenders. 5thly, The trustees were to make payment to the testator's sister, Mrs Barland, of a legacy of £100, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that should happen two years after his death, and also of an annuity of £20 to Jean Storrar, the mother of the pursuer. 6thly, The trust was to continue till the pursuer arrived at the age of twenty-one years. 7thly, The whole residue of the testator's effects was to accumulate for the benefit of the pursuer, and to be paid over to him at the age of twenty-one years. "And the better to expedite this trust, I hereby authorise and empower the trustees before appointed, and such others as I may add to that list, and the survivors or survivor of those accepting, to add and assume such other person or persons, one or more, as they may think fit, to be trustees, either along with themselves, or in their place, and with the same powers as if they had been originally named and appointed by myself; and I declare that the trustees, whether original, added or assumed, shall not be liable for omissions, neglect of diligence of any kind, nor singuli in solidum, but each only for his own actual intromissions; neither shall they be liable for any factors or attorneys to be appointed by them, farther than that they be reputed responsible at the time of entering upon their office." It is then declared that debtors and purchasers shall not be concerned with any of the purposes or provisions of the trust. "And I hereby nominate and appoint my said trustees to be tutors and curators to the said Christopher Seton, my son, during his pupillarity and minority."

Of the persons named trustees, Mr Kyd and Mr Taylor alone accepted; and thinking it expedient to exercise the powers which the trust conferred on them, of assuming additional trustees, they requested the deceased Mr George Seton, the defender Mr Dawson, and the deceased Mr Andrew Thomson, W.S., to act along with them. Mr Seton and Mr Dawson were the truster's near relatives, and were included as substitutes in the entail to be executed of his estate. Accordingly a meeting was held of the two original accepting trustees, and of those proposed to be assumed, at Perth, on the 6th of September 1819, when Mr George Seton, the defender Mr Dawson, and the deceased Mr Thomson, were formally assumed into the trust. The minute of assumption repeats the protecting clause, whereby it is declared that the trustees should not be liable for omissions, neglect of diligence of any kind, nor singuli in solidum, nor for any factors or attorneys, but each only for his own actual intromissions. Mr Kyd submitted to the meeting a statement of the affairs of the trust, and of the accounts betwixt Major Seton and himself, from January 1816 until the period of the Major's death in 1819.

On considering the state of the trust-affairs, it was resolved immediately to sell certain portions of the heritable estate, "and to apply the price in extinction of the Major's debts." From the minutes it appears that the trustees resolved to sell, (1.) A house in Falkland which had belonged to the truster, and they "direct Mr Kyd to advertise it to be sold by public roup." (2.) The superiority which belonged to the truster of lands in the county of Fife, exceeding £500 of valued rent, on the ground, that to retain the vote which the superiority afforded for seventeen years, or until the pursuer attained majority, would be improvident, and therefore they "appointed Mr Kyd to advertise the superiorities to be disposed of, either together or in lots, as purchasers may incline," and "to apply the price in extinction of the Major's debts." (3.) The meeting had their attention drawn to certain matters regarding which there had been a dispute betwixt the truster and Mrs Buchanan of Kirkforthar, which Mr Thomson was requested to consider, and endeavour to get settled by arbitration, and if not, to take measures for bringing them to a close in a court of law.

Mr Kyd forthwith proceeded to carry out the directions given by the trustees on 6th September 1819. On the 2d December he sold by public roup the superiority of Balmblae for £254, and a disposition was granted in favour of the purchaser, which was subscribed by all the trustees, original and assumed. It commences with these words: "We, James Kyd and Robert Taylor, writers in Cupar, with the consent after mentioned, considering that by a disposition and settlement by the deceased Christopher Seton," &c.; and after narrating the nature of the trust, and the sale of the superiority under articles of roup, and the purchase of Mr Watt, the deed proceeds thus:

"And now seeing that the said Thomas Watt has instantly made payment to us of the foresaid purchase-money of £254, with interest, &c., therefore we, the said James Kyd and Robert Taylor, the original accepting trustees as aforesaid, with consent of the said William Dawson, George Seton, and Andrew Thomson, trustees assumed by us as before mentioned, have sold and disposed," &c.

In like manner, the disposition in favour of Mrs Buchanan Lindsay, of the superiority of Kirkforthar, which Mr Kyd also sold by public roup, proceeds on the same narrative with the disposition in favour of Mr Watt. Kyd and Taylor are the disponers, but Mr Kyd alone, in this instance, received the price. The clause is in these words:

"And now seeing that Mrs Buchanan has made payment to me, the said James Kyd, for behoof of the trust-estate of the said Major Christopher Seton, of the foresaid sum of £300 Sterling, it is necessary that we grant the disposition underwritten: Therefore wit ye us, the said James Kyd and Robert Taylor, the two accepting original trustees named by the said Christopher Seton with consent," &c.

The deed is subscribed by Mr Kyd and Mr Taylor, as disponers and recipients of the price, and by Messrs Seton, Dawson and Thomson, as consenters.

The house in Falkland was sold by Mr Kyd to Francis Deas for £160, and the disposition in the purchaser's favour is granted by Kyd and Taylor. The price is acknowledged to have been received by Mr Kyd alone, and the disposition is subscribed by Mr Thomson as consenter. It was not subscribed by Messrs Seton and Dawson.

The matters in dispute between Mrs Lindsay Buchanan and Major Seton were made the subject of a compromise, after a process had been instituted in the Court of Session. The trustees agreed to accept from Mrs Buchanan the sum of £900, in full of all their claims as trustees,—she, on the other hand, discharging all her claims against them. The discharge by the trustees in Mrs Buchanan's favour, which was executed in May 1822, runs in the names of Mr Kyd and Mr Taylor, as the accepting and acting trustees of Major Seton. It narrates the proceedings which terminated in the compromise, and then the receipt of the money is acknowledged in these terms:

“And the said Mrs Georgia Lindsay or Buchanan having accordingly now made payment to me, the said James Kyd, as factor for the said Christopher Seton's estate, and for behoof thereof, of the said sum of £900 Sterling, and of the legal interest thereof from the said term of Whitsunday 1821 to the date of delivery of these presents, whereof we do hereby acknowledge the receipt, renouncing all exceptions to the contrary: Therefore we have exonerated and discharged, likewise do hereby exonerate, acquit, and simpliciter discharge,” &c.

The deed was subscribed by Messrs Kyd and Taylor as the granters, and by Mr Kyd as the receiver of the £900, and by Messrs Thomson, Seton and Dawson, the assumed trustees, as consenters.

The several deeds referred to were prepared by Mr Kyd, and transmitted, after being executed by himself and Mr Taylor, to Messrs Dawson and Seton for their signatures as consenters. Mr Kyd had been the confidential agent of the truster, and the trustees continued that confidence, not only in matters relating to the trust, as has been seen, but also in some of their own private concerns. Unexpectedly he became bankrupt in 1827, when it turned out, that instead of applying the proceeds of the subjects directed to be sold at the meeting in September 1819, in extinction of the truster's debts, he had retained the greater part of the same in his own hands. No second meeting of the trustees was held until the 6th July 1828, before which time Mr Kyd had become bankrupt. He read to the meeting the previous minute of 6th September 1819, and stated, that he considered it unnecessary to call any formal meeting of the trustees since then, as they all resided at a distance, and there was nothing of material consequence connected with the trust which he thought required their consideration. He then laid before the meeting a state of his accounts, from which it appeared that he owed a balance of nearly £1400 to the trust-estate, besides interest, “which the meeting regret, and are dissatisfied to find so great, considering that Mr Kyd should have apprized the trustees occasionally of the state of the trust-funds, and at any rate, ought to have applied any surplus in payment of the Major's debts.” “In consequence of Mr Kyd's failure, the meeting are of opinion that it would be better for Mr Thomson, who is now resident in the country, and at no great distance from Falkland, to take the management of the trust-estate, than that Mr Kyd should continue to do it, and authorise Mr Thomson to act accordingly.” “The trustees consider it expedient, and agree to hold at least an annual meeting in the month of October, and oftener if they see cause.”

The pursuer having arrived at the years of majority, raised the present action against the trustees, and the representatives of such of them as had died, concluding against them for payment of the funds which Mr Kyd had received, and which, in consequence of his bankruptcy, had been lost to the trust-estate. To this personal demand the Lord Ordinary gave effect by the following interlocutor:

“12th February 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, productions, and whole process, decerns against the defenders, James Kyd and his trustee, for whom no appearance has been made, in terms of the conclusions of the libel: and with regard to the other defenders, finds that the whole of the said defenders, except Henry Blair, are personally bound to account to the pursuer for the sum of £956. 6. 10., which they admit to have received from Mrs Buchanan Lindsay, in August 1822, on account of the trust-estate, by a regular receipt and discharge running in their names, and subscribed by each of them individually: Finds, in like manner, that the said defenders (with the exception of Henry Blair, as above), are personally bound to account to the pursuer for the farther sums of £284 and £241, being the prices of two freehold qualifications, after deducting expenses, belonging to the trust-estate, which were sold and conveyed to the purchasers by dispositions acknowledging receipt of the said prices, and subscribed by all the said defenders, as trustees and consenters thereto; except that the defender, Taylor, is stated, in the narrative of the latter of these dispositions, to have actually received payment of the price jointly with James Kyd, for behoof of the trust, and subscribes that disposition accordingly, as a principal disponent, along with the said Kyd;—and to this extent repels the defences of these defenders, and decerns: but before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that it may be explained what farther decree or procedure in the accounting may be necessary to give effect to these findings, and to exhaust the merits of the cause.

“Note.—Cases of this kind, when there is no allegation of fraud or sinister object, are always painful, and often perplexing, from the difficulty of determining to what extent effect can safely or properly be given to such protecting clauses as occur in the trust-deed now under consideration,—a difficulty which the Lord Ordinary feels to have been rather increased than diminished by the course of the recent decisions.

“The nearest approach to a consistent or practical principle that he has been able to deduce (and that not with a perfect assurance that the deduction is warranted) from those decisions, appearing to him to be this:—That where there has been no actual intromissions, or direct interference with the state of the trust-funds by any individual trustees, they will not be liable for losses arising from the neglect or dishonesty of others of their number, or of factors or agents appointed by the whole, unless their omission to check or prevent such misconduct amounted, in the circumstances, to such crassa negligentia or culpa lata, as both in law and in common sense is equiparate to fraud; but that where there has been such actual intromission or interference, they will be liable for a smaller measure of neglect or omission, being in such a case to be dealt with as having voluntarily charged themselves with the particular funds with which they had thus intermeddled, and being consequently bound to discharge themselves, by showing that they had made such a reasonable disposition or application of them, as again to exempt them from responsibility for the parties by whose faithlessness or rashness they may have been afterwards lost.

“The Lord Ordinary cannot say that he is satisfied with the soundness of the distinction which a rule or principle like this would seem to establish, between the degree of negligence which should make a trustee liable where there has been what is called actual intromission, and where there has been nothing thought to come under such a description. To him it has always appeared that more importance has been ascribed to such actual intromission, than upon any sound view it was entitled to,—that the degree of actual negligence which should infer responsibility in one case, ought to infer it in every other, and that actual intromission is truly of little consequence, except as affording clear evidence of the personal knowledge in the individuals, of the risks to which the funds under their management must then be exposed. The express provision which occurs in most trust-deeds, that the trustees shall not be liable for each other, but each only for his own actual intromissions, is intended (it is conceived) merely to exclude the hazard of any claim being made on them, as answerable singuli in solidum; and not at all as affecting the measure of their liability for actual or individual neglect, which is usually left to be regulated (as in the present case) by a separate declaration, that they shall not be bound to do diligence, nor answerable for omissions, or the insolvency of factors, agents, &c.; and if it be settled (as it is understood to be), that such a provision will not protect against any blameable and extraordinary degree of negligence, it would seem to follow, that it can be of no real importance whether this has occurred after an actual intromission (which might be in itself quite innocent and laudable), or under any other circumstances which still left it as a case of equal (though not greater) aggravation.

"Take the remarkable case of Blane, for example, to illustrate this view of the matter. The trustees were there held (and justly) to have actually intromitted with the funds, by individually subscribing certain bank orders, and receipts, and discharges, for the purpose of calling them up from the investments on which they had previously stood; but it was not, in any degree, for this mere intromission that they were found liable. If they had immediately seen them invested on new and more beneficial securities, their conduct would have been not only blameless, but meritorious; nor would this intromission have afforded a pretext for subjecting them for any loss that might have arisen at a distance of time, by the ultimate failure of the new securities, or the dishonesty of the factors who managed them. The sole ground of liability, in short, in that case, was their extraordinary negligence in allowing the money so raised to pass at once into the hands of Paterson, one of their own number, without seeing that he reinvested it safely, and without requiring any security from him, for its application or safe keeping. But would the case, in this respect, have been at all different, if, instead of themselves co-operating in drawing the money, they had merely received a report from Paterson that it had been paid up to him some time before, and was then lying in his private cash-account? In such a case it would not be said that they had themselves had any actual intromission; but the fact of the actual state of the money being thus brought as clearly and fully to their knowledge, as if they had themselves furnished him with the means of drawing it, could they be less liable for the consequences of their actual neglect, in taking no steps for its safe investment, or requiring any sort of security from the holder, than if the very same measure of neglect had occurred after such an actual intromission?

"But though the Lord Ordinary has thought it right to throw out this view of the principle which he apprehends should govern such cases, he holds that there was, in this case, quite as much actual intromission on the part of the defenders as occurred in that of Blane, or in most of the others, in which trustees not accused of fraud or partiality, and having the same clause of protection in the deed, have been found personally liable. In the settlement with Mrs Buchanan Lindsay, they all, in express terms, 'acknowledge themselves to have received' the sum of £956, there specified, and sign the receipt and discharge accordingly, without any sort of qualification. Their so doing might or might not have been proper or necessary. But, of itself, that act could have inferred no responsibility. If they had seen the money better reinvested, it would have been laudable. If they had even given it to Kyd, with directions to look out for such an investment, and to lodge it in the bank in the interim, they might not have been liable, though he had immediately run away with it, or imposed upon them by the exhibition of false documents, purporting that their directions had been obeyed. If they had even allowed him to keep it in his own hands, upon finding security, they might have been safe. But to give it over to him, as they did, without any direction or security whatever, and never once to inquire what he did with it for the five or six years which intervened before his bankruptcy, when it appeared that it had been traded upon and lost, was an actual neglect, at least as flagrant as that in the case of Blane, and, in the Lord Ordinary's apprehension, would have made them liable, though it had not been preceded (as it was) by an actual intromission, very nearly identical in its circumstances, and to the full as strong as that which occurred in that case.

"The other transactions, as to the sale of the freehold qualifications, are substantially in the same situation. There, too, the defenders interfered personally in drawing and realising the money, and affixed their individual subscriptions to dispositions admitting the payment of the prices; and without which subscriptions they were aware those prices would not have been paid. It is obviously of no consequence that most of them signed those instruments as consenters only, in respect that they were not individually infest. It is enough to make the case identical with that of the receipt to Mrs Buchanan Lindsay, and a case of actual intromission, first, that they so signed, in order that the money might become part of the trust-funds, over which, as a quorum of trustees, they had full and exclusive powers, and for the safety of which, when thus drawn in by their proper act, they were bound in some reasonable way to provide; and, second, that they were necessarily as completely certiorated, both of the fact of the money being thus realised and given over to Kyd, and of their power to make him take a proper security for it, as if they had not only signed the receipt as principals, but had actually had the money on the table at their meeting, and had themselves handed it over to that person.

"The Lord Ordinary would have been inclined, on the principles now explained, to have extended their liability to the price of the house in Falkland, and even to the prices of the moveable estate, not realised till after the assumption of the new trustees in September 1819. But as they do not appear to have actually put their names to the deeds by which these funds were realised, or otherwise interfered personally in the transactions, he was unwilling to risk going beyond the warrant of the recorded decisions of the Court, by subjecting them, on what he conceives, however, to be conclusive evidence of their knowledge of the insecure state of these funds, and their total and continued neglect of all measures for their security or just application. It is also of less consequence, that the liability should be thus extended, as it is understood that, under the interlocutor as it stands, nearly as much will be recovered as to replace to the pursuer all that has been lost by Kyd's insolvency. It is a singular, and it is believed unprecedented feature in this case, that after their first meeting in September 1819, these trustees never met, or were called together again, till after Kyd's bankruptcy in 1828; though they acted, in the meantime, so as to put into his hands, without the least precaution, funds which, without their interference, he could never have obtained, and actually went on afterwards to assume a new trustee in his room, and have continued to this day in the management of the pursuer's property. Blair, who was thus assumed after Kyd's catastrophe, can, of course, have no share of the responsibility of those who trusted him."

On this judgment being submitted to review, the Court appointed the argument to be stated in minutes of debate, in order that it might be communicated to the Lords of the First Division, and permanent Lords Ordinary, for advising of the whole Court,—the question for consideration of the consulted Judges being, "whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to or altered?"

Pleaded by the pursuer—

That the loss in this case has not arisen in spite of efforts made by the defenders to discharge their duty, and of these efforts misgiving, from causes over which they had no control. On the contrary, the loss has arisen from their sitting with their hands across, just as if they had never accepted of the trust, and had not been bound to take any step whatever in regard to those trust-funds, which, by their own act, they had placed in the hands of Mr Kyd. By subscribing the several deeds acknowledging the receipt of the money, by means of which Mr Kyd was enabled to draw it, they must be held to have had actual intromission. Every person who subscribes a document by means of which money is drawn, plainly draws the money which he thereby authorises to be paid, as much as if it were paid into his own hands. Blane v. Paterson, 28th January 1836. Sim v. Charles, 13th May 1830. Moffat v. Robertson, 31st January 1834. Donaldson v. Kennedy, 18th June 1833. It is admitted that every claim against a trustee must turn upon the issue, whether he has been guilty of gross negligence. But if this be the principle which is to determine the personal liability of trustees, where is there a case to be compared to the present for gross and culpable negligence? The fact is undoubted, that after their first meeting on the 6th September 1819, when they authorised the trust-estate to be converted into money, and after subscribing the several deeds whereby Mr Kyd was enabled to possess himself of these trust-funds, the defenders not only never required Mr Kyd to secure these funds, but never even took the trouble of inquiring what had become of them. After enabling him to possess himself of the trust-funds, the defenders acted precisely in the same manner as if they had resigned the trust, or as if they never had been concerned in it. Gratuitous trustees, acting under family settlements, are entitled to have their conduct not only liberally, but even indulgently considered. But to hold them not liable for such gross negligence as here occurs, would be to extend the indulgence shown to them farther than is consistent either with expediency or equity. The defenders have referred to the law of England; but it appears that the law of England is just as unfavourable to them as the law of Scotland. 1 Schoale and Lefroy, 341. Willis, pp. 167, 182, 185, 187, 194. Hampson, pp. 51, 63. 16 Vesey, 477. 1 Eden, 149.

Pleaded for the defenders—

That though in point of form this is an action of accounting against the defenders, it is, in point of fact, a penal action, whereby the pursuer seeks to establish against them a personal liability for certain portions of the trust-funds which were intrusted with by the two original acting trustees. There is no question with any creditor or special legatee of the trust; and the pursuer, as his father's gratuitous donee, is bound to give full effect to the broad protecting clause contained in the settlement. The pursuer must either instruct actual intrusions by each of the trustees, or otherwise, that, by their conduct, they have violated some direction of the trust, or done what in law is equivalent to fraud. They did not actually intrude with one farthing of the trust-funds; as trustees, they have already accounted for the funds. They were authorised to employ factors or attorneys, for whom they were not to be responsible; and they employed Mr Kyd, as Major Seton himself had done. They directed him, with the price which he received for the property sold, to pay the trust's debts, and they believed that he had done so, while it turns out he had not. But the trust declares,—and the trustees accepted in reliance on the protection afforded by the declaration,—that they were not to be liable for factors or attorneys, further than that they should be reputed responsible at the time of entering upon their duties; and that Mr Kyd was so reputed in 1819, and that he continued in good credit for years thereafter, is not disputed. It is exclusively because of the terms of the two dispositions of the superiority, and of the discharge by the trustees to Mrs Buchanan Lindsay, and in respect these deeds were subscribed by the defender Mr Dawson, and by the late Mr George Seton, that the plea of actual intromission is raised. But the funds realised by the sales of the heritage never were, in point of fact, touched or actually intrusted with by them. They signed, as consenters, the dispositions to the purchasers of the superiority, merely as necessary acts of administration in the course of the trust. The receipt of the money was acknowledged by Mr Kyd alone, or in one instance by Kyd and Taylor. In the case of Lord Lyndoch and others v. Auchterlony, it was held that a trustee was bound to give his concurrence to necessary acts of administration. But it never was contemplated, that, by his act of concurrence, he subjected himself in personal responsibility for the actual intromissions of his co-trustees. If the signing of a deed as a consentor thereto, when in gremio the receipt of the money is acknowledged by another, makes a case of actual intromission, and such as to subject trustees in a personal liability to account for the moneys received by their factor or attorney, there is now no distinction between actual and constructive intromission. Actual intromission is a matter of fact, and the amount of it must be specially instructed; otherwise to infer the fact from authority given, in terms of a power conferred to that effect, is, instead of protecting, in truth ensnaring trustees into a course of management, or into the acceptance of a gratuitous office, which, had they known the nature of it, they would have shunned instead of accepting. The amount of the offending has been, that the trustees did not personally see that the prices of the heritable subjects sold had been applied by Mr Kyd as he was directed. It was but an omission or neglect of diligence. They violated no direction of the trust; and if an omission of this kind is to be held sufficient to subject trustees in a personal responsibility, when the trust itself has declared that they shall not be liable for omissions or neglect of diligence of any kind, few persons will hereafter be induced to discharge the duties of gratuitous trustees, even with the broadest protection with which the trust itself can shield them; and this the more especially, where their personal responsibility is pleaded by a gratuitous residuary donee like the present pursuer. Dalrymple v. Murray, 4th August 1784, M. 3534. Lord Traquair's Trustees v. Cheap and Others, February 1835; Shaw, 13, p. 417. Cowan v. Crawford, 13th May 1836. Home v. Pringle, 1st December 1837; affirmed in the House of Lords, 22d June 1841. Willis on Trusts, pp. 193, 146. Williams, Vol. II. p. 1124. Leigh v. Barry, 3 Ath. 582.

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges:

Lord Cockburn, Lord President (Boyle), Lords Mackenzie, Fullerton, Cuninghame and Murray:

"Without exactly adopting all the observations in the Lord Ordinary's note, we are of opinion that his interlocutor is right, and ought to be adhered to.

"This cause has been delayed until we should have the benefit of the opinion of the House of Lords, in what was stated to be the somewhat analogous question of Home v. Pringle; and the judgment of this Court was affirmed there last June.

"In their circumstances, the two cases are quite dissimilar. But the valuable remarks made by the Lord Chancellor, confirm us in the conviction, that the general principle of our law is, that neither the protecting clause which occurs in this particular deed, nor any of the usual clauses framed for the same object, can be held to liberate trustees from the consequences of such gross negligence as amounts to culpa lata. This part of the case of Home v. Pringle was decided on appeal upon this very ground. For the trustees were assailed there, solely because the facts did not imply negligence of this description. The principal charge against them was, that though they had appointed a solvent factor, they had failed to subject him to proper periodical accountings. But the House of Lords agreed with this Court, in holding this fact not to be established; because there were only delays of a few months, and, on the whole, though he might have been looked after more strictly, there was no culpable failure.

"But here we think that there was. It is not necessary for us to specify the circumstances in detail. Their substance is,—that certain sums belonging to the trust-estate came into the hands of the trustees, or of one of their number, with the knowledge and consent of the rest, as is proved by deeds signed by them acknowledging the receipts; that though the trustee said to have personally received these moneys was allowed to interfere so much, that he has been held out as the trust-factor by the defenders in this action, he had never been regularly appointed to any such office, so as to bring him, or them, responsibly within the operation of that part of the protecting clause which frees the trustees from being accountable for factors who were reputed safe when appointed; that this person having thus received the money with the knowledge of his brethren, they totally failed to take any subsequent charge of it; inasmuch, that though they continued to act in other respects as trustees, they made no inquiry as to what had become of the moneys, or even held a single meeting from 1819, when the sums were received, till 1828, by which time the trustee they had chosen to rely upon was bankrupt.

"We hold this total disregard of the trust, after their attention had been called, by their being required to sign the deeds, to the fact that these sums had been received, to amount to culpa lata. Though aware of the indulgence due, under such a clause, to trustees, we think that no trust-property would be safe, if such gross negligence were not to make those who are guilty of it, liable to the party injured."

Lord Ivory, concurred in by Lord Gillies :

"I concur generally in the above opinion. But I would not, perhaps, lay so much weight on the circumstance of Kyd's not having been regularly appointed to the office of trust-factor.

"In point of fact, the discharge granted by the trustees to Mrs Lindsay in May 1822, bears payment to have been made to 'the said James Kyd, as factor for the said Christopher Seton's estate, and for behoof thereof;' and the previous disposition to Mrs Buchanan in 1820, in like manner proceeds on the narrative, that payment had been made (of course by authority of the subscribing trustees) to 'the said James Kyd, for behoof of the trust-estate.' It is difficult to hold this (quoad these payments at least) as other than equivalent to a formal warrant to recover the money in the character of factor. And, indeed, even as to those others of the deeds which contain no words of similar import, it rather appears to me that the authority to uplift the money, implied in the very subscription of the trustees, must receive substantially the same effect.

"After all allowance, however, has been made on this ground, I can still see no reason for coming to any other conclusion than has been done, as to the legal responsibilities incurred, by the utter neglect of their own proper duty on the part of the trustees. The trustees were left in charge of the estate of a pupil; and that pupil, as the trustees knew, had no natural protectors to look after his interests, being an illegitimate child. In such a situation, the trustees were inexcusable for their total and reckless neglect of the estate which they had undertaken to administer. And even, therefore, had they, by the most formal deed, nominated Kyd (one of their own number) as factor, I should still have been of opinion, that their not holding a single meeting, as trustees, for nine years after their acceptance, and their placing the whole funds of the estate into Kyd's hands (for their concurrence in the deeds, which alone enabled him to get the money, amounts to no less), without ever from that moment taking a single step to compel him to account, or at all to ascertain what he was doing with the estate, was enough to bring the case up to that full measure of crassa negligentia, which undoes all legal or equitable claim on their part to protection, even under such a clause in their favour as is here founded on. Clauses of this kind do not protect against positive breach of duty. And where one accepts of the office of trustee, and thereby undertakes, as he surely does undertake to some extent, to administer, or superintend the administration of the estate which the trust places under his charge, what is it short of a breach of duty, when he stands wholly aloof and does absolutely nothing, leaving the estate in the meanwhile to run to ruin, not less effectually than if he had never taken upon him the office of trustee at all?

"I may just farther explain, that I do not regard the circumstances of the case as sufficient to bring the trustees within the category of parties liable for actual intromissions. Their subscription of the deeds I regard merely as a subscription for conformity. Accordingly, had Kyd failed with the funds in his hands within any reasonable period after their having thus authorised and sanctioned his receipt of the money—there being no room in this case for any charge of gross negligence on their part,—I think they must have been free. I should have been of the same opinion, even had the money actually passed through their own hands,—they being perfectly entitled to call in the assistance of Kyd or any other third party, as factor or agent, in order to the practical appropriation and disbursement of the money in terms of the trust. But in no view can I hold them excusable,—after putting the money into the hands of such third party,—for having allowed it, or the greater part of it, to remain there for a space of nine years wholly uncared for, and without so much as an account having during all that time been rendered. It is here that the gravamen of the case, as regards the trustees, in my opinion lies. For, could I get over the plea of culpa lata as applied to this species facti, I should have been disposed, in other respects, to allow them the protection of the clause which the trust-deed contains in their favour; that protection being only to be withheld when there is a clear case of culpa lata,—which, however, I think, there unquestionably is here."

Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur in the result of the opinions of the consulted Judges, but not in the details of the opinion of Lord Gillies, or of the Lord Ordinary's note. The action is to compel the trustees to demude and account; and I think they are liable personally to make good the sums concluded for. Two of the original trustees named by the truster accepted, and assumed other three individuals to act along with them. The pursuer was an infant, and a natural son, and the trustees were appointed his tutors and curators, and were his only guardians. The trust contemplated a long period of management, and was peculiarly onerous. During the first nine years, there was only one meeting, at which the trustees authorised the sale of certain subjects, and instructed Kyd to advertise them. But Kyd had no commission allowed him, nor was he appointed factor. I say nothing of the legality of appointing one of a body of trustees to be factor, with a salary. If a factor be appointed, there is a regular settlement of accounts, which, from a feeling of false delicacy, is not the case generally with a managing trustee. To bring the trustees within the protecting clause in the trust-deed, Kyd ought to have been regularly appointed factor. He took steps for the sale of the subjects, and when it was effected, the deeds of conveyance were signed by the trustees. The receipt and discharge of the trustees formed the foundation of the payment of the price. Kyd had no authority to receive the money, and grant a discharge. In one of the deeds he is called factor; but in a question between the pursuer and the trustees, this is of no moment, and cannot give them the benefit of the regular appointment of a factor. Are the trustees then chargeable with these sums in accounting? When money is paid to trustees on a concurring receipt, payment is made to all. The money here was paid to Kyd, but on the joint receipt of the trustees; and they were in the knowledge that the money was in his hands, awaiting their disposal. In Blane v. Paterson, the signing a receipt was held personal intromission with the money. Is there not actual intromission when money is paid, and lies at the disposal of the parties for whom it is paid? But if there be actual intromission, the result is, that they have the money, and must be liable for it;—if they have it not, what did they do with it? They must show how they are to be discharged of it. Actual intromission is of the essence of liability. The defenders quote the clause, declaring they shall not be liable for factors; but they must show they acted on the clause,—that they appointed a factor, and that the particular instance was a factorial transaction. Kyd was not factor; and the money was received by the trustees. How, then, can it be called a factorial transaction, and that they put it under his factorial charge? I am not prepared to take this off their hands here. They say that the money did not come into their pockets; but they were the more bound to look after it on that account. They cannot say they made a loan of it to Kyd; for they gave no directions to that effect. When there is actual intromission, there must be care and charge; but there was utter neglect here for nine years, which is culpa lata, and amounts to dole.

Lord Meadowbank.—I thought this a case of great difficulty, and had indicated an opinion rather against the interlocutor; but now I concur generally with your Lordship, except as to one point—the legality of appointing one out of a number of trustees as factor, with a salary.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am not prepared to say that such an appointment, with a salary, is legal.

Lord Medwyn.—We have the opinions of the consulted Judges making the trustees personally liable, but by no means on the same grounds. When two or more trustees concur in granting a receipt for money, they may not be liable for what is received by one of their number. The truster may limit their liability only for actual intromissions, and not omissions. When trustees are called on to grant receipts for the purpose of carrying on the trust, they cannot be liable on account of intromission—for it is not actual. Here there is no actual inintromission. I think Kyd was factor, although not formally so. The money came into his hands; and I see no meaning in the protecting clause, if it does not cover the other trustees in the transaction. They may be liable, no doubt, for loss incurred by great negligence; but negligence will be measured very differently where the intromission is actual, and not merely constructive, and also where the trustees are gratuitous and not salaried. In the present case, Kyd got the money in the due course of management, and while in good credit. I concur with the Judges who hold that the trustees cannot be liable on the ground of actual intromission. The signing of the deeds acknowledging receipt of the money, was merely negative intromission. If the trustees are not to be protected against claims, except for what they actually received, then, instead of getting benefit from the protecting clause, as understood by plain men, they will only have been allured by it.

Lord Moncreiff.—I cannot concur with the majority of the consulted Judges, but am of the opinion of Lord Medwyn. The question is, are the trustees to be liable for the unforeseen failure of Kyd, the favoured agent of the truster during his life, and of his trustees after his death. A claim of this sort must be rested on clear grounds of law. The pursuer must say something more than that the money was lost; for the trustees will clearly not be liable, unless the loss was incurred through something more than mere contingencies. If they had put the money out on personal security, or had they lodged it in the Fife Bank, it might have been lost; but the trustees would not be liable, even without any protecting clause. They are gratuitous trustees, and are liable only for ordinary diligence, as in the management of their own affairs. But the law of Scotland—looking to the comfort of families in the establishing of trusts—the necessity of their enduring for a long period—and the hazards attending them,—has gone beyond this, and appointed a special protection to trustees. The protecting clause in a trust-deed must mean something more than if it had not been there. The pursuer here is a gratuitous donee, and not a third party: he is therefore in the same situation as if old Seton himself, supposing he had been absent for awhile, were to return and call these trustees to answer to him. With reference to the clause in the deed, and the circumstances of the case—(reads protecting clause.) From the technical frequency of this clause, we are apt to overlook its import; but it has a special meaning. It is the contract on which the trustees act, and is to be favourably construed so long as the trustees act honestly. They are to be answerable only for actual intromission,—not for omission, nor singuli in solidum. The truster knew that deeds of sale, &c., must be signed by a quorum of the trustees, and he puts in the clause protecting the trustees, where they sign without having actual intromission. These words must be construed as they presented themselves to the truster himself, or to trustees designing to do a kind act, such as the defenders, who allowed themselves to be assumed as trustees on solicitation. If the truster himself were here instead of the pursuer, could he put such a gloss upon his own language as to say, that if the trustees signed any deed by which money came to be received by his own friend, they actually intromitted with it, although they never touched it? The point of intromission must first be decided, and afterwards the negligence—for the two are wholly distinct. If there was actual intromission, then the trustees must be liable. But look at the documents on which it is attempted to be made out. They are not simple deeds of receipt and discharge: they bear expressly that the money was received by Kyd and Taylor, and, in one instance, by Kyd alone. The other trustees are consenters; and the point is, looking to the protecting clause, does the fact that they did concur, nay, must have concurred, amount to actual intromission? It is declared in the deed, that the money was paid to Kyd, and the protecting clause declares, that the trustees are not to be liable for one another's intromissions. But it is said that Kyd never had any regular deed of factory. I think this is not of much importance. He was factor for many years to the truster himself. He is expressly designated factor in one of the deeds signed by the trustees; and I have no idea that the protection against the insolvency of factors can be explained away, merely because there was no regular deed of factory. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there was no case of actual intromission. A quorum of trustees may sign deeds for hundreds of thousands of pounds, who never dreamt that in so doing they incurred actual intromission,—who, while necessarily putting their names to deeds and discharges, never imagined they were ruining themselves and their families. If such is to be the law, can the office of a trustee be any longer undertaken by respectable men? The question of negligence is a different matter. Both opinions go on crassa negligentia, and such has been found to be a ground of liability as in the case of Home. But here the money was not unnecessarily uplifted: it was on a minute of the trustees,—nor was it made over in loan to Kyd. He was in the active management of the trust as intended by the truster, and it was understood that he should apply it to trust purposes. It is not even upon the record that Dawson was in the knowledge that it had not been so applied. What, then, is the negligence which is thought to be so intolerable? The estate was in good order; and the trustees believing the debts to have been paid, there was nothing farther to do. Kyd was in perfect credit, and was intrusted by Dawson himself with his own pecuniary affairs to a great extent; and yet the Lord Ordinary says they would not have so acted in their own affairs. The gravamen of the charge is, that the other trustees, relying upon Kyd as the truster himself had done, and having no occasion to meet, did not meet and call him to a strict account. I grant there was neglect of what, in strict duty, ought to have been done; but the truster, under a full sense of the infirmities of human nature, puts in a clause of protection for the express purpose of encouraging them to accept of the trust. The Lord Ordinary seems to construe the clause as protecting only against neglect of legal diligence. I say it does not mean this, but neglect amounting to culpa lata. It is so put in the opinions of the Judges; but the facts do not amount to it. The only fault of the trustees, was that along with all the world—they relied too much on Kyd. What is this but omission? The maternal relations of the pursuer saw this, and did not interfere. The defenders themselves so acted in their own affairs. Without wasting more time, I cannot better express my opinion than in the words of Lord Corehouse in the case of Traquair:—"As the defenders therefore had no actual intromission,—as they had transgressed no order of the truster or of the Court,—as they were guilty of no fault, except neglect or omission to see that" Kyd had paid the truster's debts, "which they had directed him to do,—as it is not alleged that they had reason to entertain any suspicion of his credit till his bankruptcy took place,—there is no ground for subjecting them to the loss which has occurred. From exuberant confidence in their factor, they acted imprudently and carelessly; but it was an omission only, and certainly it was no act of transgression, far less a dishonourable act."

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of, and refuse the desire of the note: Find no expenses hitherto due; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 68.—ELIZABETH STAIG or SCOTT and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. THE GENERAL COMMISSIONERS of POLICE for the BURGH of DUNDEE, Defenders.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Police Statute—Construction—Tenement of Land—Held that the words "tenement of land," occurring in certain clauses of the Dundee Police Act, 1837, mean, and are applicable only to, a single or individual building, although containing several dwelling-houses, with, it may be, separate means of access, but under the same roof, and enclosed by the same gables or walls, and that they do not extend to, or comprehend any square, range, or angle of buildings consisting of several houses completely divided from each other by party-walls and separate roofs, whether the same belong to one individual or body of individuals, or to many.

Process.—Competency.—Parties not called.—The commissioners of police of a royal burgh having let the fulzie of the burgh and suburbs vested in them by Statute, subsequently passed a resolution, declaring that they had no right, under the Statute, to a part of the suburban fulzie, which the tenant conceived had been let to him.—Held that the tenant was entitled to pursue an action of declarator of the extent of the subject let to him against the commissioners, without calling the suburban inhabitants.

The police of the burgh of Dundee is regulated by an Act of Parliament, passed on 12th July 1837. By section 112 it is enacted, “That the whole dung, fulzie, soil, dirt, ashes and filth, within the limits of the burgh of Dundee, before described, shall be vested in the said General Commissioners,—saving and excepting the refuse of the public or general slaughter-house for the time, within the said burgh, and of tan-yards and spinning-mills, and the dung from stables and cow-houses, subject to the provision after mentioned;—and also, saving and excepting the whole dung, fulzie, soil, dirt, ashes and filth, from places situate beyond the boundaries of the ancient burgh of Dundee, belonging to any person having an ash-pit or necessary for the use or accommodation of his family, and for receiving the dung, fulzie, soil, ashes and filth of such family exclusively, or belonging to any persons inhabiting the same tenement of land, and having an ash-pit or necessary for the use or accommodation of those inhabiting such tenement, and for receiving the dung, fulzie, soil, ashes and filth of such inhabitants exclusively, and deposited by such person or persons in such ash-pit or necessary; provided such ash-pit or necessary be removed from any public street, lane, or passage, and not exposed to the view of foot-passengers therefrom, and in such a situation as not to admit of deposition by neighbours, or to be in any respect offensive to neighbours or the public;—and also, saving and excepting the dung, fulzie,” and others collected by the trustees for the harbour, as therein provided.

By section 115 it is provided,

“That if any person shall be convicted before the Judge officiating in the Police Court, of having mixed, or allowed to be mixed, with the dung, fulzie, and refuse of slaughter-houses, stables, or cow-houses belonging to private parties, any dung, soil, dirt, ashes, or filth, vested by this Act in the said commissioners; or if any person shall be convicted before such Judge of depositing, or allowing to be deposited, in any ash-pit or necessary, beyond the bounds of the ancient burgh of Dundee, other than such as he shall or may have provided, as aforesaid, for the exclusive use of himself and his family, or as shall have been provided for the tenement of land of which he inhabits a part, as aforesaid, any dung, soil, fulzie, dirt, ashes, and filth from places not occupied by himself or his family,—such person or persons shall be liable for every such offence in a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and not less than five shillings.”

By the 118th section, it is declared lawful for the commissioners, from time to time,

“to grant leases for any period, not exceeding three years, of the dung, fulzie, soil, dirt, ashes, and filth hereby vested in them, either with or without such as shall come to belong to them by forfeiture; such leases being made by public roup to the highest bidder, under such limitations, restrictions and conditions, as to the said general commissioners shall appear proper.”

Acting under this last-recited power, the town manure was exposed to roup, for the first time under the Statute, upon 12th January 1838, as upon a lease for three years, to commence from and after 15th May 1838. The upset price was £1800; but after competition, William Robertson was preferred to the lease as the highest bidder, at the yearly rent of £2225. The deceased Mr Scott subsequently acquired right to the lease from Robertson, and, with his consent, a contract of lease was entered into between Mr Scott and the Commissioners of Police, acting through their committee on cleansing, which bears to have been executed on the 7th and 8th February 1838. The contract narrates the power of leasing conferred by the Statute, and the proceedings at the public roup, with the right subsequently acquired by Mr Scott, and sets to him, his heirs or assignees,

“all and whole the dung, fulzie, soil, dirt, ashes and filth within the limits of the burgh of Dundee, so far as vested in the General Commissioners of Police, as well as what may become vested in them by forfeiture, saving and excepting;” and then follow the exceptions contained in the Statute. It also contains a clause of warraudice “from all facts and deeds done, or to be done by them, in prejudice hereof,” &c.

The lessee was taken bound to employ a sufficient number of horses and carts to collect and carry away the fulzie, and one scavenger was to be appointed by the commissioners, and paid for at their expense, to attend each cart and assist the carter in loading it.

After the date of the lease, but before the term of entry, a question arose at the Board of Commissioners in regard to the effect of the expression “tenement of land,” in the exception (§ 112) applicable to places situated beyond the boundaries of the ancient burgh. At different places of the extended royalty, there are extensive piles or clusters of buildings which form considerable angles, ranges, and squares, and consist of different houses, divided from each other by gable or party-walls, and under separate roofs. These clusters of buildings were either erected by, or now belong to, joint-stock companies, and to individuals, and are held by the proprietors, some as separate possessions, and others under joint pro indiviso titles. They are let out in small dwelling-houses to work-people and others, and some of them contain about two hundred families, or upwards of eight hundred individual inhabitants. The question stirred by certain of the commissioners was, whether the fulzie of these ranges of buildings fell under the description of “tenements of land,” to which the statutory exception applied?

On the 11th April 1838, a motion was made at a meeting of the board,

“that the commissioners, in the bye-laws to be made by them, ought distinctly to declare that any square, range, or angle of buildings in the extended royalty, belonging to one proprietor or joint pro indiviso proprietors, having one common ash-pit and necessary, so as to enable the inhabitants to provide, as at present, for their convenience, comfort and cleanliness, shall be reckoned as one tenement for the purposes specified in section 112 of the Police Act.”

This motion was carried, and a declaration in terms of it was annexed to the laws and bye-laws which were afterwards published. The lessee having heard of the intended resolution, caused his law-agent to address a letter to the clerk of the commissioners, dated 17th April 1838, in which he represented that the attempt to take away and deprive him of so considerable a part of the dung to which he had right under his lease, was illegal and unauthorised, and intimated that he held the commissioners liable for all the loss and damage which he might suffer by and through the resolution.

Soon after the commencement of his lease, Mr Scott made an application in the Police Court, as for penalties against certain of the parties by whom the fulzie collected from the buildings in question was appropriated, but without effect. In February 1839, he again called upon the commissioners to review their resolution of 11th February 1838, but having failed to obtain redress, he raised the present action, which is now insisted in by his widow and son. The summons is dated and signeted 29th April 1839, and the conclusions are both declaratory and petitory. By the declaratory conclusions it is sought that it should be declared,

1. "That the words 'tenement of land,' which occur in the exemption or exception declared by the said recited Act, section 112, mean, and are applicable only to a single or individual building, although containing several dwelling-houses, with (it may be) separate means of access, but under the same roof, and enclosed by the same gables or walls." 2. "That the said exemption does not extend to, or comprehend any square, range, or angle of buildings, consisting of several houses completely divided from each other by party-walls and separate roofs, whether the same belong to one individual, or body of individuals, or to many." And, 3. "That the declaration or resolution of the said general commissioners of 11th April 1838, in relation to the said exemption, is contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said recited Act, and that it is illegal and inconsistent with the pursuer's just rights, under the foresaid contract of lease."

The petitory conclusions are twofold,—First, That the Commissioners of Police be decerned to rescind the resolution complained of; and

"to cause their scavengers and others to assist in receiving and delivering into the pursuer's carts, the dung, fulzie, &c., of the said squares, ranges, and angles of buildings; and to gather, collect, deposit, and deliver the same to the pursuer, as usual, in regard to other buildings and places within the bounds of police; and, generally, to give the pursuer all the aid and assistance in regard to the collection and delivering of the fulzie, &c., of such squares, ranges, and angles of building, or the enforcing of regulations of police, and enforcing the sanctions of the laws enacted by the said recited Act, as they are bound or accustomed to give in regard to the fulzie, &c., of other buildings and places within the said bounds which are not exempted from the operations of the said Police Act."

And, second, that the commissioners be decerned to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £1500 Sterling, or such other sum, more or less,

"as shall be ascertained to be the loss, injury, damage, and expense sustained and incurred by the pursuer in the premises, during the period from the commencement of the foresaid contract of lease on 15th May 1838, to the date of this summons, or which he may sustain and incur in the premises for the period from this date until the expiry of his lease, or until the said resolution or declaration shall be rescinded and recalled, and until due and full effect shall be given to the pursuer's contract of lease in relation to the fulzie, &c., of the squares, ranges, and angles of building, illegally exempted as aforesaid."

The cause having been debated upon the closed record before the Lord Ordinary, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"18th July 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel upon this record, and thereafter considered the whole process—Finds, that by the subsisting Police Act for the town of Dundee, neither the Commissioners of Police, nor any tacksman under them, are entitled to claim the dung, soil, and ashes put out from the dwellings of families inhabiting squares, courts, or any continuous range of building erected by, or belonging to one proprietor, or to pro indiviso owners, and let out by them to separate tenants, whether the same are divided by party-walls or not, provided the said proprietor has furnished an ash-pit and necessary for the exclusive use of the families so resident on his own property, and in no respect offensive to the neighbours or the public: Finds, in particular, that the proprietors of Dudhope Crescent, Watt's Court, and Seafield Square, are entitled to provide one ash-pit and necessary on each of these properties, for the exclusive use of the families occupying the several dwellings contained in these continuous ranges of building respectively: Finds it not alleged that the existing ash-pits and necessities provided for these continuous buildings respectively, are in any respect offensive to the neighbours or the public: Therefore, so far sustains the defences, and assolizies the defenders from the action, and decerns: Further, appoints the cause to be enrolled in the motion-roll in November, in order that the pursuer may be prepared to state if he wishes any inquiry to be directed, or any special judgment pronounced, as to other tenements or ranges of building set forth in his schedule: Finds neither party liable in the expenses hitherto incurred, and decerns.

"Note.—It is probable that some difference of opinion may arise as to the proper construction of the Police Act on which the present question turns, as it is expressed in terms calculated to give a plausible support to a plea contrary, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, to the object and probable meaning of the parties whose rights were meant to be provided for by the Statute at the time it was passed.

"This Act was passed so recently as July 1837. At that period it would appear from the schedules produced, that there were an unusual number of tenements or ranges of building belonging to proprietors in the suburbs, and beyond the old royalty of Dundee, which had been built for the occupation of artisans, or of tenants in the middle or more humble classes of society. It rather appears at present, that while proprietors within the old royalty of Dundee had been all along obliged to give their dung and refuse to the persons employed in the daily cleansing of the town, the proprietors beyond the royalty insisted on an exemption being made as to their case, and that they should be entitled to retain the manure made on their respective properties, if they provided an ash-pit and necessary not offensive to the neighbourhood or the public. From the very nature of the thing, the subject intended to be reserved must have been the dung, and the condition or precaution intended to be provided must have been, that any common dung-pit set apart for a multiplicity of tenants must be such as would not be offensive to the neighbourhood or the public. But under that limitation, it is rather thought that the Act is entitled to a liberal interpretation, so as to secure proprietors in the possession of the manure reserved to them by the Act.

"In another view, it may often be necessary, for the comfort and cleanliness of the neighbourhood, that proprietors should have a certain discretion and choice as to the place to be selected and used for the deposition of the dung of their tenants, living all in contiguity with each other. For instance, if the ranges in the neighbourhood of Dundee are similar to Holyroodhouse, or Milne Square, or St James' Court in Edinburgh, it would be rather unreasonable to hold that the proprietor of such buildings was bound to establish separate dung-pits, within a narrow space, for every range of floors inclosed within subdivision walls, when a common one for the whole court would be less offensive, and run less hazard of getting into disorder by being confined to one place, subject to the constant superintendence of all the parties interested.

"It has been contended that the term 'tenement,' used in the Statute, has reference rather to the size and form of the building, than to the fact of the proprietorship being vested in one owner, and that while dwellings consisting of a set of floors may be alienated to different proprietors, the portions thus given away would not lose the character of being still a part of the same original tenement; while, on the other hand, a party possessing originally one part of a range could not bring another part under the same tenement, by a subsequent purchase of another part of the range in contiguity with it. It is hardly thought, however, that there would be any difficulty in the practical adjustment of such cases. Undoubtedly, although the floor of any large tenement were alienated, it would still be viewed as a part of the original tenement in any question arising under this Act; but it is not very apparent that there would be any inconsistency, or any hazard to the public, in holding that any tenement, as built by the original owner, might be extended, either by a protraction of the building, or by a fresh purchase. The object of the Act, in relation to the matter in question, would probably be effectually attained when the same proprietor has the command of the whole of a continuous or enclosed range of building, and can thus compel his tenants to deposit their filth in such places as are most convenient for the occupants themselves, and least offensive to the public. That, however, is not the case before the Court in the present instance."

This interlocutor was brought under review by the pursuers on its merits, and by the defenders on the point of expenses.

At advising on the 23d January 1841,

Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle).—I am of opinion that the construction of the Statute contended for by the Police Commissioners is not warranted, and that the resolution complained of by the lessee is a diminution of the subject for which he bargained. By the present action, we are called on to find that he was a loser, and to give redress. It is said we cannot do this without making the inhabitants who are interested, parties to this suit; but we are not taking any thing from them: we are merely to declare the meaning of the Statute against the commissioners. The question is, what is the true construction of the term "tenement of land" occurring here in a local Act of Parliament? I go on the plain construction of that term on the face of the Statute and the context, which provides, first, for the case of a proprietor and his own family, then for tenants of a tenement belonging to one proprietor; but this cannot extend to pro indiviso proprietors, otherwise it would extend to joint-stock companies. We are not warranted, in my opinion, in applying it to whole crescents and squares containing hundreds of inhabitants. I do not go into considerations of cleanliness.

Lord Meadowbank.—I think the action properly brought, and that the lessee had a clear interest to get the matter determined. The resolution adopted by the commissioners materially abridged his right; and I think he was entitled to bring them into Court as the parties to the contract of lease. I throw out of view all considerations of cleanliness. The Act was passed on a joint agreement between those residing within the burgh, and those without. And the first declaration of the Statute is, that all fulzie within burgh belongs to the Police Commissioners. Those within burgh surrendered the whole of their fulzie, with a few exceptions; but the proprietors beyond burgh reserved the whole of theirs, except what was taken from them by the Statute. The Statute must consequently be interpreted favourably as to them. In property beyond a burgh, "tenement of land" means a place, and I would not put a restrictive meaning upon it, seeing there is an exclusive right to their fulzie in such proprietors.

Lord Medwyn.—The question is as to the construction of the term "tenement of land." The resolution of the commissioners has no reference to any previous agreement with the proprietors beyond the burgh. The construction put upon it by the commissioners was declared for the information of the public, and though not a regular bye-law, it had the effect of one. In my opinion, the construction is wrong. The derivation of the two expressions, land and tenement, can admit of no doubt,—the one being clearly referable to the use of the building erected on the land, and the other to the terra or ground on which it rested. And the synonymous use of the terms, land and tenement, may be traced through many of the older Statutes, and more early decisions of the Court. The term tenement of land means a house,—one building only, though consisting of different dwellings. Now, are these words used in this Act to comprehend crescents and streets? The exception applies, first, to proprietors, and second, to inhabitants of the same land; and it would be wide of the policy of the Act to extend it to crescents or joint-stock proprietors. As to whether the commissioners are the proper parties to the action, it is to be observed, that the conclusions are, in the first place, declaratory; and in such a question of general interest, individuals could not be good defenders. The commissioners voluntarily passed the resolution complained of when there were no parties claiming the exemption. Their scavengers, in consequence, stop collecting the fulzie, and I see no ground for holding that they are not the proper defenders—at least to the extent of the declaratory conclusions. They are parties to the contract, and withhold a part of the subject let. They must therefore be answerable, and make good the loss.

Lord Moncreiff.—The first question is as to the construction of the term "tenement of land," and is said to involve the interest of the pursuers to the amount of £1500; but the proprietors from whom the fulzie must be taken, have an interest precisely to the same extent. The second question is as to whether the commissioners are the proper defenders in the action. The pursuers require the Court to declare the construction of the term used in the Statute as preliminary to a claim of damages. If they be wrong in their construction, absolvitor follows. Now I think the Lord Ordinary and the Commissioners of Police have rightly interpreted the Statute, and that the pursuers are wrong. Attending to the whole clause, the purpose was to reserve the patrimonial rights of parties without the burgh, otherwise the Statute would not have been agreed to. I don't go into the etymology of the words, but I cannot hold that houses alone are carried by tenement of land. I go upon the fair meaning of the Act of Parliament; and there is a marked distinction between the exemption of all fulzie belonging to proprietors beyond burgh, and the limited reservation of it to those within. It shows that it was matter of agreement, and that it was only a limited effect which was intended by the Statute.—(Reads exceptions, § 112.) I give some weight to the opinion of the Commissioners and Police Magistrates, as having an interest the other way, and also having a personal acquaintance with the place. It is a delusion in comparing these buildings even to Holyroodhouse. Their utmost length is only seventy yards. Take James's Court,—say the north side, which is all under one roof, and belongs to the same proprietor,—is that not a tenement of land? Second, I doubt whether this action can go on to its conclusion in its present shape. The summons calls on us to declare the term "tenement of land" to be applicable only to a single dwelling-house, and does not extend to any square, range or angle of buildings, whether the same belong to one individual or body of individuals, or to many. In the second place, it concludes that the commissioners should be decreed to rescind their resolution, and to cause their scavengers to assist in collecting the fulzie; and on these, as rationes, it farther concludes for damages against the commissioners. Now, this assumes that the commissioners can compel the proprietors to submit to this collection, and is this to be decided in a declarator, without calling the proprietors? The commissioners and the lessee both stand in the same interest. Suppose the commissioners had published no opinion, and the proprietors had resolved to resist the collection, the action must have been raised by the proprietors against both commissioners and tenant. If the Court say that the commissioners are wrong, another action must arise with the proprietors, in which it may be found that the commissioners were right at first, and that neither they nor their tenant could disturb the patrimonial rights of the proprietors. This appears anomalous. The declarator must go for nothing against the proprietors, and yet you decide, ab ante, that the commissioners are liable in damages for presuming to have an opinion. Damages may be found due, and the lease at an end. And after all, when the commissioners demand fulzie from the proprietors, it would be no answer to their resistance, that the commissioners had obtained a construction of the Statute favourable to their right in an action between themselves and their own tenant. I think it doubtful whether the commissioners might pass a bye-law binding upon any one. They might control their own servants, and thereby the lessee may have incurred loss; but in recovering, I think that he must call the proprietors.

In consequence of this difference of opinion, an interlocutor was pronounced appointing minutes of debate, with a view to the pleadings being laid before the whole Judges for their opinion.

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges:

Lord Fullerton, Lord President (Boyle), Lords Gillies, Mackenzie, Murray and Ivory:

"We are of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be altered. It is there substantially found, that the term 'tenement of land,' employed in the 112th section of the Statute, and in the pursuer's lease, embraces 'squares, courts, or any continuous range of buildings erected by or belonging to one proprietor, or pro indiviso owners, and let out by them to separate tenants, whether separated by party-walls or not:' a construction for which we see no sufficient ground, and to the accuracy of which we cannot assent.

"The expression occurs in a Statute relating to the police of a burgh. It is evident from that circumstance, as well as from the context and from other passages of the Statute, that it is used to denote some limited portion of building: a sense in which it is well known, and in common use in Scotland. And however difficult it may be to define its limits with absolute precision, one thing is to us perfectly clear, that single or pro indiviso proprietorship, the circumstance referred to in the resolution of the Police Commissioners, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, forms no element of that definition. 'A land,' or 'tenement of land' is commonly, indeed most frequently, applied to buildings, which are not merely occupied by different families, but owned by different proprietors. And while the admission of this element would in many cases narrow the definition too much, it would lead to its most unconscionable extension in others. For the application of the term 'land,' or 'tenement of land,' to a range of houses, the side of a square, or a whole street, merely because they had been originally built, or had been subsequently acquired by one proprietor, is a novelty which we will venture to say, was never heard of before the resolution of these Police Commissioners.

"Proprietorship, then, may be thrown out of view as entirely irrelevant; and the true meaning must be sought for in the term itself, and in the circumstances of the buildings to which it is usually applied.

"Without entering minutely into any antiquarian inquiry, it seems to us sufficiently evident, from the passages quoted by the pursuers, that the expression 'tenement of land,' or 'land,' as applicable to houses or buildings in a town, arose naturally enough from the extension of the term 'land,'—the proper designation of the solum, to the superstructure; which formed, in the general case, the most important and valuable of the two component parts of the heritable possession. It clearly involves, then, the combination of the area or solum with the whole building erected upon it. And when the question is, what shall be held to be one 'tenement of land,' or the 'same tenement of land,' we see no more satisfactory answer, than that it is an area, or portion of solum, with its whole superstructure; that superstructure being such, that the area or solum does not, while the superstructure remains, admit of farther division or separation. It is 'one land,' or the same tenement of land,' because, from the arrangement of the building, there cannot well be any further division of the one area on which the building stands. And according to that view, we are disposed to adopt, as sufficient for all practical purposes, the description concluded for in the summons, viz., that the term is properly applicable 'to a single or individual building, although containing several dwelling-houses, with, it may be, separate means of access, but under the same roof, and enclosed by the same gables or walls.' And while we are disposed to adopt this affirmative part of the conclusion, we have still less doubt of the negative which follows, that it does not 'comprehend any square, range, or angle of buildings consisting of several houses completely divided from each other by party-walls and separate roofs, whether the same belong to one individual or body of individuals, or many.'

"Holding this opinion on the true construction of the disputed term employed in the 112th section of the Statute, and in the pursuer's lease, we do not feel the force of the supposed difficulty (suggested since the record was closed), of sustaining these conclusions, directed as they are against the Police Commissioners, and without calling any of the inhabitants interested in the exemption. That difficulty appears to us to be removed by the proceedings of the defenders which gave rise to the action, and by the particular nature of the action itself.

"The Statute contains, in the 112th section, a grant of certain rights to the Police Commissioners, under certain exceptions. The true extent of one of which exceptions, depends on the force of the term 'tenement of land.' The extent of the exception varies with the latitude or limitation of this term. The lease held by the pursuer conveys the rights vested in the Police Commissioners, under the exceptions repeated in the very terms of the 112th section of the Statute. And certainly, if matters had been left by the defenders to stand upon the words of the lease, an action by the lessee against them, for declaring the particular construction of the right at once most favourable to the lessee and the lessor, would have been a useless and incompetent proceeding. But matters were not so left by the defenders. A very short time after the lease was granted, by which the lessee was bound to pay a large rent, they, by their resolution of the 11th April 1838, chose to declare that a certain description of buildings should 'be reckoned as one tenement for the purposes specified in this part (the 112th section) of the Police Act;' a construction confessedly unfavourable to the lessee. And this resolution they, notwithstanding the protestations of the pursuer, finally adhered to and promulgated, as they themselves state in the defences, 'by a note inserted in the printed copies of the bye-laws which came into operation at Whitsunday 1838.'

"By this the defenders, under whose authority alone the rights made over to the pursuer by the lease could be exercised against the inhabitants, intimate to the public their view of the meaning and effect of a particular term in the Statute and the lease, by which the exemption available against the pursuer is materially extended, and her rights proportionally confined. Now, we entertain no doubt, that in these circumstances the pursuer, the lessee, had a good title and interest to declare the true meaning of the Statute and lease against the defenders, the lessors; and to demand the recal of that resolution, if she could show that it was erroneous. The defenders might have rescinded it if they chose; and then the question, quoad them, might have been put to rest. But if they refused, they could only refuse on the ground that their construction was the true one; so that there necessarily arose, between these two parties, an apt subject of legal discussion and adjudication. It may be at once useless and incompetent for a tenant to declare, in an action against his landlord, a favourable construction of the rights in which both have an interest. But if the landlord chooses to adopt a particular view of those rights, unfavourable to the tenant, and to act upon that construction, there seems no doubt, either of the reasonableness or competency of the tenant calling the landlord into Court, to defend his view of the extent of the lease, if he does not choose to recal those acts by which he has infringed it. For it seems to us that he must be held to have infringed it, and the implied warrandice contained in it, if he has wrongfully attempted to narrow its provisions, to the disadvantage of the tenant. The objection, that the judgment in this action may not form a res judicata against the inhabitants, and that therefore they ought to be called, is irrelevant. To support an action against one person or set of persons, it is not necessary that the judgment to be pronounced in it should be res judicata against all others who may plead the same principle in defence. The only point to be considered is, whether there is not a good ground of action between the pursuer and defenders, and we apprehend that, keeping in view the nature and object of the present action, demanding the recal of the resolution of the 11th April, and insisting for certain conclusions, supposed to be consequential on the refusal, the defenders are the parties and the only proper parties.

"What steps the pursuer might think proper to take against the inhabitants, if any of them adopted the construction of the Police Commissioners, it is unnecessary for us to inquire; but we can entertain no doubt, that the pursuer had a good title and interest to demand at once the recal of that resolution, which necessarily afforded the sanction of the commissioners to a resistance which otherwise never might have been thought of, and which the commissioners are bound to recal, unless they can show that it was warranted by the Statute.

"It is hardly necessary, in such a case, to resort to analogies; but one is too obvious to be overlooked. In the case of a lease of tolls by the trustees of a public road, it might happen that the trustees thought it their duty to adopt a particular view of one or more statutory exemptions, materially affecting the lessee's interest, and to promulgate that as their construction of their own and the tenant's rights. Can there be a doubt that the tackman would be entitled to ascertain, by declarator against the trustees, the true construction of the Statute; and could the objection be listened to, that no such action was admissible, unless he called into Court all those persons who might travel the road and might be called upon to pay? The same answer must, we think, be given in that case and in the present, viz., that whatever may be the result of a discussion with others, there is a good cause of action existing under this summons, as between the pursuer and defenders, on which the Court is bound to adjudicate.

"On these grounds, we think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be altered, and that decret ought to be pronounced in terms of the two leading conclusions of the libel,—the first declaring the meaning of the term 'tenement of land,' and the second calling on the defenders to rescind the resolution of the 11th April 1838, and to give the pursuer the usual assistance, and that, quoad ultra, the case ought to be remitted to the Lord Ordinary."

Lord Cockburn :

"I concur in this opinion, in so far as relates to the meaning of the term 'tenement of land,' and to the propriety of altering the interlocutor. But I do not see how the question of damages can be properly tried without calling the inhabitants, who are the only parties interested in maintaining that the fulzie belongs to them; and if they be right in this, no damage can be due, whatever judgment may be pronounced as between the parties now before the Court."

Lord Cuninghame :

"Notwithstanding the ample discussion which this case has lately undergone, I am constrained to adhere to the opinion expressed (as I now think with unnecessary limitations and caution) in my interlocutor and note of 20th July 1840.

"The question turns on the proper construction of the Police Act of the burgh, suburbs, and extended royalty of Dundee, passed in 1837, in its provision as to the dung, soil, and refuse of houses situated within the limits of the Act. By sect. 112, the whole filth of this description is vested in the Commissioners of Police, under certain specified exceptions enumerated in the Act, among which the following occurs:—'And also saving and excepting the whole dung, fulzie, soil, dirt, ashes and filth, from places situated beyond the boundaries of the ancient burgh of Dundee, belonging to any person having an ash-pit or necessary for the use or accommodation of his family, and for receiving the dung, fulzie, soil, ashes, and filth of such family exclusively, or belonging to any persons inhabiting the same tenement of land,' &c.

"The pursuer, as representing the lessee who took the police dung of the town of Dundee for three years from Martinmas 1838, has brought the present action to have it found and declared that the preceding exception applies only to the fulzie of tenements of houses contained within the same roof, and enclosed within the same gables and party-walls (see summons), and not to any lot or combination of houses built on the same 'tenement of land.' It now humbly appears to me, not only that the pursuer's plea is at variance with the plain language and object of the Statute, but that the exemption should have been expressed in wider terms than are used in the interlocutor of 20th July. That judgment was framed in reference to the peculiar pleas raised in the summons and defences, to which the argument of the parties in the Outer-House was in a great measure confined; while the later discussion before the Court has suggested a more careful examination of the Statute than the parties previously entered into.

"I. In the first place, it is thought that the words of the Statute are clear, positive, and unambiguous. When all persons inhabiting the same 'tenement of land' get a particular privilege, the import and extent of that right is, in the general case, as well understood in Scotland as in any other part of the empire. It is supposed clearly to comprehend, in the ordinary understanding of men of business and the public, at least the whole inhabitants of such properties as have been feued or leased out, or are otherwise held under the same proprietor,—and, without violence to the words, it may comprehend all inhabitants occupying houses which, at the date of their erection, were held under the same superior or mid-superior;—in short, it must include all who occupy houses which, by the act or arrangement of the proprietor, or immediate superior of the locality, form parts of the same heritable estate, or tenement of land, set apart for dwelling-houses, with their own peculiar and common pertinents.

"In fact, tenement is a term so common in its use, and so well understood in its import, that there seems to be little difference in the meaning attached to it, either in this country or in England. Blackstone says (B. II. chap. 2),—'Land comprehends all things of a permanent, substantial nature, being a word of a very extensive signification, as will presently appear more at large. Tenement is a word of still greater extent; and though, in its vulgar acceptance, it is only applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its original, proper, and legal sense, it signifies every thing that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature.' If that be the interpretation put on the word 'tenement' per se, it is clear that the legal import of the term 'tenement of land' must be still less ambiguous.

"It is contended that a different construction must be put upon the term under this Act of Parliament, as the words 'tenement' and 'land,' in the phraseology of the ancient Statutes of Scotland (as well as in the language of the common people at this day), generally refer to a single building, consisting of tiers of floors, occupied by separate families, covered with the same roof, and, in the language of the summons in this cause, 'enclosed by the same gables and walls.' But it humbly appears to me that there are insurmountable objections to this view of the clause. It is very true that in many of the ancient Statutes of Scotland relative to buildings within burgh, the words 'land' and 'tenement' were often used indiscriminately and synonymously to describe the large buildings inhabited by several families on each floor, which are so common in Scotch towns, and in many of the cities of the continent; but the Act of Parliament on which the present question is raised, is not a Scotch, but a British Statute, and it is expressed throughout in the modern language of the Legislature. Hence its terms must be judged of according to the present import of the words used, and not according to that of the ancient Scotch. I am not aware, indeed, that there is any instance since the Union, of any Statute, either general or local, having been passed in which the terms 'tenement' or 'land' has been used in the sense contended for by the pursuer.

"Besides, even if the most ancient and familiar dialect of Scotland were examined, it is not thought that the term 'tenement of land' would be found ever to have been in use to denote single buildings. A 'land' of houses was, and is to this day, a word in familiar use in Scotland,—and 'tenement' is a term equally well understood both in Scotch and English towns—but there does not appear to be an example, either in the ancient or colloquial language of Scotland, of a 'tenement of land' being used to denote a single 'tenement of building,' enclosed within the same gables or party-walls.

"II. In the next place, however, proceeding from mere words to the substance of the enactment, on which the question depends, it seems impossible to sanction the plea of the pursuer without doing great violence to the probable meaning and object of this clause of the Statute; which, it is rather thought, has not as yet been brought sufficiently into view. The object of the Act was to provide for a police, not only within the ancient town of Dundee, but within the whole district of the burgh, as recently extended under the Reform Act. This comprehends what is at present a large landward district, extending (as appears from the first clauses of the Police Statute) from the village of Lochee on the north-west, to the village of Broughty Ferry on the east. The parliamentary plan, which bears reference to these boundaries in the Reform Act, shows that this is a district comprehending some miles in point of extent, and of course must contain many 'tenements of land' belonging to different parties, bodies corporate, and others. These facts being indisputable, they afford, in my humble opinion, unerring criteria for the construction of the Statute here libelled on.

"It is not denied that the dung of the extended district was not vested in the Commissioners of Police prior to the Act. Under the Police Act, however, it was for the first time given to the Commissioners of Police, under large reservations, in favour of proprietors and private parties living in the extended district; and one of these was a reservation of the dung 'belonging to any persons inhabiting the same tenement of land' beyond the old burgh, provided only they had a necessary and ash-pit of their own, in a situation not used by others, nor offensive to the neighbourhood. Now, as this was a reservation of a common-law right of property previously belonging to the private parties, it must be construed as broadly as the words fairly admit. And construing this Act, as it must be interpreted, according to the nature and situation of the territory to which it applies, it humbly appears to me, that where the proprietors and inhabitants scattered over several thousand acres of a suburban and rural district, got the dung reserved belonging to all who inhabit the same 'tenement of land,' it must be understood that that term was used in the Statute in its most extensive, as well as in its legal and popular acceptance. In particular, it does not seem reasonable to hold that the term 'tenement of land' was used as synonymous with a single 'tenement of building,' which would have rendered the reservation of the least possible value to all inhabiting the neighbourhood and their successors.

"If a contrary interpretation were adopted, no parties living in the villages of Lochee or Broughty Ferry, or in any of the lands lying in the wide intermediate space, could claim the dung of any such property, which he had laid out in dwelling-houses with every suitable convenience in the places of his tenement, most satisfactory to the inhabitants, unless each house, enclosed within the same roof and walls, had a separate ash-pit. But construing the Act with reference to the situation and extent of the subjects to which it applies, the preceding construction does not appear to me to be consistent either with its letter or spirit.

"It is thought that we are not excluded, but bound in determining the legal import and extent of this, and of every Act of Parliament of the same kind, to look to the state of possession at the time it was passed, in explanation of the probable object and import of any part of the Statute that may be disputed. There have been produced in this cause, diagrams of five or six tenements of land in the extended district of Dundee, on which houses have been built with all the statutory pertinents, and it was added in debate, that there were hundreds of other tenements in similar circumstances within the extended police district. But if there be, and if the proprietors or inhabitants of these tenements had come forward and claimed their exemption in this Court as they did before the Police Commissioners, it is very difficult to see on what ground their claim could have been resisted. They inhabit the same 'tenements of land,'—there are established on each tenement, necessary and ash-pits satisfactory to the inhabitants, and these are 'not offensive to the public.' How then is it possible to refuse the benefit of the exemption to parties who are within every one condition of the Statute?

"In a case of this description, with deference, it appears to be out of the question to apply the limited construction to the term 'tenement' (even if that word stood alone), which might be reasonable, if the subject to which it applied stood in the midst of an old-built and crowded town. But that is not the case here. The whole tenements in the old part of Dundee (with certain trifling exceptions) were given over to the commissioners; and the reservations now under consideration were made to apply solely to the inhabitants of tenements of land situated in a district comprehending, of course, many houses and streets, but also applicable to a tract of country extending over miles of a suburban and rural district.

"Neither is there any authority in the other clauses of this Statute, to warrant the construction, that tenement of land does not mean a tenement of ground in its legal and ordinary sense. On the contrary, there is direct proof afforded by other clauses, to show that the framers of this Act did not use either the term 'tenement' or 'land' to express single buildings of successive tiers of floors. Thus, in section 119, as to cleansing the pavements, and in section 123, as to the supply of water into buildings occupied by separate tenants on each floor, such subjects are referred to, not as tenements or 'lands,' but as houses divided into separate floors. And then again, the term 'land' is also used in its modern and ordinary sense in section 163-168, and intervening clauses, giving the commissioners power to purchase 'all such lands, houses, tenements, and other heritages as may be necessary for the purposes of the Act.' In these sections, lands are obviously referred to in contradistinction from houses.

"On these grounds, I am humbly of opinion that the Commissioners of Police acted within their powers, when they declared that 'any square, range, or angle of buildings in the extended royalty, belonging to one proprietor, or joint pro indiviso proprietors, having one common ash-pit and necessary, so as to enable the inhabitants to provide, as at present, for their convenience, comfort or cleanliness, shall be reckoned as one tenement, for the purposes specified in this part (section 112) of the Act.' It humbly appears to me, that the inhabitants of houses even disjoined, if built on the same tenement of land, and possessed of a suitable ash-pit and other conveniences, are entitled to retain their own dung and ashes; and multo majus must dwelling-houses be exempted, which are continuous and built on the same property, and so fall within the cautious regulation of police complained of in this summons."

Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.

At advising the cause of this date,

Lord Meadowbank.—I adhere to my former opinion.

Lord Medwyn.—I retain my opinion.

Lord Moncreiff.—I retain my opinion, and concur with Lord Cuninghame in thinking, that tenement of land is used in this Statute different from its ordinary sense. I remain also of opinion, that the mode of trying the question is incompetent. The commissioners may have to pay damages to the extent of £1500, and on again letting the subject, it may be found that they have no right to let it. The case of the toll-bar is different,—the right of way belongs to all the world; but here the question is as to heritable property, and the Police Commissioners are proceeding to try it with their own tenant, without calling the party having the real interest.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be altered. As to the necessity of calling the inhabitants, the commissioners let the fulzie under the Act—they retained the power of cleaning in their own hands, and also the control over the scavengers. The summons says that the fulzie can only be collected through their assistance. This the pursuer must prove. But if a landlord publicly declares that he has no right to part of the property which he has let to his tenant, the tenant is entitled to proceed against him. The commissioners appear as contradictors; and this of itself raises the right of the pursuer to have the extent of his right declared. In the second place, he is entitled to have declared the extent of assistance to which he is entitled from the scavengers. He is entitled to these findings as matter of pleading,—in the first place, to make his claim against the commissioners, and in the second place, to clear his title against third parties. As to the claim of damages, that is for the jury.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In respect of these opinions, alter the interlocutor complained of: Find, and decern, and declare, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the libel, as to the meaning of the term 'tenement of land,' and find the defenders bound to give the pursuer the aid and assistance incumbent on them under the contract of lease: Quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause: Find expenses due to the pursuers, from the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and also remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly; reserving other claims of expenses till the conclusion of the cause."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 70.—THOMAS ROBERTSON, Raiser, v. LIEUT.-COL. JOHN GORDON and ALEXANDER MILLAR, Claimants.

Bankrupt—Sequestration—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 41—Diligence—Arrestment—Assignment—Competition—In a competition in a process of multiplepointing, the trustee in the sequestration of a deceased debtor preferred to a creditor who had used arrestment, and obtained an assignment in security in the debtor's lifetime.

James John Fraser, W.S., having certain claims against James Earl of Fife, used arrestments in the hands of his Lordship's tenants on the estate of Carreston. Afterwards, in July 1830, Mr Fraser, by a deed bearing to be for onerous causes, but said to be merely in trust for his own behoof, assigned these claims, with the arrestments, to Mr Hugh Macqueen, W.S. The tenants brought a process of multiplepointing, and in 1833 decree was pronounced preferring Mr Macqueen to the fund in medio, amounting to £113. 14s. 1d.

In August 1830, Colonel Gordon of Cluny brought an action of count and reckoning against Mr Fraser; but after the action had been some time in dependence, an agreement was entered into, by which the parties consented to a judicial reference, and Mr Fraser assigned to Colonel Gordon, "in security of any balance" which might be found due to him, the sum of £500, of the first and readiest parts of a sum of £500 and upwards, said to be due to Mr Fraser by Mr Hugh Macqueen. In July 1838, an award which had been pronounced by the referees, finding a sum exceeding £18,000 to be due to Colonel Gordon, became final. On 12th February 1839, Colonel Gordon, in virtue of this award, used arrestments in the hands of Mr Thomas Robertson, accountant, who had been appointed judicial factor on the estate of Carreston, and on the 14th, Mr Robertson raised a process of multiplepointing, in which the fund in medio was stated to amount to £128. 10s. 6d., being the sum of £113. 14. 1. which had been found due by the tenants of Carreston, with the interest which had accrued upon it since the date of the decree. In this process appearance was made by Colonel Gordon, who claimed to be preferred in virtue of the arrestments, and of the assignment in security which he had obtained on agreeing to the judicial reference. On the 3d of June 1839, during the dependence of this process, Mr Fraser died, and, in April 1840, his estates, as those of a deceased debtor, were sequestrated under the recent Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41. Mr Alexander Millar, S.S.C., having been appointed trustee, entered appearance in the process of multiplepointing, and claimed to be preferred to the fund in medio, in virtue of the 78th section of the Statute, which enacts, "that the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt, wherever situated, so far as attachable for debt, shall, by virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee, be transferred to, and vested in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title and interest, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained, or intimation made at that date, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible."

In opposition to this claim Colonel Gordon pleaded, that this section of the Bankrupt Act "cannot be construed as entitling the trustee on a sequestrated estate to uplift funds belonging to the bankrupt which had been previously attached by the diligence of arrestment, or vested in an assignee before the common debtor was rendered bankrupt; and there is no principle of expediency for extending the provision of the Statute, as contended for by Mr Fraser's trustee."

The Lord Ordinary, "at the request of both parties, and in respect of the difficulty and importance of the point at issue, as expressed by the Court in the analogous case of Lindsay v. Paterson, 10th July 1840," appointed the parties to prepare mutual cases for the First Division of the Court.

Pleaded by Colonel Gordon—

The recent Bankrupt Statute has only a prospective, and not a retrospective effect. It was to come into operation "from and after the end of the present session of Parliament" (1839), whereas the securities on which the claim of preference is founded, existed long before that date. The trustee does not plead that these securities are null and reducible, to the effect of entitling Fraser's other creditors to a share of the fund in medio, and in the absence of such a plea, it is not easy to discover on what grounds he can resist decree in the multiplepointing in favour of the present claimant. The bankrupt himself could not have objected to the securities, or to a warrant and decree in an action of forthcoming or distribution founded on them. The process of multiplepointing is similar in its nature and effects to such an action; and if the bankrupt could not have resisted it, his trustee, who is only a subsequent assignee, cannot plead a higher right than would have been competent to his cedent. The clause of the Statute on which the trustee founds, does not support his claim. First, it is only in "so far as attachable for debt" that the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt are to be transferred to the trustee. But the present fund in medio was not properly attachable for any debt but that of the present claimant,—for, (1.) it was formally assigned, and (2.) it was arrested by a legal diligence, subject to no intrinsic nullity. Again, the Act provides, that the transference and vesting in the trustee shall be "for behoof of the creditors absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration." In the present instance, it is impossible for the trustee to maintain that there was vested in him an absolute and irredeemable right to this fund for the behoof of the creditors generally. Again, the Act confers on the trustee, right, title and interest only, "to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained, or intimation made at that date" (of sequestration). But if the transference takes place only as at this date, the trustee cannot compete, for payment or possession, with creditors or assignees who have secured possession, or hold securities intimated at an earlier date. Accordingly, the transference and vesting in the trustee is expressly declared to be "subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible." On the interpretation of the Act contended for by the trustee, not only will the present claimant be compelled to place himself as a creditor claiming under the sequestration, and submit his claim of preference to the party actually opposing it in the present litigation; but, on the same principle, every person holding a security resulting from possession or right of lien, will be obliged to act in the same way;—in other words, will be obliged to deliver up his security to the trustee, and betake himself to a remedy subject to all the risks and consequences attending a claim on a sequestrated estate. It is impossible to believe that this can be the fair construction of the Statute. The case of Lindsay v. Paterson, on which the trustee rests his claim of preference, does not bear it out. In that case the species facti were essentially different from the present, and the opinions, in so far as they appear favourable to the trustee's claim, can only be regarded as obiter dicta. (1.) In that case there was no regular or proper process of competition between the parties. The question came before the Court by a summary application, reported on cases from the Bill-Chamber, to have a Scotch banking company, who had petitioned for the sequestration, interdicted from following forth a separate process in England in the Lord Mayor's Court. (2.) The attachment founded on by the bank was within sixty days of the sequestration, and was, in this respect, essentially different from the securities of the present claimant. 3. It was pleaded there, and is not pleaded here, that the securities are null and reducible. On these grounds, the trustee can derive no aid from that decision.

Pleaded by the trustee—

The obvious meaning of the 78th section of the Statute is, that the bankrupt's effects, wherever situated, shall be transferred to the trustee, and vested in him, subject always to existing preferable securities which are not null and reducible. If, after the vesting, Colonel Gordon shall establish a preference, the trustee, in his judicial capacity, will at once give effect to it; or, if he refuse, speedy redress will be obtained by a summary complaint to the Court. It is thus impossible that any substantial damage can be sustained by any creditor claiming a preference. But, even if it were otherwise, the trustee is not called upon to discuss the expediency of the provisions in the Statute. If these provisions exist, effect must be given to them. The case of Lindsay v. Paterson is directly in point; and the fact that it has not been appealed, notwithstanding of the ample means of the litigants, leads to the inference, that the question, as decided, does not admit of the slightest doubt. The judgment was unanimous, and was adopted on the express ground that the 78th section of the Statute did not admit of any other interpretation. But it is said, that to sustain the trustee's claim, would be to give the Statute a retrospective effect in the face of a direct provision in it to the contrary. This argument evidently proceeds on a misinterpretation. It is true that all sequestrations awarded prior to 1839, were to be carried through under the former Statute; but it is also true, that all sequestrations awarded subsequent to that date, were to fall under the new Statute. The present sequestration was so awarded. In fact, it could not have been awarded otherwise,—the estate being that of a debtor deceased. On the view taken by Colonel Gordon, there could be no competent sequestration of the estates of a debtor who died before 1839; but the contrary has been already decided more than once. Newall's Trustees, June 13, 1840. Case of Aichison, same date.

The cause being advised,

Lord President.—After giving all the attention in my power to the present case, I am unable to see anything in the specialities of it to distinguish it from the case of Paterson. I think it clear that the trustee has put the right construction on the 78th section of the Statute. If Colonel Gordon has a good ground of preference, effect will be given to it; or if the trustee adopt an erroneous construction, he will be corrected by the Court. To decide differently from the case of Paterson, would, in my opinion, just be to run in the face of the Act of Parliament.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find the claimant, Alexander Millar, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of James John Fraser, the common debtor, entitled, under the 78th section of the Bankrupt Statute, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, to the fund in medio, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible, and rank and prefer the said trustee accordingly; and grant warrant to, and authorise and ordain the cashier of the Royal Bank of Scotland to pay over the fund in medio, consigned in said Bank, to the said trustee, with interest since the date of consignment, and authorise the clerk, custodian of the deposit-receipt, to deliver up the same to the trustee, and decern."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 71.—COLIN M'ARTHUR and THOMAS GEMMILL, Pursuers, v. JOHN MELVIL M'ARTHUR, Defender,—Et è contra.

Process—Jurisdiction—Heir-Apparent—Foreign—A foreigner having right, as heir-apparent, to an heritable estate in Scotland, is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, though he has neither taken possession nor made up any title. Jurisdiction—Foreign—Question, Whether the Scots Courts have jurisdiction over a foreigner, where the forum originis, locus contractus, and locus solutionis are Scotch?

In January 1817, the estates of Robert Macfarlane and Company, carrying on business as merchants at Greenock, and of Robert Macfarlane as an individual residing there, were sequestrated. The other partners of the company were Benjamin Scott and John Melvil M'Arthur, both resident abroad,—the former in Newfoundland, and the latter in the island of St Vincent. Owing to the foreign domicile of these partners the sequestration was not extended to them as individuals. Duncan M'Arthur, senior, the brother of John Melvil M'Arthur, and also resident in St Vincent, was ranked in the sequestration for a debt of £3061. 2. 6., constituted by three promissory-notes for £530, £531. 2. 6., and £2000, granted to him by Macfarlane and Company on the 14th October 1816, and payable—the first on the 31st December 1816, the second three months after date, and the third on the 1st July 1822. After certain dividends had been paid from the sequestrated estate, an arrangement was entered into in 1828, by which Robert Macfarlane, on a payment of a certain sum to the creditors for his behoof, obtained his discharge, both as an individual and as a partner of the company.

Duncan M'Arthur, senior, died in 1835, leaving a deed of settlement in favour of his natural son, Duncan M'Arthur, junior, and Jacob Kladen, of the island of St Vincent. From the want of proper dispositive words this deed was ineffectual to carry heritage in Scotland, and consequently, a small property which had belonged to him at Dunoon remained in his hereditas jacens—the person entitled to succeed to it being John Melvil M'Arthur, his heir-at-law. In 1836, Duncan M'Arthur, junior, as sole surviving executor of his father, brought an action for payment of the balance of the debts ranked in the sequestration of Robert Macfarlane and Company. This action was directed against the company, and against Robert Macfarlane and John (Melvil) Mac-

VOL. XIV.—No. IX.

Arthur, the only surviving partners, as individuals,—the summons of constitution setting forth with regard to the latter, who was still abroad, that he had succeeded to heritable property in Scotland (meaning the above property at Dunoon), and was subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, as the proprietor of such heritable property. Macfarlane, founding upon his discharge, intimated that he would lodge defences, unless the conclusions against him as an individual were withdrawn; and a minute withdrawing these conclusions having been lodged, decree in absence was pronounced in January 1837 against Macfarlane and Company, and against John Melvil M'Arthur as an individual.

Duncan M'Arthur, junior, in whose favour this decree was pronounced, died at St Vincent in July thereafter, and Colin M'Arthur and Thomas Gemmill, his trustees and executors, in virtue of the decree, arrested certain funds of John Melvil M'Arthur in the hands of the Renfrewshire Banking Company and others, and thereafter brought an action of forthcoming. John Melvil M'Arthur, on the other hand, brought a reduction of the decree—pleading, inter alia, that “he ought to be reponed against it in integrum, because the decree was obtained against him in absence of his procurator, and when he was not only quite unaware of the proceedings which had been instituted against him, but had been afforded no opportunity whatever of becoming acquainted either with their institution or progress; because, while the said decree proceeds against him as being furth of Scotland, no arrestment was used jurisdictionis fundandæ causa; and although it is assumed in the summons under which the decree was pronounced, that he was proprietor of an heritable estate in Scotland, it is not true that he was so, in the sense at least, and to the effect of subjecting him to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. He was not then, and is not yet, vested in any heritable property whatever in Scotland; although he admits that he has a claim to certain heritable subjects of no great value, which he may perhaps deem it expedient to assert and clothe with a title. In the meantime, these heritable subjects form part of the hereditas jacens of the pursuer's brother, Duncan M'Arthur, senior, and may or may not, according to circumstances, be taken up by the pursuer.”

The processes of forthcoming and reduction having been conjoined, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor disposing of the above preliminary defence:

“6th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the record in these conjoined actions of forthcoming and reduction, and thereafter considered the processes and productions, Finds that it is proper that the objections urged by the alleged debtor, John Melvil M'Arthur, to the decree of constitution in absence obtained against him in this Court in July 1837, at the instance of Duncan M'Arthur, junior, then of St Vincents, now deceased, should, in so far as preliminary, be now disposed of, before considering the other pleas of the parties on the merits either in the reduction or forthcoming: Therefore, in the first place, with respect to the jurisdiction of this Court to pronounce the said decree of constitution, Finds that it was set forth in the summons which preceded that decree, that the whole debts sued for were contracted in 1815 and 1816, by a company, of which the said John M'Arthur was a partner, then carrying on business in Greenock and so were repayable there; that the said company had been sequestrated in Scotland, and the sums pursued for ranked therein: Finds farther, that it was alleged in the summons of constitution that the debtor had right to a landed property in Scotland, which property, it is averred in the present record, belonged to his deceased brother, and has for five years and upwards been claimable solely by the said John M'Arthur, as the late proprietor's apparent heir, and has not, in point of fact, been claimed by any other heir: Finds that the preceding facts being now established, either by the public records or by explicit averments on the record of this cause, admitted or not denied, it follows in point of law, that this Court had sufficient jurisdiction to entertain the said action of constitution, and to pronounce decree therein, if not obviated by other objections either to the form or merits of the process, of which the Court fell to take cognisance in common form; and so far repels the third reason of reduction, and decerns. In the second place, with reference to the title of the pursuer of the action of constitution, Finds, that as the claims pursued for belonged to Duncan M'Arthur, senior, of Dunoon, they fell to be liquidated by Duncan M'Arthur, junior, of St Vincents, pursuer of the action of constitution, as the only surviving executor of the original creditor, and therefore, that the said Duncan M'Arthur, junior, and his mandatories, had an undoubted title to raise that action: Farther, repels the other objections, in point of form, to the regularity of the decree of constitution: But in respect the alleged debtor objects to the balance claimed on the merits, and farther urges claims of compensation against the original creditor, while he farther urges pleas not only against the title of the pursuers of the forthcoming, but against the diligence of the creditor, on the ground that the funds in the hands of the arrestees were entirely derived from parties who expressly excluded such diligence, at the instance of the creditors of John M'Arthur, whose allegation is not admitted,—Before farther answer on these and on the other points of the cause, remits the process, with the whole productions therein, to Mr William Moncreiff, accountant in Edinburgh, to examine the whole accounts and vouchers of the parties, and to call for such additional documents as he may think necessary, and to report,—1st, Whether the balance claimed and decreed for under the decree of constitution be sufficiently vouched, and still unpaid, in whole or in part, by the defender John M'Arthur, and to what extent, if any, the same has been compensated by vouched counter claims on the part of the original debtor; 2d, Whether the whole of the special legacies and burdens left by the will of Duncan M'Arthur, senior, of Dunoon, have been paid, and whether the sums pursued for, if due, belong to the residuary estate of that party; 3d, From what source the funds now in the hands of the arrestees were remitted to them, and on what title or terms they hold the same, so as to enable the Court to ascertain how far the creditors of John M'Arthur are entitled to attach the same; and generally, to report on any other points that can be ascertained from the accounts and documents produced or recoverable, which either party may suggest as material to any pleas on record, not now disposed of, on which they mean still to insist: Farther, grants diligence against havers for recovery of such writs as the accountant may require for the elucidation of the points now at issue; and grants commission to the said William Moncreiff to take the depositions of the havers, to be reported on or before the day of next: Reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses.

“Note.—Since this case was before the Court in the summer session of 1840, on a reclaiming note as to the preliminary pleas (which was remitted to the Outer-House for farther discussion), a record has been made up on the whole cause, including both the preliminary and peremptory pleas; and after a very full and able argument from both parties, the preceding judgment has been pronounced, disposing of the objection to the jurisdiction, and to the form of the decree of constitution, but superseding consideration of the other pleas on the merits of the claim, and on the pursuers' title to insist in the forthcoming, till certain investigations are made by an impartial person skilled in figures and accounts, which has been directed in the close of the interlocutor.

“On the question of jurisdiction, the debtor's case was argued as if the creditor held him to be amenable to the Scots Court solely, ratione originis; and if so, the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of Grant and Pedie (1 Wils. and Sh. p. 716), would be decisive against the jurisdiction. But the Lord Ordinary holds the nativity of the debtor to be the least material element in the present case. The admitted facts of his being a member of a Scots copartnery which contracted the debt in Scotland, and of course became bound to repay it here—and of that company being sequestered and still undischarged, are all specialties which, independent of the defender's origin, go far to show that the Scots Court was the proper forum for the constitution of the claim contained in the decree now under challenge.

“The House of Lords reversed the decision of this Court in Grant's case, merely because it proceeded on the forum originis alone;—according to which ratio, all parties who have left Scotland animo remanendi, including natives, who, like the first Lord Mansfield and Admiral Greig, have never indicated any intention to return, and may not have set a foot in Scotland for sixty years, would still be held amenable to our Courts for all their transactions, wherever concluded. That was viewed as a very startling and unreasonable doctrine, not founded in modern law and custom, and therefore was rejected in Grant's case as sufficient per se to found jurisdiction. But the Lord Chancellor (Eldon), on remitting Grant's case to this Court for further discussion, carefully reserved consideration of a creditor's right to sue a party who had left the forum contractus before paying his debt;—and Mr Ivory, in his edition of Erskine, has an excellent note on this subject (Vol. I. p. 36–38), which tends strongly to support the competency of the jurisdiction ex contractu, more especially when combined with birth and other specialties, to which it is sufficient to refer.

“The chief and overruling peculiarity, however, in the present case, is to be found in the fact set forward on the face of the summons of constitution,—that the debtor has heritable property in Scotland, which of itself would be sufficient to found jurisdiction, even if the debt had been contracted abroad. This is a fact in the case which has been satisfactorily elucidated since the preliminary pleas were argued in the Inner-House. It is now established that there is a property at Dunoon, to which the debtor has right as apparent heir of his brother. The fact of there being such a property is admitted. The fact of his apparency is also admitted; but the debtor adds, that he has never yet taken up, or entered into possession of that property. —See revised condescendence, art. 33, and answer thereto.

“Now, the Lord Ordinary conceives these admissions to be decisive of the question of jurisdiction. By a well-known ancient Statute (1621, cap. 27), every creditor of an apparent heir is entitled to attach the property of a defunct for the heir's debt; and the decree of constitution here was absolutely necessary, as a step, inter alia, to entitle the creditor to charge the heir, and attach that estate for his debt, in terms of the Statute.

“As to the plea of the debtor, that he has not yet taken corporal possession of the estate, it is sufficient to answer, that he cannot renounce it or remain out of possession to the prejudice of his creditor. The latter has right by Statute to attach it, as the estate of the heir; and it must be competent to the creditor to take a decree of constitution, as a necessary preliminary to a special charge and decree of adjudication. The creditors, accordingly, since obtaining the decree of constitution, have executed a special charge (condescendence, art. 33,) against John M^r Arthur, as a step to adjudication; they required no general charge to entitle them to constitute their debt, as they sued the apparent heir for his own debt, and not for that of his ancestor. Had the action related to a claim against the defunct proprietor, the heir would have been entitled to a general charge before the constitution, because, till such a charge was given, the creditor could cite no living party as liable for the debt; and the general charge is necessary to ascertain the representation of the deceased debtor. In that case also, the heir charged is entitled to renounce the representation, and thereafter the creditor can only obtain decree cognitionis causa. But no such course is necessary, or indeed competent, when the creditor is suing for the debt of the apparent heir himself. The latter cannot defeat or delay his creditor's attachment, by repudiating a property to which the law enables both him and his creditor, by a simple and appropriate course of proceedings, to expedite a complete feudal title.

“It was contended farther, on the part of the debtor, that the jurisdiction of this Court, if sustained to the effect of enabling the creditor to attach the heritable estate claimable by the heir, ought not to go beyond it, so as to validate a decree of constitution to any amount. But it does not appear that such an objection is agreeable to our practice in any analogous cases. If a creditor can find any moveable sum, however trifling, belonging to a foreign party, in the hands of a Scots custodian, to warrant an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, the existence of such a lien has been invariably held sufficient to validate a decree of constitution before our courts to any amount,—nay, as exemplified in the case of Douglas, 30th June 1831, the Court will not inquire nicely into the amount or value of the fund arrested, to support critical objections to the jurisdiction. On the same principle, and a fortiori, must there be available jurisdiction in our courts, when there is a real estate within the territory of Scotland (which, for aught that appears, may be worth a very considerable sum), to enable the creditor to enforce the decree of constitution when pronounced.

“The same principle is sufficient to support the jurisdiction of the Court in both cases. Although the Court has no jurisdiction, in many instances, against parties domiciled abroad, these may be cited edictally when a pursuer can show that the citation is not asked capriciously and without cause, but to enforce an attachment of property, or funds heritable or moveable, within the forum of the Court. Moveable goods or funds require an arrestment to fix them: but obviously a landed estate requires no such actus. The power of the Court to enforce the decree to an available effect being ascertained, the competency of the jurisdiction to take cognisance of the debt becomes indisputable. The Court is not limited by the amount of the fund attached, as the decree cannot be pro parte good and pro parte bad. The Judge is entitled, and bound to take cognisance of the whole debt, to see how far diligence, to any extent, should proceed on it. This, however, imposes no hardship on the debtor. If he has notice of the proceedings, he can, of course, show how far the claim is unjust; and if decree passes for the time in absence, it is open to him afterwards to object to it in whole, or to such extent as he can prove it to be unjust or unwarranted. But he cannot maintain that the constitution of a debt taken out before a tribunal which has jurisdiction at least over a part of the debtor's property, is to all effects null and void.

“On the other objections, in point of form, to the decree of constitution under reduction, there was little debate at present before the Lord Ordinary. The parties relied generally on the argument delivered when the preliminary defences were debated, and it is sufficient for the Lord Ordinary to refer to the interlocutor and note which he then issued, if the objections in question should be repeated.

“The other pleas of the parties, it is thought, cannot be satisfactorily determined till the real state of the facts is ascertained on matters as to which the parties are much at variance. The remit made by the Lord Ordinary will probably so elucidate the case, as to supersede several of the questions on which the parties are at present at issue.”

John Melvil M^r Arthur reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Fullerton.—The points raised and insisted in between these parties, which may properly be considered as preliminary, are—1st, Whether there was jurisdiction in this Court to sustain the action of constitution in 1836, and the forthcoming now in dependence? and, 2dly, Whether, supposing these questions to be determined in the affirmative, the pursuers of the forthcoming have a sufficient title to maintain the action?

The Lord Ordinary appears to have reserved this latter point; and in the argument which we have heard, the parties have acquiesced in that reservation, and have confined themselves to the question of jurisdiction.

The objection to it is founded on the circumstance, that John M^r Arthur, the defender both in the constitution 1836, and the forthcoming, though a Scotsman by birth, had left Scotland for several years, at the date even of the first of these actions,—had permanently established himself in the island of St Vincent,—and never returned to this country.

On the other hand, it was contended that the defender, though in St Vincent at the date of the constitution and since, was a partner of a Scotch company which was sequestrated,—that that sequestration, quoad the defender, was then in dependence,—and that the debts pursued for in that action of constitution were debts due by the company and the individual partners, of which Scotland was the locus contractus as well as the locus solutionis,—and that, besides, the defender had heritable property in Scotland, inasmuch as he had succeeded to such estate though he had not completed a title to it.

In regard to the place of birth, it is now fixed by the judgment in the case of Grant v. Pedie, that that is not sufficient to found jurisdiction. No doubt, in that case, the Lord Ordinary had, in sustaining the jurisdiction, combined that circumstance with another, viz., that “the contract, or obligation on which the contract proceeds, took place in Scotland.” But the Court went entirely and solely on the ratio originis; and the House of Lords, reversing that judgment, remitted the case, with directions to the Court of Session to consider whether jurisdiction could be sustained on the grounds mentioned in the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, or on any other grounds appearing in the pleadings, “other than those founded on the domicilium originis.”

Now, it farther appears to me that this judgment went substantially to exclude the mere domicilium originis from the circumstances on which the jurisdiction could be founded. It reversed expressly the interlocutor of the Court sustaining the domicilium originis. The remit applied only to the grounds mentioned in the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, or stated in the pleadings, other than the domicilium originis,—not combined with the domicilium originis, which would have been the terms of the remit, if it had not been intended to discard that point altogether from the elements of the case. Certainly that judgment leaves the question open, whether the locus contractus and locus solutionis may not found jurisdiction by the law of this country? Only, in regard to the latter, it must be kept in view, that in this case it is not express: it is only inferred from the locus contractus. It was expressly admitted by the counsel for the pursuer, that the action of constitution was laid, not on the bills, but on the debt due by the company and the defender, the individual member of the company. There is no question here, then, as to the locus solutionis, except as inferred from the locus contractus. For it is undoubted that Scotland was the place where the debt was contracted.

Now, certainly, some of the older authorities support this ground of jurisdiction. But it is quite unnecessary now to examine those decisions; because, in this matter, any authority which they might otherwise be entitled to, is entirely destroyed by the last decision on the very point, pronounced on consultation of the whole Court,—I mean the decision in the case of Wylie v. Laye, 11th July 1834. That was a declarator of marriage, in which the facts supposed to constitute the alleged marriage had taken place in Scotland. The defender, an Englishman, objected to the jurisdiction; and it would seem, that of all supposable cases, marriage was that in which, from the peculiarity of the contract, the locus contractus would have the strongest effect in supporting jurisdiction. But the opinion of the consulted Judges, concurred in by the Judges of the Second Division, on this point, was,—“That the locus contractus does not lay a foundation for a jurisdiction over a foreigner, unless he has been cited in this country, or, in some cases, unless his funds have been arrested jurisdictionis fundanda causa.” It is true that there the defender was held not to be a Scotsman by birth. But looking at the terms of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Grant v. Pedie, I think that whatever may be the case in questions of status, in a question of mere pecuniary obligation, the circumstances of the place of birth and locus contractus combined, cannot have any stronger effect than when existing separately.

There is, however, one other circumstance in this case which may be noticed here, viz., the sequestration of the company of which the defender was a member. But that cannot raise any question, considering the facts which are averred and admitted in the record. It appears that the sequestration was not directed against the defender at all—(See articles 14, 15 and 18 of condescendence and answers). It was confined to the company, and Macfarlane as an individual; and, secondly, it appears that, long before the constitution was raised, the whole sequestrated funds had been divided among the creditors, Macfarlane as an individual discharged, and the sequestration substantially wound up. As, however, the company was not discharged, and the present defender, as an individual, was no party to the sequestration, he of course remained liable for the unpaid debts of the company. But still the sequestration, which neither called him as an individual, nor localized in Scotland any property in which he had either a direct or contingent interest, could have no effect in sustaining jurisdiction against him in his individual character.

I do not think that that jurisdiction could be sustained against the defender on any of the grounds hitherto alluded to. The only point remaining, is the effect of the heritable property belonging to him in Scotland.

The fact is admitted by the defender, that he had succeeded to a small property at Dunoon by the death of his uncle,—that he had right to it as heir-apparent; but it is said that he has never made up a title to it, nor possessed it; and the question is, whether this failure to exercise the rights of heir (for he has never positively renounced them), has taken off the effect in sustaining jurisdiction, which would otherwise be the consequence of holding heritable property in Scotland?

The question is, in so far as I know, new; but upon looking at the points which are held fixed in this branch of our practice, and the principles necessarily involved in them, I think the question ought to be decided in the negative, and that the jurisdiction put on this ground ought to be sustained.

In the first place, I understand it to be fixed, that absolute possession, or completed vested right to an heritable estate in this country, does found jurisdiction, and that not limited merely to actions regarding the property itself, but generally in regard to all actions of a merely pecuniary nature. I do not understand it to be disputed, that if the defender had made up titles, and possessed this small property, the action of constitution, for however large a sum, could not have been questioned on the score of jurisdiction. The same rule applies in the case of arrestments jurisdictionis fundanda causa. The jurisdiction so founded is not limited to the subject or funds arrested: it too is general, and will sustain pecuniary actions to any amount.

These considerations, of themselves, afford an answer to the arguments ad absurdum so strongly pressed on the part of the defender. For the very same consequences will be found to follow in those cases which were represented as fatal to the pretensions of the pursuer here. If the vested right to a small heritable property supports jurisdiction, not merely in relation to the property itself, but generally, the smallness of the property here may be considered as entirely irrelevant. And when it is urged, that in this way a man, by succeeding to some trifling property in Scotland, may, in entire ignorance, be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts of, to him, a foreign country, does not the same inconvenience or incongruity hold, and still more strongly, in the case of arrestment jurisdictionis fundanda causa? A party is much less likely to be constantly aware of the motions of all his debtors, than that one has succeeded to an heritable property. Yet if one of his debtors removes to Scotland, an arrestment jurisdictionis causa will unquestionably subject him to the jurisdiction of our Courts, whether he may have been aware of the circumstance or not. And it will be at once seen, that the supposed inconvenience is rather apparent than real. For, first, it is always a question for the courts of his own domicile, how far they will give effect to any judgment pronounced against him by the courts of another country. And, secondly, even in Scotland where the judgment is pronounced, and where alone it decrees effect, it is not conclusive: it is but a decree in absence, against which the party may, when any attempt is made to put it in force, raise, in the form of a reduction, all the objections which he could have urged as defences if he had originally appeared. Accordingly, that is done here by the defender; and the only question is, not whether the decree of constitution shall be held conclusive of the amount and subsistence of the debt, but whether it shall be held absolutely null, as pronounced without jurisdiction. I think this point is not at all touched by the supposed inconveniences of possible ignorance, and similar contingencies. It must be tried as if the present defender had appeared and pleaded to the jurisdiction in the original action.

Now, in considering the effect of the speciality here—I mean the defender's omission or failure to exercise his rights as heir,—we must look at the principle on which jurisdiction is sustained in the cases already alluded to. It does not, and cannot rest on the more limited principle of jurisdiction, ratione rei sitæ. For, by our law, it is in such cases not confined to the property or funds, which are naturally, or by force of arrestment, fixed within the territory. If a man has a small estate here, or has a trifling debt owing him by a Scotch debtor, that will support jurisdiction in general against him. The only principle which I am aware of, then, is, that there being a subject of any value, however small, within the jurisdiction, and admitting of being made available to a pursuer through the means of a judgment of the courts of this country, these courts have, eo ipso, jurisdiction to pronounce such judgment. The circumstance which supports the jurisdiction, is the existence of property or effects, not merely which the action does directly claim, but which it may be made to affect. On any other ground, I cannot see why the possession of heritable property should support jurisdiction,—why, for instance, the circumstance of a party being infeft in a house at Dunoon, or anywhere else in Scotland, should warrant the courts of this country to give decret against him for a debt of £20,000. The only conceivable ground of sustaining jurisdiction in such cases is, not that the rei sitæ is at issue in the action, but that the rei sitæ may be made available through the means of a judgment pronounced in the action, and that, therefore, the jurisdiction of the Court in pronouncing it, may, to a certain extent, be carried into effect. The same principle is clearly involved in the jurisdiction founded on arrestment,—confeffedly not limited to the subjects covered by the arrestment.

Now, if the principle of our law on this point be, not the absolute and direct application of the conclusions of the action to the subject situate within the territory, but the mere fact of there being within the territory property which the judgment in the action may be the instrument for reaching, it is clear that this principle applies as forcibly to heritable subjects held on apparençy, as to those vested by a completed title. For, in the first place, a constitution of a debt against the apparent heir is a judgment which does admit of being made effectual to attach such estate,—as effectual, indeed, as if the heir had entered. The only difference is, that in the latter case, the estate may be directly adjudged; while, in the former, the adjudication must be preceded by a special charge to enter. Still the constitution involves, in both cases, the very same ground of jurisdiction, viz., the existence of property within the territory which the constitution affords the means of attaching. Secondly, The constitution is the indispensable step for so attaching it. The creditor cannot get at the property but through the means of the constitution; and if there is no jurisdiction in such a case to support an action of constitution, I do not see how an estate, held in apparençy by a party not within this country, could be reached for payment of a debt due by him. A general charge to enter heir is, in the supposed case, out of the question. That is the instrument for reaching the estate of the ancestor, at the instance of a creditor of the ancestor. There the general charge fixes the liability for the ancestor's debt; and if the heir renounces, judgment of constitution is taken, not against the heir, but against the hereditas jacens of the ancestor. But when the heir himself, as here, is the debtor, there are no termini habiles for a general charge to enter, or a renunciation. The object is to constitute the debt, not against the hereditas jacens of the ancestor, but against the heir himself, which clearly neither requires nor admits of a general charge, as no such measure is necessary to render a man liable for his own debts, however necessary it may be to sustain action against him for the debts of his predecessor. The only charge required in such a case, is a special charge to enter to the lands. But such special charge can only proceed on constitution: See Stair, t. 5, 23. It "must proceed on production of a decret, not cognitionis causa, but for performance." But it seems to be maintained that the constitution ought, in some way or other, to have been limited to the property in Scotland, and that the defender might have renounced. I am not aware of any authority for such a practice,—nor do I see how such a constitution could have been brought. In all actions against parties for their own debts, the conclusion is personal for the establishment of the debt and payment. And where could there be room for any renunciation in such a case as this? It must be at once seen, that if there were room for renunciation in such a case, no constitution could by possibility be obtained. The foundation of the jurisdiction being the heritable estate, if that estate could be renounced, there could be no jurisdiction to support any constitution; and if constitution could not be obtained, the estate could never be made available to the creditor. It is absolutely necessary to guard against confounding such a case with that of a constitution of a debt due by the ancestor. There, if the heir renounces on a general charge, decret of constitution goes out against the hereditas jacens of the proper creditor. But in cases like the present, if the heir could competently renounce, in a constitution sought against himself for his own debt, he would, eo ipso, exclude the only ground on which jurisdiction could be sustained against him, and the result would be, that to reach an estate held in apparençy in this country, it would be necessary to constitute the debt by a judgment in the courts of the country in which the apparent heir resided. Besides, the inconsistency of holding the circumstance of apparençy to form an essential ground of distinction, appears from another consideration. It was long doubted in what situation the rents of an heritable estate, to which no title had been made up by the apparent heir, stood, after the death of such heir: Whether they were in bonis of the heir, or still formed, as accessories, part of the hereditas jacens of the predecessor. But this point was finally determined in favour of the former view. It was fixed by the judgments of the Court in the case of Lord Banff, July 24, 1766, and the reversal by the House of Lords in 1767, of an adverse judgment pronounced in the previous case of Hamilton v. Hamilton. It may thus be considered as fixed there, that the heir, though not making up a complete title, or actually possessing, is, by the mere force of his title to possess, the true creditor in the rents not uplifted; and it must follow from this, that an arrestment of these rents jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, would effectually found jurisdiction against him, whether he chose to possess or not. But if the title to possess is sufficient to create in him a right of credit in the rents, capable of being the ground of arrestments, is not the same title to possess the lands, sufficient of itself to found jurisdiction, seeing that the lands to which that title applies, require no arrestment to fix them within the territory? It would be a strange anomaly indeed, if the right to possess the lands themselves did not found jurisdiction, when the single circumstance of the heir's right to possess them, so vested him with the rents as to render them capable of being arrested by his creditors, and made them the ground of creating jurisdiction. With regard to the case of Cameron v. Chapman (16 Shaw, 907), referred to on the part of the defender as affording an analogy fatal to the jurisdiction here, it appears to me not to touch the present question, and to rest on a peculiarity which does not here exist.

It appears from the opinion of the consulted Judges in that case, adhered to by the Second Division of the Court, that the main ground there taken was, that after the death of the foreigner, the original defender, there could be no transference against the executor, also a foreigner, without a new arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa to support it. The distinction is taken in express terms between a real estate in this country, and a moveable fund fixed only by the operation of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. It is expressly laid down in that opinion, 1st, that even if the executor had been confirmed, there must still have been arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa to support the transference; and, 2dly, that so long as the executor remained unconfirmed, there was, according to the former decision of Houston, no means of competently arresting for that purpose. What may be the proper course to take in such a case as that, it is unnecessary here to inquire. It is sufficient to state, that the case was decided on the special ground, that the arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa against the original creditor fell by his death, and did not operate against the executor, and that as the only right belonging to the defunct was moveable, a new arrestment was necessary to warrant the transference; and that ground will not apply here, where the right required no arrestment to fix it within the territory. And, accordingly, in practice, I believe nothing is more common than to transfer action against the heir of Scotch property who succeeds during a dependence, whether he happens to be domiciled in this country or not.

But, besides, the analogy is far from being complete between an executor unconfirmed, in relation to the moveable property of the defunct, and the heir, though unentered in his real estate. The executorship is an office which requires the sanction of the proper court to give it effect. It is not necessarily confined to one person or set of persons: it may be conferred on a party explicitly named,—on a general legatee,—even on a creditor. Without confirmation, there is, properly speaking, no title even to possess. So that an executor or representative in moveables has no definite character in regard to the succession of the defunct, till he vests it by confirmation.

The situation of the heir, though unentered, is in every important particular quite different. He possesses in himself the character with which no one can interfere; that character alone gives him a title, and the sole title to possess,—a title so complete, that the produce—the rents of the lands—vests in him at once, without any process whatever, so as to be attachable by his creditors. He has thus, independently of any process or actual interference with the lands, a title which connects him with them, at least to the extent of enabling a creditor to call him into a Scotch Court.

I think, then, that the case alluded to does not apply; it was decided on grounds peculiar to itself, and leaves untouched the general principle, that real property in Scotland does found jurisdiction, and validates, in so far as jurisdiction is concerned, any decret of constitution taken against the apparent heir for his own debt.

I think, then, that upon this ground, the jurisdiction ought to be sustained, and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor adhered to.

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree with the opinion now delivered in every point, and I think it unnecessary to do more than simply observe, that this is a debt of the ancestor's heir. Had it been a debt of the ancestor, there might have been some difficulty in constituting it. There would also have been more difficulty if the succession had been only to a moveable estate. As to that supposed case, I do not wish to give any opinion. Certainly not the opinion that the heir, by refusing to make up a title, would leave his creditors without a remedy.

Lord Gillies.—I have some difficulty; but, on the whole, I concur in Lord Fullerton's opinion.

Lord President.—I also concur in Lord Fullerton's opinion. I leave entirely out of consideration the effect of the combined circumstances of the forum originis, the locus contractus, and locus solutionis. I found entirely on the fact stated in the summons of constitution, that John Melvil M'Arthur had succeeded to heritage in Scotland. He had not made up his titles, but he was heir-apparent, and has been so for five years; and he now pleads that that succession was not sufficient to give the Court jurisdiction. He admits he is the true heir; and he takes good care not to say he has abandoned his right; but he simply says he has not entered to possession, or made up any title, and that, therefore, he is not amenable to our jurisdiction. There is no doubt he has a right to the rents, and that, under the old election law, he might have come from the West Indies, and been entitled, solely on the ground of his having succeeded to this property, to walk in to a meeting of the freeholders of the county for the election of a member of Parliament, and give his vote, or, perhaps (for such things have happened) be his own elector. This juggle, with regard to his not having entered to possession, and therefore not being subject to our jurisdiction, appears to me contrary to legal principle; and I have looked in vain for any authority to support it.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In respect that at the date of the citation in the action, and of the decree of constitution pronounced against him, the said J. M. M'Arthur had right, as heir-apparent, to an heritable estate in Scotland—Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, repelling the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court and to the decree of constitution, and remitting to the accountant to report on the points specified in the said interlocutor, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as shall be just, and reserve, for his further consideration and decision, all questions of expenses."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—For Pursuer (J. M. M'Arthur), Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Patterson; John Patten, W.S., Agent.—For Defenders, Macfarlane; Charles Fisher, S.S.C., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 72.—ROBERT HENDERSON and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. THE SOCIETY OF SOLICITORS before the SUPREME COURTS, Defenders.

Exclusive Privilege.—Corporation.—Powers.—The charter incorporating the Solicitors to the Supreme Courts proceeds on the narrative, that the society had collected a sum of money for a library and for the relief of poor members, widows and children, and gives full power to make bye-laws, and do other proper and necessary acts for conducting the affairs and administering the funds of the incorporation, provided always that these were not contrary to the laws of the country, and were reviewable by the Court of Session on the summary application of any party having interest.—Held that the society were not entitled, under their powers, to vote away a sum from their accumulated funds, and a proportion of the annual contributions of members, and money paid by new entrants, to a widows' scheme, the benefits of which were restricted to the widows of those members who chose to become annual contributors.

In 1784, the agents and solicitors who had been admitted to practise before the Supreme Courts agreeably to the Acts of Sederunt, 10th August 1754, and 10th March 1772, on the narrative that they were desirous to promote, as far as in their power, "the salutary ends and purposes of the said Acts of Sederunt," voluntarily constituted themselves, "with the intention of perpetual succession and permanency, into a society or body collective, under the title and denomination of the Society of Solicitors of the Court of Session and other Supreme Courts of Scotland;" and as they considered a common fund to be "essentially necessary in order to the accomplishment of the objects of the association," they assessed themselves in the sum of £5. 5s. each as the beginning of the fund, and resolved that in future the whole members then existing, or that afterwards might be admitted, with the exception of such as might have outlived their business, or been reduced to indigence or inability by sickness, accident, or the infirmities of old age, should make payment to the treasurer of £1. 1s. Sterling of annual contribution. The 10th regulation fixed the sum to be paid by new entrants; and the 14th, the sum to be paid by the members for each apprentice. The 25th regulation provided, that the whole funds shall be "the absolute property, and at the disposal of the members;" but the 28th declared that it should "not be lawful or allowable to dispose of, or order to be paid away, for any end or purpose whatever, otherwise than for interest or annual profit, any part of the principal sums whether funded or unfunded, or to sell or dispose of any subject belonging to this society (excepting what shall be deposited in the hands of the treasurer for contingencies and expenses), without the concurring votes of three-fourths in number, or more, of the qualified members present at a general meeting, specially convened for that express purpose, in time of session, by the order and appointment of a previous meeting, also held in time of session, fourteen days at least prior to the date of the meeting at which the votes are to be taken, with regard to the disposal of any part of the said principal sums or subjects aforesaid."

The 30th regulation was in the following terms:

"Three-fifths of the interest, rents, and annual profits, due for the time, accruing from the whole principal sums, and other subjects belonging to this society, after deduction of the salaries and necessary expenses then due, shall be at the disposal of a majority of the qualified members, in general meetings duly assembled, for the relief of indigent members, widows, and children, and for such other purposes as shall appear proper, until the funds of the society shall be deemed sufficient to yield such stated or fixed annuities as shall be hereafter provided for by this society: but it shall not be lawful to fewer than two-thirds in number of the qualified members, in general meetings duly convened, to order to be paid away, or disposed of, any more, or greater sum of the said interest, on any account whatever."

The 31st regulation explained the mode in which the regulations embodied in the deed of agreement, and any other regulations, standing ordinances or bye-laws of the society, should be repealed, or new ones enacted; and in the 32d, the members engaged to obey and conform themselves,

"not only to all and every one of the regulations herein contained, but also to all such other regulations, bye-laws, orders, and resolutions, of this society, as are, or shall be made, passed, agreed to, and signed, as herein after directed, according to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, in all points."

In 1797, the society obtained a charter of incorporation from the Crown. The charter repeats the narrative of the regulations of 1784, stating that the members had formed themselves into a society, and collected a sum of money

"tanquam principium pecuniæ depositæ pro bibliotheca librorum utilium et necessariorum comparanda, proque subsidio sociorum defectorum, et viduarum liberorumque sociorum in rebus egenis morientium."

The object of applying for the charter is stated to be,

"pro his propositis consequendis, et pro dictæ societatis meliori tutamine, atque administratione pecuniarum depositarum aliarumque rerum cum securitate promovere, et negotia reipublicæ, in quantum ad eorum praxin occupationemque in dictis curiis refert, in modo proprio et regulari perficere."

The charter gives full power to the society, or a majority of the members,

"dirigendi, ordinandi et constituendi, in omnibus rebus et negotiis, ad dictam societatem ejusque gubernationem et administrationem ejus facultatum, pecuniarumque depositarum spectant, et pertinent;" and it also gives, "plenam potestatem et auctoritatem ad eorum generales conventos ordinatos de tempore in tempus congregatos, constituendi, ordinandi, et faciendi tales et tot leges privatas, constitutiones, consuetudines et edicta, quæ illi vel major pars illorum pro tempore congregatorum, pro meliore administratione et ordine rerum et pecuniarum depositarum dictæ societatis attentionumque patrimonialium gubernatione propria et necessaria judicabunt, dictasque leges privatas, constitutiones, consuetudines et edicta, ullasve earum, mutandi aut abrogandi, ut dictæ societati vel majori parti illorum tunc præsentium necessarium esse videbitur; omnes quas leges privatas, constitutiones, consuetudines et edicta uti prædicatur faciend. debite observanda et tenenda volumus: Providen. semper, quod eadem legibus regni non adversa vel contraria erunt, talibusque legibus privatis et ordinationibus ad Judicium Curie Sessionis recognitionem summatim, ad applicationem ullius personæ interesse habent. semper subjectis."

In 1817, at a general meeting of the society called by requisition, for the purpose of deliberating on the subject, it was moved, and unanimously agreed to, "that the establishment of a scheme for providing annuities to the widows of the members of this society is a proper and expedient measure," and a committee was appointed to report such measures as they might think advisable for carrying the scheme into effect. The report being made, the society, in terms of it, resolved that all those of its existing members who, by the 1st of May 1817, should declare their willingness to contribute £5. 5s. annually, and if married, pay a certain sum as marriage-tax, should constitute "the Society of Contributors to the Widows' Scheme of the Solicitors of the Supreme Courts of Scotland;" and that those existing members who might thereafter declare their accession to the scheme before Whitsunday 1819, should be received as contributors, "on a petition to the society of contributors, but on such terms as a majority of the society shall agree to receive them." With regard to those existing members who did not so declare their accession, the contract bore, that they should be excluded from the benefit of the scheme

"for ever, unless they shall be admitted by two-thirds of the contributors to the scheme present at a general meeting, held in time of session, upon their application, and making payment of £10 Sterling, over and above the rates and whole other contributions that would have been due by them if they had become contributors under this contract previous to the term of Martinmas 1817, with interest thereon until paid."

Future members were to have the benefit of the scheme on paying the annual contribution of £5. 5s.,—those who were married paying the marriage-tax according to the scale fixed in the case of the original members, with an additional payment of £15 if above forty, and not above fifty years of age, or of £30 if above fifty. On the 2d June 1817, at a general meeting of the society, it was resolved, in terms of a motion tabled at a previous meeting, "that £750 Sterling of the society's funds be applied to the proposed widows' scheme, with interest from Whitsunday 1817." It was also resolved, that "the half of all entry-moneys to be received from future entrants with the society, and the half of the yearly contributions by members shall be applied to the use of the said widows' scheme." In 1833, it was moved at a special general meeting of the society, "that the payment to the widows' fund of one-third of the annual subsidy levied from the members shall be suspended until the debt due by the society shall be paid, and it shall appear that the income of the society is adequate to the expenditure." This motion, after having been repeatedly under consideration, was rejected in December 1834, by a majority of thirteen to eleven—the society approving of the report of a committee, who, inter alia, reported it as their opinion,

"that it would be illegal, and certainly most inexpedient to withdraw from the widows' fund any branch of the original sources of income, or to alter any of the previous resolutions of the society on which the scheme was originally commenced and followed up the deliberate and solemn contract. Your committee may further notice, that the accountant made his calculations of the value of the annuities to be paid to widows upon the unquestionable understanding and calculation that the half of the annual contribution payable by the members of the society formed a branch of that fund, and as the scheme has now gone on for seventeen years upon that footing, your committee are inclined to think that the widows of deceased members, as well as the wives of existing members, have obtained a vested interest, which cannot in justice or fairness be now disturbed."

At a special general meeting, held 1st July 1839, a motion was considered for "rescinding the resolution of the society in the year 1817, which provided that 10s. 6d. of the annual subsidy paid by members should be appropriated to the widows' fund." Mr Robert Henderson moved as an amendment,—

"In respect that the resolution of 1817, appropriating or gifting away to the private widows' scheme or fund established by a few members of the society (and with which the society as a body had no interest or concern whatever), one-half of the annual subsidy exacted from the whole members of the society for the purposes of the incorporation, as well as one-half of the entry-money exacted from the members of the society upon their admission, was ultra vires of the incorporation, and consequently illegal; therefore, the said resolution should be rescinded, and declared null and void ab initio, reserving to the society as a body, or any of the individual members thereof, all right and title to insist for repetition of all sums exacted from members, and so misapplied under said resolution."

This amendment was rejected as incompetent, on the ground that in consequence of going beyond the motion, it could only be considered as a notice of motion to be considered at the next stated general meeting in December. Another member then moved as an amendment, that the resolution of 1817, in so far as it provided for the appropriation of one-half of the £1. 1s. payable annually by members, should be recalled and rescinded as at Whitsunday last, and in all time thereafter, but that the arrears payable at and prior to that time should be appropriated to the widows' scheme as heretofore. This amendment was adopted unanimously, with the exception of two members, Messrs Robert Henderson and James Moore, who dissented from it in so far as it sanctioned the appropriation of any part of the arrears to the widows' scheme. Thereafter Mr Henderson presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Society of Solicitors, in which he prayed the Court

"to suspend the proceedings complained of, and to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents from appropriating and paying over to the private widows' fund, established by some members of the said society for their own behoof and benefit, and with which the incorporated society, as a body, have no interest or concern, or to any person or persons for behoof of the said private widows' fund, (1.) Any part of the entry-moneys exacted from entrants with the society, as members of the incorporation; and (2.) Any part of the yearly subsidies or contributions exacted from members of the incorporation to the funds of the society; reserving to the complainant all right and title to insist and sue for repetition, for behoof and benefit of the incorporated society as a body, of the sums exacted from him and all other members, and illegally appropriated to the said private widows' fund."

When this note was presented, the number of the members of the society was 115, but of these only 42 were connected with the widows' fund.

Interim interdict was granted, but the following interlocutor was afterwards pronounced by Lord Fullerton in the Bill-Chamber:

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the note, answers, and productions, and having heard the agents of the parties, passes the note for the purpose of trying the question of law there raised; but in respect that the appropriation of funds complained of is authorised by a resolution of the incorporation, formally and regularly passed at the general meeting of 1817, and standing unchallenged ever since, during sixteen years of which period, viz., from the year 1823, the complainant has himself been a member of the society, recalls the interdict."

After this interlocutor was pronounced, the Society of Solicitors, at a meeting in November 1839, resolved, in terms of a motion which had been submitted, "that as the object of the suspension and interdict at the instance of Mr Henderson against the society and its office-bearers is for the benefit of the incorporation as a body, the society ought not to oppose the same."

Mr Robert Henderson and four other members executed a summons of reduction and declarator against the society, in which, inter alia, they concluded to have it found and declared, that all the proceedings of the society, in instituting the widows' scheme, and making payments to it from the funds of the society, were reduced and declared to have been from the beginning null and void,—because, primo, (formal).

"Secundo, It was ultra vires and illegal for the said incorporated society to make any bye-law, minute, or resolution appropriating the funds then existing, or funds to be levied from either the then, present, or future members of the incorporation for any other purposes than such as are warranted and authorised by their foresaid charter. Tertio, It was ultra vires and illegal in the said incorporation or society to appropriate the funds, present or prospective, of the incorporation to or for behoof of the foresaid private association formed by certain members only of the incorporation for a fund to their widows, such not being one of the objects or purposes for which the society was incorporated. Quarto, It was illegal and incompetent for the said incorporated society to levy or exact, either from entrants or members of the incorporation, any sums of money, in name either of entry-money or annual subsidy to or for behoof of the foresaid private association formed by certain members only of the incorporation for a fund for their widows, and which private association, or widows' scheme, the members of the incorporation, as a body, had neither any control over, nor any interest whatever therein. Quinto, The said pretended bye-laws, and others, by which the general funds of the incorporated society have been misapplied, were not only contrary to, but subversive of the purposes for which the society was originally formed, and afterwards incorporated, and have caused great damage and prejudice to the interests thereof,—as well as for other reasons to be proposed at discussing hereof: And the said pretended bye-laws, minutes, and resolutions being so declared, reduced, and set aside, and other conclusions hereof disposed of, the said defenders, conjunctly and severally, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £100 Sterling, or such other sum, less or more, as our said Lords shall be pleased to modify, as the expense of this process, over and above the expense of extracting the decree to follow hereupon, reserving to the incorporated society, as a body, or the pursuers, or other individual members of the said society, all right and title to insist for repetition of all sums exacted from, or paid by the pursuers, or other members, and misapplied as aforesaid, as accords."

The Society of Solicitors, instead of entering appearance as defenders, adopted the following resolution:

"That as the society had not only, upon the 4th November last, resolved not to oppose the suspension and interdict at the instance of Mr Henderson against the society and its office-bearers, as it was for the benefit of the incorporation as a body, but also upon the 2d December last, by a majority of the members present, actually rescinded and declared the resolution of 1817 null and void ab initio, as being ultra vires of the incorporation, and consequently illegal; and as the action of reduction and declarator now brought by Mr Henderson and others is for the purpose of supporting the suspension and interdict, and having the resolution of 1817 legally and effectually set aside against the members of the widows' scheme, for the benefit of the incorporation as a body—Therefore the society ought not in any way to defend the action, it being understood that in that event Mr Henderson and the other pursuers shall not insist for expenses against this society and its office-bearers."

Certification contra non producta and decree in absence were pronounced against the society; but appearance having been entered by the Society of Contributors to the Scheme as defenders, and by the widows interested in the fund as compearers, the processes of suspension and interdict and of reduction and declarator were conjoined, and a record made up, in which it was

Pleaded by the pursuers—1. The resolutions and proceedings under reduction are illegal and ultra vires, in respect that the intention and effect of them is to appropriate certain funds belonging to the incorporated Society of Solicitors to purposes not contemplated in the charter of incorporation, and in which the incorporation, as such, has no interest. 2. The resolutions and proceedings under reduction being in themselves null and void, and the resolution of date 2d December 1839, rescinding and making void the resolutions and proceedings under reduction, being a valid and binding resolution of the incorporated society, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator and reduction, in terms of the conclusions of their summons. 3. The pursuer and suspender Mr Henderson, as a member of the incorporated society, has good title and interest to apply for and obtain the interdict craved, to prevent the misapplication of the common funds of the incorporation. 4. The Association or Society of Contributors to the Widows' Scheme, defenders, having in law no connection with, or claim upon, the incorporated society, are not entitled to demand or receive any aid or support from the incorporation's funds. 5. The pursuers have done no act, either jointly or severally, by which the right of any of them, as members of the incorporation, to challenge the illegal proceedings under reduction, can be held to have been waived, abandoned or lost.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. The pursuers are now barred, personali exceptione, from challenging the resolutions complained of on any of the grounds urged in the present suspension and reduction. 2. The resolution of June 1817 is now binding and effectual, as a stipulation or regulation of the society, upon the principle of usage, as explaining or even altering the terms of the original contract of the society. 3. The resolutions complained of are now valid and effectual quoad the defenders and compearers, and cannot be questioned by any member of the incorporation, in respect these resolutions form matter of contract between the incorporation and the widows' scheme, implemented and relied upon by both parties, and in respect the continuance of implement is requisite for the stability and existence of the widows' scheme, which was substantially instituted by the incorporation.

The Lord Ordinary ordered cases, and thereafter made avizandum with them, and the whole process, to the Court. His Lordship issued the following note:

"This is a case of importance in the law of society and incorporation. It is also a question of great interest to the widows at present drawing annuities from the fund, and to females having a near prospect of being placed on it, as the best part of their means of subsistence may probably depend on the issue. It is fit, therefore, that the question should be brought under consideration of the Court with the least possible delay.

"The object of the conjoined actions is to have certain resolutions of the Incorporated Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts, passed so far back as 1817, rescinded. By these resolutions the society agreed to contribute a considerable sum (£750) from their general funds to the establishment of a widows' fund, for the provision exclusively of the widows of members; they also agreed to appropriate to the same purpose one-half of the entrance-money of new members, and a certain share of the small subsidy or subscription-fund paid annually by the members. It was to be optional to members to connect themselves with this subsidiary scheme or not as they chose; but if they joined it, they were bound to make a considerable additional annual contribution not leviable from other members. On that footing the widows' scheme was established in 1817, and these grants by the society were passed unanimously. The portions of the annual subsidy fixed in 1817 were contributed by the whole members for a series of years without objection, and they are still leviable, and paid annually into the fund. There are now forty-two members who contribute to the widows' fund, and eleven widows who draw the annual allowance (it is believed £30) claimable by persons in that class.

"The suspender and pursuer, Mr Henderson, and a few other members of the society who have been admitted since 1817, now object to the resolutions by which the capital sum of £750, and the annual portions of the entry-money and subsidy were granted to the widows' fund, and they have brought them under suspension and reduction in the processes now reported to the Court. It is the duty of the Lord Ordinary to state, as shortly as possible, the views which have occurred to him on a consideration of these cases:—

"1. The leading plea of Mr Henderson, pursuer and suspender, is, that any appropriation whatever of the funds of the society to a widows' fund in 1817, was ultra vires of the society, and that it may be rescinded quandocunque, as a null and incompetent alienation, by the Supreme Court, if brought under review at the instance of any party having interest in the funds. The Lord Ordinary, however, is not satisfied, upon any considerations or authorities yet urged by the pursuer, that this would be a maintainable doctrine, even if the resolutions had been complained of de recenti, and before third parties had acted on them, or acquired an interest in the fund, and still less after they have been acquiesced in for the best part of the existing generation, and when widows and families have acquired an interest, perhaps to the extent of their means of subsistence, in defending the scheme.

"There can be no doubt that it is competent for this Court (more especially when applied to debito tempore) to stop, at the instance of any party interested, all resolutions for the alienation of the property and funds of corporations which are manifestly illegal and incompetent, even though agreed to by a preponderating majority of these societies. On that point the cases of the Trades' House of Glasgow, and of the Weavers of Lanark in 1793, quoted in the papers, are of themselves decisive precedents in point—and the later case of Paisley, in which the magistrates and town-council of a burgh of regality, which possessed considerable property, were interdicted from selling certain superiorities belonging to the burgh for political purposes, may be quoted as a decision to the same effect.—Fac. Coll., 22d January 1822.

"The right of all interested to complain in the present instance is still more clear, from the special clause in the charter incorporating this society, which provides, that the administration by the society of their property and funds should be at all times subject 'ad iudicium Curie Sessionis, recognitionem summatum ad applicationem ullius persone interesse habent.'

"While the jurisdiction of the Court however is incontestable, the next and more important inquiry is, if the resolutions would have been rescinded as ultra vires of the society, even if they had been complained of at their date, and before the parties had relied and acted on them? The powers of the corporation, in the administration of their affairs, were thus defined in their charter: 'His Majesty granted 'plenam potestatem et auctoritatem, ad eorum generales conventos ordinatos, de tempore in tempus congregatos, constituendi ordinandi, et faciendi tales et tot leges privatas, constitutiones, consuetudines, et edicta quae illi vel major pars illorum pro tempore congregatorum, pro meliore administratione et ordine rerum et pecuniarum deposi- tarum dictæ societatis attentionumque patrimonialium gubernatione, propria et necessaria judicabunt, dictasque leges privatas, constitutiones, consuetudines et edicta ullasve earum mutandi, aut abrogandi ut dictæ societati vel majori parti illorum tunc presentium necessarium esse videbitur; omnes quas leges privatas constitutiones consuetudines et edicta uti predictur faciendi debiti observanda et tenenda volumus providen. Semper quod eadem, legibus regni, non adversa vel contraria erunt.

"Under these extensive powers the society had right not only to apply the common funds to the promotion of the objects more particularly specified in the charter, but to alter these articles of their constitution, and to make new bye-laws respecting their funds and their affairs generally, providing only that such laws 'legibus regni non adversa vel contraria erunt.' Hence if the resolutions now complained of had been brought under review by any one interested at the time they were passed, the objection would have raised this question,—Whether the appropriation of the funds to a widows' scheme was contrary to the purposes of the association, or to the common law of the kingdom? As at present advised, the Lord Ordinary does not conceive that such a plea would have been maintainable. Looking to long-established usage in trades and professional corporations as the best interpreter of the purposes of these associations, and of their understood powers of administration over their common funds, it seems to have been the practice from time immemorial for such incorporations to apply a part of their funds to the support and maintenance of widows. Indeed, although this is notorious to all conversant with the management of our incorporated trades, the fact is established in the most authentic manner by the report presented to Parliament in 1835 by the commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations in Scotland, in which it was shown that there is hardly an incorporation of any trade or profession in this country in which a part of the funds are not applied in giving annuities and allowances, greater or less, to the widows of deceased members. In particular, reference may be made to the reports on the affairs of the cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, which have schedules attached showing the allowance to widows in the different corporations of these large towns, in every one of which it appears that annuities are given to widows varying from £60 to 20s. per annum. These, too, appear to be either optional or fixed, according to the property and funds, or views of the several corporations.

"The greater part of these subordinate funds have been created, not by Act of Parliament, as hinted at by the pursuer, but upon the understood powers of the corporations at common law. It is often expedient to have a special Statute to enable the trustees of widows' funds on a great scale to lend or borrow money without extra expense, and to exclude creditors from attaching the widows' annuities for any thing but alimentary debts, and for various other useful purposes which may easily be figured. In the great bulk of corporations, however, a scheme for widows may be, and has very generally been, carried into effect without any extraordinary powers from Parliament.

"Thus standing the general usage of corporate bodies in Scotland with regard to provisions for widows, it is not easy to see how this Court would have interfered, in 1817, with an unanimous resolution of the Society of Solicitors to appropriate £750, and one-half of the admission-money of entrants, to the establishment of a permanent fund for widows. The universal usage shows that this must be viewed as one of the purposes to which the funds of corporations may be applied by the common law and practice of Scotland. But there is a separate consideration peculiar to the present case. The charter of the Society of Solicitors expressly bears, that they had collected a fund for the establishment of a library, 'proque subsidio sociorum defectorum et viduarum liberorumque sociorum in rebus egenis morientium;' and the contract, which was the bond of association among the members for thirteen years prior to the charter, distinctly provides that the common fund 'shall be at the disposal of a majority of the qualified members, in general meetings assembled, for the relief of indigent members, widows, and children, and for such other purposes as shall appear proper, until the funds of the society shall be deemed sufficient to yield such stated or fixed annuities as shall be hereafter provided by the society.' These clauses warrant the inference that the provision of fixed annuities for the widows of solicitors was contemplated, from the earliest period that this society was incorporated, as one of the chief objects which the members had in view in the collection and accumulation of a common fund. When the corporation therefore agreed unanimously in 1817 that the time was then come to devote £750, and one-half of the fees of entrants, for that purpose, it is supposed that the Court would have required some very strong objection to induce them to interfere with the appropriation. But no such objection, founded on the state of the funds as in 1817, is even now set forth on this record by the pursuer.

"It is maintained, no doubt, by the members now objecting, that the widows' scheme established in 1817 was not a plan for the provision of the widows of decayed and indigent members, but of the widows of all members, rich and poor, indiscriminately. But the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to find that a general provision for the widows of all members is not the best and most delicate mode of providing for the widows of decayed members. It obviously tends to diminish their number, if not to prevent any such class from arising; as the scheme, if framed on right principles, may induce the most necessitous members, by a small annual payment, to provide in that way for their widows. Such a regulation as to widows was found not to be revocable by an incorporation, and enforced in the case of the Flethers of Glasgow against Scotland, (Shaw's Rep., 21st January 1826); a case distinguishable from an opposite decision in the case of Paterson, (10th February 1803, Mor. App., voce Aliment, No. 6.) where the allowances to widows were unfixed and discretionary. There was some discussion also in the case of Howden against the Incorporation of Goldsmiths (2d June 1840), as to the legality of a bye-law, by which that body established a fund for paying a certain annuity to all their members upwards of fifty-five years of age. The decision of that case ultimately turned on a different point, but the regulation was not declared by any of the Court to be incompetent, and it is still carried into effect.

"It is objected, however, to the appropriation under review, that it was partial and unnecessary, in so far as it was not given to all the members or their widows indiscriminately, but was set aside for the widows of the contributors only, who it is said were thus auctores in res suas. This plea, however, appears to be sufficiently met by the consideration that all the members had a right, and were invited to enrol themselves in the scheme; and if the effect of the institution was to reduce or put an end to the class of necessitous widows, it is impossible to deny that the whole society had more or less an interest in its maintenance. It was certainly not viewed as a partial or selfish appropriation in 1817, when the society unanimously concurred in the vote by which it was passed.

"II. But, in the next place, even if the resolution under reduction had been such as the Court, on due cause shown, might have corrected in 1817, it is a different question whether it can be set aside years after it has been carried into effect by consent of all interested,—when matters are on longer entire,—and when numerous third parties and their families have acquired an onerous, and to themselves an all-important interest in the continuance of the scheme. On this point of the case, it is conceived to be manifest, that when the contributors to this scheme have gone on for twenty years and upwards to pay rates for insuring an annuity to their widows,—and when perhaps many have joined the society, and paid their entrance-money as the purchase-money of that very provision, it would be subjecting their widows and families to unprecedented injustice, to allow the society to demand back the fund, without regard to the subsisting interests.

"It has been alleged, indeed, that the £750 voted by the society to the widows' scheme is still extant, and that it may yet be recovered or attached in the hands of the trustees of the widows' fund. By that statement it is presumed the pursuer only means to allege that a sum equal to £750 is still in the trustees' hands, which may be recovered by decree of this Court, if the pursuer succeeds in this action. But the answer to such a claim is obvious; the fund has been onerously and irrevocably alienated; in fact, it has been paid away for behoof of third parties, who trusted to the good faith of the society in purchasing the benefit of the scheme, and their rights and interests over the sum in question far outweigh those of the corporation.

The members who transferred and paid away the corporate funds may possibly be liable in accounting to the other corporators (if there be any entitled to complain); but money paid and applied years ago under a specific contract, in which many third parties have now acquired an interest, cannot be reclaimed on any ground set forth on this record.

"At the same time, it is by no means clear that even the members of the corporation who passed the resolution of 1817 would be personally liable, post longum intervallum, for any mistake in the administration of the funds. It must occur to any one acquainted with the past history and proceedings of corporations, that there are many acts which might possibly be interdicted by the Court if complained of debito tempore, which cannot be sustained as grounds of personal challenge against the members, when they have been assented to, or long acquiesced in by all interested in the corporation at the time. Thus it is a matter of notoriety in the history of Glasgow, that during the American war, six of the incorporated trades of that city paid £500 each from their respective common funds for raising what was called the Glasgow Regiment. It is possible that these patriotic gifts might have been successfully interdicted if they had been complained of at the time; and if the same strictly legal views as to the powers of corporators, on which the Court proceeded a few years afterwards in the case of the Weavers of Lanark (when that corporation was prevented from giving away the corporate funds in subscriptions to promote burgh reform), had been earlier recognised, it is probable that the alienations by the trades of their funds for military purposes might have been checked. But when no objection was stated at the time, it would be too much to hold that the heirs and successors of the corporators could be called to account in a succeeding age, by new members attempting to challenge applications of the funds which all interested enthusiastically concurred in when they were passed. On the same principle, it may well be questioned if parties in the situation of the pursuers, and those who concur with them, be entitled to complain of the disposal of personal funds agreed to years before they had any concern with the corporation.

"III. Upon the preceding views, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the present action cannot be maintained on the grounds laid in the summons, and more fully detailed in the record now closed. It may be proper to add, that other pleas were indicated at the debate which are not now pressed. In particular, it was at first alleged vaguely, that the widows' scheme was ruinous and disadvantageous to the parties contributing,—that a better return for the sums paid could be got from any ordinary insurance office,—and that the society and contributors could not be bound to proceed with what was called a losing concern,—at least if they made due provision for the existing and vested interests of all who had a preferable claim over the present fund. Of course there can be no doubt that this Court, in the exercise of its powers as a court of equity, has jurisdiction to dissolve or relieve parties from a joint concern or a-sociation which is disadvantageous and ruinous to all; but there are no termini habiles to raise that question here. The members of the widows' scheme, the chief parties having a title to urge it, do not complain of the rates as extravagant or inadequate. Again, if the other members of the corporation really intended to insist in such a plea, both the summons and record should have contained specific allegations as to the funds of the scheme, and the returns given by other institutions to widows, so as to show on what grounds and to what extent they maintained their right, under present circumstances, to put an end to the scheme as a losing and inexpedient concern. Farther, if a majority of the society wished to put an end to the scheme, under a due reservation and provision for all the existing interests in the scheme, they should have set forth distinctly, in what manner they meant to secure and provide for such interests. The Court could thereupon have directed such further inquiry and discussion as might be necessary on these points. But it is supposed, that neither the pursuer nor the majority of the society have any sincere intention at present to insist for a termination of the widows' scheme on these grounds."

The cause being advised,

Lord President.—It is not necessary to call on the pursuers' counsel. The Court feel an insurmountable difficulty in adopting the view of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship, indeed, has not given judgment, but he has explained his opinion very fully in a note. The case is one of great importance, not only to the parties, but to the general law of incorporations. There are some specialties in the case, but in determining it, we must apply the common principles of law which relate to questions of this nature. Now, I must confess that from the time I became capable of forming a legal opinion, I have understood that no incorporation was entitled, without special authority, to do acts such as those now under reduction. In the first place, it must be admitted that there is no great distinction between the charter of incorporation and the original resolutions of 1784. The charter must be regarded as a ratification of the resolutions, and these again lead us back to the Acts of Sederunt. The object of these Acts was to provide a respectable body of practitioners, and for this purpose, the parties to the resolutions agree to assess themselves in order to create a fund which, as the charter explains, might enable them to acquire a library, and provide a fund not only for widows, but for decayed members and children. These were the leading objects of the association, and I cannot see anything in the resolutions to justify the conclusion which the Society of Solicitors appear to have drawn from them. Indeed, with regard to the slump sum which was voted away, I cannot see any clause which authorised them to trench upon the capital. The 25th section, which seems to intimate that there was a full power of disposal, I rather think refers merely to the disposal of the interest of money, and other annual profits. And to what purposes were these to be applied? To the providing of annuities for indigent members, widows, and children. It is true there is a reference to some ulterior annuities, and the solicitors argue, that these were to be of the nature of those provided by this widows' scheme. I cannot see that. The classes of persons are very different. Those to whom the annuities of the widows' scheme are paid, may be persons for whom the original resolutions meant to provide, but they may be different altogether; while they expressly leave out of view two of the classes for whom provision was expressly contemplated. We every day see melancholy instances of individuals who have failed in their profession, and make application to us for relief. Can it be said to have been inexpedient for the society to contemplate cases of that description, and make a provision for them by granting such annuities to decayed members? Assuredly not; and this, I apprehend, was the leading object which they did contemplate. But then, in 1817, they resolved, wisely or unwisely, to adopt a different measure altogether. Looking probably to what had recently taken place in the Church of Scotland, and other public bodies, they resolved to have a widows' scheme. This scheme was not only confined entirely to widows, but was still farther restricted; because the benefits were not given universally to the widows of all who had been members. A condition of certain annual payments were annexed, and those members who failed to make them, were excluded from all interest in the fund. The question, then, which has been raised, and which we are now called upon to decide, is, was it competent for the solicitors to vote away these funds to such an institution? I am clear, that if they were resolved to do so, only two courses were open to them. They ought either to have gone to the Legislature, where all having interest would have been able to appear, or they ought to have applied to the Crown and obtained a charter sanctioning an appropriation of these funds, different from that now sanctioned by the existing charter. They took neither of these courses; but after considering a motion for the institution of a widows' scheme, and receiving the report of a committee, resolved at once to carry it into effect, and at once, de plano, voted away to it £750 of these funds. I do not know what the amount of the funds may be, but I suspect that the sum thus voted formed a large proportion of them. In addition to this vote, it was further resolved that one-half of the annual contribution of members, and one-half of the money paid by new entrants, should go to the same scheme. Again, those members who became contributors, on falling into arrears, forfeited all their bygone payments, and those who were unable, or declined to contribute, had nothing more to do with the fund than perfect strangers. The fact is, that the contributors to the widows' scheme were a limited body; and it accordingly turns out that their number bears a small proportion to that of the whole society. And yet the whole society are compelled to make payment of annual contributions and entry-money to this smaller one. Is this competent, legal, and in terms of the charter? I agree with the pursuers, that the society were not entitled to lay down this code of regulations in favour of certain contributors. The effect of the scheme is, to provide only for their widows, whether poor or not; and therefore, it is emphatically not a scheme for decayed persons at all, whether members, or widows, or children. Now, a reduction has been brought of this scheme, and it is met by the plea of homologation. I cannot see how that plea can shut us out from considering the legality of the scheme. Many members who have entered recently cannot be affected by that plea; and those actually pursuing the reduction seem competent to do so. Was this scheme then legal in 1817? I am not able to say that it was, or to resist the conclusion for reducing it. No doubt there is a question behind of a different nature, viz., what interest the existing widows have in the fund? We are not called to decide that question now; but I must own my impression to be, that if the scheme was invalid in 1817, the fact that the society have committed themselves to it, is no answer to the question, whether the pursuers are entitled to reduce it. This, however, is a point on which we may afterwards get more light; but if called upon to decide it at present, I must say, that however hard it may bear on individuals, the length of time during which the scheme has existed, is no legitimate answer to the question, was it legal; aye or no? If once we permit deviations from the objects sanctioned by the charter, it is impossible to say where they are to stop. I am clear that judgment must be given in favour of the pursuers.

Lord Gillies.—I concur as to the merits of the reduction, but I have a difficulty in following it out to the consequences indicated. In the suspension, the parties desired to insist and sue for repetition. Say a widow has drawn her annuity for twenty years, with the unanimous concurrence of the society, is she to be called upon to repay all she has drawn? The question is not properly before us, but I think it should have been before us, and that we ought to know the extent to which this claim is to be maintained. Is it meant that the widows are to be called upon to repeat?

The counsel for the pursuers here explained that this was not meant, and that they were willing to lodge a minute foregoing all claim of repetition against the widows.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur with your Lordships as to the merits of the reduction. I am clear that the scheme is illegal. It is not sustained by the charter. On the contrary, it both differs from, and is inconsistent with, the objects contemplated by it. The only things mentioned in the charter are a library, and a provision for decayed members, widows and children. Your Lordship has justly observed, these objects are totally different from the scheme to which the grant has been made from the society's funds. That scheme is not intended for widows in poverty at all,—not for members at all,—not for children at all, but for a class of persons totally distinct from the general body of the society. No doubt all those belonging to it are members of the society, but those of them only belong to it who are able to contribute; and their widows get the benefit of it, whether they are poor or not. So much is this the case, that it has become usual in marriage-contracts to take notice of the widows' interest in this scheme. It is impossible, therefore, to say that this is a charitable fund in favour of the classes of persons referred to in the charter. It is true there are general words in the charter, and I do not think we are compelled to limit the expenditure of the funds to the objects expressly specified in it; but if the expenditure goes beyond these, we are certainly entitled to see that the objects are such as are agreeable to equity and the laws of the country. No doubt the society have a power of making bye-laws, but this power is limited, by its very nature, to the making of such arrangements as are fairly in accordance with the interests of all the members, and it is the business of the Court to decide whether they are so or not. Viewing matters in this way, I think it is impossible to sustain this widows' scheme. The proper object of the charter was, to maintain a respectable body of practitioners; and it gives power, with this view, to levy certain contributions. The power to tax is given for this purpose, but not surely to tax generally for any objects totally unconnected with that expressly specified. Even had the charter said nothing on the subject, I might have thought the society entitled to levy certain assessments from the members. This might only have been regarded as an ordinary act of administration, adopted for the purpose of securing the respectability of the body. That cannot be affirmed of this scheme. In the most favourable view which can be taken of it, it is just a bonus to these married members who have money, and are able to pay insurance for their widows, and it is a bonus granted at the expense of those members who have no money, or not enough to pay such insurance. Have the public any interest in such a scheme as that? I cannot conceive it. For my own part, I think it would just be as reasonable to give a bounty to bachelors. In fact, it would be more reasonable, because those members who abstain from marrying, leave a larger sum to be divided among the widows and children of those who do marry. The Lord Ordinary seems to think the tendency of the scheme is to diminish the number of poor widows. I rather think not. The tendency, I should think, must be the other way. It appears to me it would just have been as much within the scope of the charter to have voted away the money in providing country quarters for some of the members, or for any other purpose in which the public had no interest whatever, and the general body of the members no interest that was fair and equitable.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree entirely on the merits. Here, as in other associations, though it is left to the members to administer the funds, it is under the qualification that they must administer them for the proper objects of the association. This would hold under any contract; and though the 25th regulation gives extensive powers, it must be read under the qualification that these powers must be exercised for the common interest. In the present instance, the matter is rendered more clear by the fact that the charter was obtained long after the regulations were adopted. Something might have been said in favour of the grant under reduction, so long as the regulations formed the only law; for it might have been argued, that the society might have dissolved itself, and disposed of the funds at pleasure; but after the charter was obtained, matters stood on a different footing; for it was granted on the ground that the funds were to be employed for particular purposes, and an obligation was thus laid on the society to administer accordingly. The only question of importance then is, did this payment in 1817 fall truly within the appropriate objects of the charter? I think it impossible to hold that it did. It is no doubt true that the expenditure cannot be strictly limited to the purposes mentioned in the preamble of the charter; but still, though some latitude must be allowed, it cannot be extended to purposes evidently beyond the charter. But that is evidently the case here; for it is impossible to maintain, on any good ground, that the sum granted to this scheme was a sum devoted to charitable purposes. For such purposes the grant might have been defensible, both at common law and under the charter; but charity has nothing to do with this widows' scheme, which was instituted for the purpose of providing annuities to the widows of such members as chose to contribute to it, whatever the circumstances of these widows might prove to be. It is no doubt true, that by an annual payment every member might secure an interest in the scheme, but there were many members not in circumstances to make the payment, or derive any advantage from it, and yet to this scheme, thus restricted to particular contributors, the slump sum of £750 of the society's funds, with a certain proportion of the annual contributions, and the money paid by entrants, was voted away. Suppose the society, instead of instituting a scheme of their own, had gone to an insurance office and entered into an arrangement, by which they agreed to pay to the office a large proportion of their funds, on the condition that those of their members who chose to insure annuities to their widows should be entitled to do so on more favourable terms than the public generally, would this have been legal? Clearly not; and simply on the ground that while such an arrangement was not for the general objects of the society, the whole benefit of it was, from its very nature, confined to a limited proportion of the members. The scheme in question is very much of the same nature; and I am clear that its legality cannot be sustained. As to the form of the action, I think it rather unfortunate that the whole claim for repayment is not properly before us. I have no doubt as to the latter of the declaratory conclusions. Indeed, there is no question between the individual pursuers and the general body of solicitors who have declined to appear, and have allowed certification in absence to pass against them. So far, therefore, as the society is concerned, the whole proceedings complained of are rescinded. The contributors to the scheme as defenders, and the widows receiving annuities as compeers, are now the only parties against whom the conclusions are directed, and their situation is in many respects different from that of the society.

The pursuers having lodged a minute abandoning all claim of repetition against the widows, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Reduce, decern and declare, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and suspend the proceedings complained of, and grant interdict as craved; reserving to the pursuers and suspenders, under the qualification specified in the said minute, all right competent to them to insist for further redress in the premises, and to the defenders their defences as accords; find the defenders and respondents liable in expenses, and remit the account,” &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 73.—THE RIGHT HON. VISCOUNT MELVILLE and OTHERS (Sir R. Preston's Trustees), Pursuers, v. CAPTAIN JAMES ERSKINE WEMYSS and OTHERS (Sir William Erskine's Trustees), Defenders.

Relief—Warrandice—Sale—Held that a purchaser, against whom the Crown was proceeding with a suit in Exchequer for bygone teind-duties, was not obliged to wait the issue of that process, but was entitled to proceed with an action of relief for the purpose of determining the seller's liability under the clause of warrandice, in the event of the Crown's claim being sustained.

The Crown brought a suit in Exchequer against Sir Robert Preston's trustees, for a large amount of arrears of teinds payable under the reddendo in the original Crown-charter of certain lands which Sir Robert Preston had purchased in 1819 from Sir William Erskine's trustees. In the disposition to Sir Robert, the reddendo stated for the teinds was one penny Scots, if demanded; and the same reddendo was the only one mentioned in the titles as far back as 1796, when Sir William Erskine had obtained a Crown-charter of resignation and confirmation. Sir Robert Preston's trustees, founding on the clause of warrandice in his disposition, brought an action of relief against Sir William Erskine's Trustees, who, without consenting to become parties to the Exchequer suit, or admitting their liability under the clause of warrandice, moved the Lord Ordinary, in the action of relief, to sist procedure in hoc statu. His Lordship having pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the motion, Sir Robert Preston's trustees reclaimed, and pleaded, that though they could not be entitled to obtain decree unless the Crown succeeded in the suit, yet, since liability under the clause of warrandice was not admitted, they were entitled to proceed with the preparation of the cause, so as not to be exposed to the risk of a tedious and expensive litigation after the Crown should have compelled them, by a writ of extent, to make instant payment.

Sir William Erskine's trustees pleaded the inconvenience which would result from carrying on expensive processes of relief, which might eventually prove to have been altogether unnecessary.

Lord President.—I don't know that Sir William Erskine's trustees are liable under the particular clause of warrandice; but by superseding procedure, as the Lord Ordinary has done, we shall place Sir Robert Preston's trustees in this situation. The suit in Exchequer will proceed; and if the Crown obtain decree, not a single day's delay will take place. Implement will be compelled forthwith by means of a writ of extent. I don't think the defenders are entitled to subject them to this possible hardship.

Lord Gillies.—This is just an ordinary action of relief, founded on a clause of warrandice. In every such action there are two questions: The first is, whether there is any good ground for the attempted eviction from the purchaser? and the second, whether, supposing there is good ground for the eviction, the seller has rendered himself liable by the nature of his warrandice? Now, the defenders in this action of relief answer both these questions in the negative. They maintain that the suit of the Crown is vexatious and ill founded; and they also maintain, that if it were well founded, they are not liable. In these circumstances, I don't see how we can prevent the pursuers from proceeding to the effect of trying the question of liability. Of course they cannot be entitled to decree before the actual eviction. Had the Lord Ordinary said that the suit at the instance of the Crown was obviously foolish and groundless, we might have felt justified in sisting procedure, but this does not appear, and therefore we must recal the interlocutor.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The common course, where eviction is threatened, is to rest satisfied with intimation of the action to the party liable in warrandice; and the effect of this is, that if that party refuse to appear, he shall be held bound by what is done. This is the usual way; but there is another, viz., an action of relief; and if the purchaser does not think intimation to be sufficient, there is nothing to prevent him from bringing such an action. If, after the action of relief is raised, the defender in it admits the warrandice, there may be good ground to delay; but there is no such admission here. On the contrary, the liability is denied, and therefore the pursuers cannot be prevented from going on to get judgment, finding that the clause of warrandice is applicable. They are not bound to wait the issue of the Crown suit.

Lord Fullerton.—The present is very much a question of convenience. Were the liability in warrandice expressly denied, I would at once hold that the pursuers cannot be compelled to sist procedure; but the defences, in so far as relates to the liability, are not very explicit. I rather think one of them amounts to an acknowledgment of liability.

The Court recalled the interlocutor.

No. 74.—JOHN LOVE and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. THOMAS BROWN, Defender.

Process—Remit, Judicial, to a person of skill—A tradesman appointed by the Sheriff, in a process before him, to inspect a building, made the inspection in the absence of the parties, and dictated his report, which was taken down in writing by a writer who was the ordinary agent of the pursuer, though not his agent in that particular process. The report was objected to, and a remit was again made (the defender objecting) to the same tradesman, who gave in a second report, free from the previous irregularities, but the same in substance as the first. On the motion of the defender the tradesman was put upon oath, and deposed to the verity of his reports. Judgment having been given for the pursuer, the defender advocated, and, without impugning the integrity of the tradesman, contended that a new inspector ought to be appointed—Held that the second report was final, and could not be opened up.—Observed, That where the Court, on a general motion by the parties for a remit, appoints a particular individual who is not expressly objected to, the appointment must be held to have been made with consent.

John Love and others, his creditors, by summons, dated 12th May 1838, sued Thomas Brown, smith at Stewarton, before the Sheriff of Ayr, for the sum of £16. 13. 5., with interest from Whitsunday 1827, being the balance of an account said to be due for mason-work executed for him by Love in 1826. Brown, in his defences, stated, that in 1826 Love had engaged to build a house for him in Stewarton, in a tradesmanlike manner, for £125. 16s., and that Love, in proceeding with the work, made a sub-contract "with a person of the name of James Gillies, and between them they built the house, and received the whole contract price except £16. 13. 5., which was retained until the sufficiency of the building was ascertained. It soon became evident that the building was not executed in a tradesmanlike manner; on the contrary, that it was very insufficient, the walls admitting water and damp to a very uncommon and injurious extent, and nothing will remove this radical insufficiency, which accordingly remains to this day. Love seeing the state of matters, and being sensible that the balance in the defender's hands would not compensate the deficiency in the building, he abandoned any claim to it, and thus the transaction has stood for above fifteen years." On these grounds Brown pleaded, 1. Prescription; and 2. Not only denies resting-owing, but avers, that on an inspection and report on the sufficiency of the building, it will be found that the defender is a creditor, and not a debtor of John Love's, the latter having already received more than the insufficiency of the work entitled him to. The Sheriff-substitute, on 23d October 1838, pronounced an interlocutor decerning in terms of the libel, "in respect of the time which has elapsed,"—the house having been built in the spring of 1827, and possessed by the defender ever since, "without making any judicial complaint as to its insufficiency, and to have the same inspected." An appeal was taken to the Sheriff, and on 20th November 1838, the Sheriff-substitute, as advised by him, found,

"Primo, That the plea of prescription is not well founded, the defence implying the non-payment of the balance of account sued for. Secundo, That the pursuer, Love, was the party with whom the defender contracted, and his present defence of non-sufficiency of work is pleadable against the pursuer. Tertio, That the presumption of the defender's acquiescence in the goodness of the work, arising from the delay since it was finished, is removed by the circumstance of an unsettled balance being allowed to remain in his hands: and also by the circumstance of the pursuer having lately agreed to a reference to arbitration as to the condition of the house: Therefore alters the interlocutor complained of, and remits to the Sheriff-substitute to appoint a person of skill to inspect the house and to report, as clearly as he can, on the state of its sufficiency as originally finished, distinguishing, if possible, between original insufficiency and decay from ordinary tear and wear, and specifying the amount of damage arising from such original insufficiency, if such did exist; and to the said Sheriff-substitute to do further as he shall think just." (Signed) "WILL. EATON."

"Note.—There is no doubt of the necessity of timeous complaint as to the sufficiency of any article received in the ordinary case. But in many articles (among which a house is one) it takes some time to discover concealed faults; and nothing is more common than for the purchaser of a house to retain part of the price to answer such blemishes. No doubt it would have been more accurate in the defender to have called for an inspection sooner, and have got all matters settled; but the sum retained might seem to him a security. His delay will however operate unfavourably for him, in the difficulty of now distinguishing between any original deficiency and the effects of tear and wear. The inspector named will of course receive power to examine the parties, and make all other due investigations."

The Sheriff thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' procurators, names and appoints John Brown, builder in Kilmarnock, to inspect the house in question, and to report as clearly as he can on the state of its sufficiency, as originally finished; distinguishing, if possible, between original insufficiency and decay from ordinary tear and wear, and specifying the amount of damage arising from such original insufficiency, if such did exist."

John Brown, the inspector, reported as follows:

"In terms of a remit from the Sheriff of Ayrshire, dated the 4th of December last, in the process at the instance of John Love and others against Thomas Brown, to inspect the sufficiency of the mason-work of a house in Stewarton belonging to the said Thomas Brown, and built by the said John Love, I John Brown, builder in Kilmarnock, certify, that I this day proceeded to the said house, and inspected the same carefully, and found that the house was built originally in the same style of workmanship as similar houses in the town of Stewarton, and in a sufficient manner. The reporter, therefore, considers the contractor entitled to payment of his account claimed."

(Signed) "JOHN BROWN."

"Fees of inspection and report, one guinea, paid me by J. A. Snodgrass."

(Signed) "JOHN BROWN."

The defender lodged the following objections to the report:

"1. The inspection was made by the reporter, accompanied by the pursuer's country procurator and agent, Mr Snodgrass, writer in Stewarton, and the report is holograph of Mr Snodgrass—all done in absence of the defender, and without any intimation or communication to or with the defender or his procurator. Proceedings so utterly irregular—so perfectly unjust—cannot and will not be received by your Lordship. 2. The reporter not only so proceeded under the guidance and direction and along with the pursuer's agent, carefully concealing all the proceedings from the defender, but he neither called for the plan or specification, and consequently he could not know whether the building was in terms of the plan or specification, or not. No doubt the reporter says the house was built originally in the same style of workmanship as similar houses in the town of Stewarton. This sort of general description, unmeaning and indefinite as it clearly is, would have been quite unnecessary if the reporter had called for the plan and specification, and examined and compared the building with them, and heard the defender thereon, as he was bound to have done. 3. The defender will be prepared to show and to establish to the entire satisfaction of any inspector who will give the defender an opportunity of being present at the inspection, that the building has from the beginning admitted, and down to the present day admits, water and damp to an extent altogether inconsistent with original sufficiency of building, and clearly demonstrating the original insufficiency of the building. On these grounds, the defender submits that the report produced ought to be ordered to be withdrawn from process; and as, from the way and manner in which Mr Brown has permitted himself to be misled by the pursuer's agent, he has disqualified himself from making an impartial report in the case, the defender would humbly suggest that your Lordship appoint a respectable and experienced builder and mason in Ayr, to inspect and report, on regular previous notice of at least eight days, to both parties, and hearing them on the subject of dispute, directing him to take the plan and specification as the basis of his report, and that these may be recovered for that purpose."

The Sheriff-substitute, by an interlocutor, repelled the objections to the report, but in the circumstances found no interest due. On considering reclaiming petitions for the parties, he afterwards recalled this interlocutor, and of new remitted to Mr Brown

"to visit and inspect the house in question, in terms of the interlocutor of Court, in presence of the parties,—hear them fully upon the objections and answers to his report,—call for the plan and specifications,—and to give a new report agreeable to the interlocutor of Court."

The Sheriff, on an appeal, adhered to this interlocutor, adding the following note:

"From the Sheriff's personal knowledge of Mr Brown the inspector's character, he was satisfied that he was influenced by no improper motives; but he must say that the inspection was conducted with great looseness and irregularity—1st, In not giving both parties due notice; 2dly, In communicating with the pursuer's agent alone; 3dly, In employing the last individual to draw up his report; and 4thly, In giving in a report, loose, general, and specifying no particulars. The Sheriff trusts, that in again inspecting the subjects, he will proceed with the utmost care and caution, and make up his report himself, after he has returned home; taking such full notes and memorandums on the spot as may enable him to do so in a complete and satisfactory manner."

The following is Mr Brown's second report:

"Kilmarnock, 18th February 1840.

"In terms of a remit from the Sheriff of Ayrshire, dated the 17th of December last, in process at instance of John Love and others against Thomas Brown, all in Stewarton, to inspect and report on the house in question agreeable to the interlocutor of Court, &c.

"Having sent previous notice to the parties, I this day met them at the house in question, viz., Thomas Brown, John Love, James Montgomerie, and James Gillies, also James Stirling, the inspector appointed by Thomas Brown to superintend the building while it was going on, read over my former report, with a number of the papers both for and against said report, when both parties professed to know little about them. Gillies said he and his partner made a good job of the part of the work they executed, Mr Brown having given him a set of mason-irons to do so. Montgomerie said, so well pleased was Brown with the work after it was done, that he gave him a present of equal value to what he had given Gillies his partner. Heard both parties at full length, carefully examined the house, as compared with the plan and specification, and found them to agree in every material point, and done in a tradesmanlike manner. Brown mentioned some trifling deviations, which were not of the smallest importance. However, as Mr Stirling, the proprietor's inspector, was present, I put the question to him, if the contractors, while doing the work, wrought to his directions, and in reference to the plan and specification? He said they did, and showed every wish, while doing the work, to please both him and the proprietor. I then put the question, Was it by your advice that the proprietor retained the balance in dispute? He said it was not. After hearing all they had to say, I am of opinion that the house was built in a tradesmanlike manner, and agreeable to the plan and specification."

(Signed) "JOHN BROWN."

"In reference to my former report, and on looking it over again, I do not think I would alter it, were I to report again, taking into view the remit of the 4th December 1838, which was to report as to its sufficiency as originally finished, distinguishing, if possible, between original insufficiency and decay from ordinary tear and wear, and specifying the amount of damage arising therefrom, if any such original insufficiency did exist. Taking the remit, and all the pleadings previous to my report, they only went the length of alleging the workmanship was not done in a tradesmanlike manner. Now I think that my report bears that the house was built in a tradesmanlike manner; and as I saw no original deficiency, of course I had nothing to report on that head. His Lordship says the inspection was conducted with great looseness and irregularity. So far from that being the case, I never was at more pains in my life to come at a true report. 'Tis true I had none of the parties present; neither did I want them. The record being closed, and I had read all the papers, I certainly concluded I had before me all that was meant to be said on either side. Having business at Stewarton on the day the inspection took place with Mr Miller and Mr Snodgrass, after it was done I inquired at Mr Snodgrass where the house was situated I was to inspect; he said he would show it to me. He inquired if I did not want the parties present. I said I did not, as I had read all the papers carefully over, and that I understood from them on what I was to report. Having pointed out the house, he immediately left me, when I made as careful an inspection as was in my power. Mr Smith and I had then to go to Dunlop and Beith to inspect properties in both places. When we came back to Stewarton, we had to call on Mr Snodgrass, to inform us anent some properties we could not then find out; which when done, I asked Mr Snodgrass if he would write my report, as I had made up my mind on what I should report, which he agreed to do, and wrote as I directed; and I must observe, that it is a very common practice here, if any of the parties' procurators are at hand, to cause them write their report.

"It appears to me his Lordship has paid more attention to Mr Morton's false and calumnious assertions with regard to my inspection and report, as being done under the management and direction of Mr Snodgrass, than he ought to have done; for his statements, with regard to that inspection, is false from beginning to end. Mr Snodgrass neither interfered nor attempted to interfere with either my inspection or report, more than did Mr Morton, except that he wrote the report as I directed him.

"His Lordship will observe, that, agreeable to his remit of December last, I am instructed to hear parties, &c., &c.

"In again reading over the process and specification, I find the following document at the end of the specification."

"Stewarton, 16th September 1826.

"Having this evening taken in offers for the above specification, and as John Love, James Montgomerie, and James Gillies is the lowest offers, I do hereby accept of the said offers; and James Stirling is to inspect the said work, and settle all dispute."

(Signed) "THOMAS BROWN.

"JOHN LOVE.

"JAMES MONTGOMERIE.

"JAMES GILLIES."

"The above parties all acknowledge the signatures to be true, and this is my reason for having more parties at the inspection than is allowed in the defender's defences. In doing so, I acted to the best of my judgment; and if wrong, his Lordship, I hope, will put me right."

(Signed) "JOHN BROWN."

The defender lodged objections to this report, but these were repelled by the Sheriff-substitute, who sustained the report and decerned for the pursuer. This judgment was affirmed on 16th June 1840 by the Sheriff, who observed in a note:

"Although the present report of the inspector is not written with technical accuracy or detail on the proper professional subject of inspection, and contains a great deal of extraneous matter which would have been better omitted, yet still it includes the material points required both in form and substance. Due notice was given; all the parties interested were present, and were heard on their several allegations; the reporter examined the subjects on his own professional knowledge, and made up his report by himself, at a distance from all parties. No doubt the defender says (as unsuccessful parties usually say) that the reporter did not investigate sufficiently: but the Sheriff, who is unprofessional himself, must repose some confidence in a professional man of character, that he will take such means as he thinks sufficient to enable him to form an opinion on the matters remitted to him; more especially when the inspector was acquiesced in by both parties. The inspector declares that he took those means, and he formed a clear opinion on the result at both inspections."

The defender then moved that the reporter, Mr Brown, should be required "to verify his report on oath." The Sheriff-substitute granted the motion, and Mr Brown deponed, inter alia, "that the reports produced by the deponent are just and true reports, to the best of the deponent's knowledge." The Sheriff-substitute, "in respect of the oath of John Brown to his report," adhered to his former interlocutors; and this judgment was affirmed by the Sheriff, who added the following note:

"The Sheriff has great doubts of the competency of the whole procedure in this case, since his interlocutor of 16th June 1840. It adhered to that of the Sheriff-substitute of 31st March, finding the defender liable for the account libelled, agreeably to a former interlocutor of 23d October 1838. The case was thus final in this Court. After it was so final, a motion was made by the defender that the inspector should verify his report on oath. This is usually allowed, when made tempestive (that is before the case is final); and in extraordinary cases, a full examination of the inspector is permitted, where there seems reason for a minute expiscation of particulars. But all this was out of place after the case was final; and neither Sheriff nor Sheriff-substitute could alter the judgment pronounced. The Sheriff therefore thinks, that the motion for the inspector's oath should have been refused, as out of time. But still less was it proper to allow so minute and searching an examination as the oath, No. 34, urged for the obvious purpose of overthrowing the report already finally decided on. And to complete these irregularities, the case is brought before the Sheriff by the defender, by what is called a minute of appeal (No. 36), but which is in a form quite contrary to the Act of Sederunt, and is truly a reclaiming petition against the judgments of 16th June and 31st March, praying the Court to alter them, in respect that the oath of the inspector does away the import of his report.

"Had the Sheriff even been satisfied that this last was the case upon the merits, he could not have altered his final judgment; but his views still remain the same as expressed in the note to his last interlocutor. Though the report is not accurately or articulately drawn up, the Sheriff believes that it is substantially just, and founded on adequate means of inquiry."

The defender advocated, and put in the following additional pleas:—1. The pursuer, Love, acquiesced in the retention by the defender of the balance pursued for on account of the insufficiency of the work performed by the pursuer, having made no claim for the same during a period of fifteen years; and the present pursuers are barred by his acquiescence from now insisting for payment of the said balance. 2. The Sheriff having sustained the relevancy of the defence founded on the alleged insufficiency of the work performed by the pursuer Love, was bound to take competent and proper means of ascertaining whether the defence was well founded in point of fact. 3. As the reports by the inspector, John Brown, were made up without any inquiry into the truth of the allegations by the defender, and as they contain no sufficient information on the subject of the remit to Brown, and show from their contents that he was unfit to act under a judicial remit, they do not afford sufficient means for determining whether the defence above mentioned be well founded in point of fact. 4. The final interlocutors complained of were irregularly and incompetently pronounced.

The following additional pleas were put in by the pursuers:—1. A judicial remit having been made to the inspector, and his nomination consented to by both parties, and a report being made, it is incompetent to obtain a new remit to a different person to report on the same facts; and if objections on any ground be taken to his report, the only competent relief is by a remit to the inspector to reconsider his report. 2. The judicial inspector having in the present case reconsidered his report, and adhered to it, the same is binding and conclusive, more especially as the advocator subsequently requested him to depone to the verity thereof, which he did. 3. The defence of the advocator having been laid in the closed record solely on alleged insufficiency in the walls admitting water and damp, from the work not having been executed in a tradesmanlike manner; and parties having gone to issue on this defence, and the inspector having in his report negatived the allegation, the advocator is concluded, and it is incompetent now to allege variance between the work done and the specification. 4. Separatim. An inspector chosen by the advocator, and named in the original specification, having overlooked the progress and completion of the work, the advocator is precluded from denying its sufficiency and conformity to the specification, not having objected in any way when taken off the hands of the workmen. 5. The reports made under the judicial remit exhaust the matter in dispute between the parties, and afford sufficient grounds for a judicial determination of the point at issue, and the interlocutors complained of are in so far well founded. 6. The advocator having been found liable for the full amount of the claim pursued for, with expenses, the pursuer, in the circumstances, is entitled to interest on said claim, agreeable to the conclusions of the summons,—at all events to bank interest.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"9th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause, recalls the interlocutors complained of, finds that the advocator is not foreclosed by the reports of the inspector John Brown, but that he (as well as the respondent) is entitled to be allowed to prove his averments otherwise, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that it may be settled how the parties propose to proceed, and reserves all questions of expenses.

"Note.—The case has been conducted so very irregularly in the Inferior Court that it is not easy to clear it. But the Lord Ordinary thinks,—1st, That as the first remit was not made of consent of parties, but ex proprio motu of the Sheriff, it could not be held to have been acquiesced in by the advocator, merely by his not petitioning against it; 2d, That even though it had been expressly consented to, the very objectionable manner in which the inspector did the business, would have justified the advocator in resisting, not only that report but any other remit to that person; 3d, That when the Sheriff renewed the remit to him, the advocator did object to this step on clearly good grounds; 4th, That when the Sheriff decided the cause on the second report, whether the interlocutor became final in law or not, he (the Sheriff) did not hold it to have become final, because he allowed farther proceedings; 5th, That the advocator's obtaining the oath of the inspector on the second report, does not bar him from objecting both to the report and to the remit.

"This last is the point on which the advocacy turns. The respondent holds, that making an inspector verify his report on oath, excludes the party who does so from challenging the remit. The Lord Ordinary thinks this not a necessary conclusion. There is no inconsistency in protesting against the propriety of a remit, and yet, since a Sheriff will persist in making it, moving that the inspector be required to verify it. This is done under an implied reservation of previous objections. Such remits, when fairly conducted, ought to receive great support from our Courts; but there is no judicial comfort in adhering to them, when they are tainted by irregularities on the part of the inspector."

The pursuers reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—When I first read the papers, I had great doubts of the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and these doubts have since been confirmed. There is something irregular in the whole course of the litigation, which is apt to prejudice one's mind; but laying aside these irregularities as not affecting the substance of the procedure, the only question for consideration now is, whether there is any necessity for farther investigation by a fresh inspector. I put no stress on what is called the reporter's egregious departure from propriety in employing the agent of one of the parties as his amanuensis in writing out the report. Snodgrass, whom he so employed, was not the agent in the actual process before the Sheriff; and though it is admitted that the reporter first asked him to point out the premises, and afterwards employed him to take down the report at the reporter's own dictation, as it is not averred that Snodgrass was present during the inspection, or made any correction on the report, I cannot think these circumstances sufficient to disqualify the reporter, whose strict integrity there is no reason to doubt. As to the other objection, that the pursuer had told the reporter of the process, and that the reporter had taken the trouble to read the pleadings, I don't think it of any importance. He wished to make himself master of the whole matter, and it does not appear that his report was unduly influenced by it. Then comes the more serious objection, that he made his inspection in the absence of the parties. This was certainly irregular, but the irregularity did not rest so much with the inspector as with the Sheriff-substitute, who simply remitted to him to inspect and report, without saying anything about the presence of the parties. This irregularity was corrected by the second report; for I think the Sheriff, who knew that the reporter was a most respectable individual, did right in not superseding him, and remitting to another. Indeed the defender admits, that though he objected to a new inspection by Mr Brown, it was with no intention to impugn his character. In this second report he adheres to the decided opinion he had given in his first, with a notandum, which is said to display an animus that disqualified him from being inspector. I don't wonder at his observations. Having made his report in good faith, he must have been more stolid than the wall he was employed to inspect, if he had been insensible to the reflections which had been made. He thinks an imputation had been cast upon his honesty, and he says, in language not disrespectful, what an honest man might be supposed to feel in the circumstances. The Sheriff properly repels the objection to the second report, and then the defender comes forward and moves that the reporter be ordained to verify it on oath. The Sheriff agrees to this (irregularly I think), and then after the defender has subjected him to this ordeal—to this species of legal torture—he now tells us we are not to look either at the report or the deposition. I cannot enter into this. He has done his utmost to shake the accuracy of the report, and having failed, he would now get quit of it altogether. On this point, nothing can be more strong than the case of Dickson v. The Monkland Canal Company, (House of Lords, 29th June 1825). A remit had been made, with the acquiescence of the parties, to an engineer, who gave in a report. Mr Dickson contended that the report was inaccurate, and endeavoured to get quit of it. The Court here repelled the objections, and the House of Lords, on appeal, founding on Dickson's acquiescence in the remit, affirmed the judgment in so far as it repelled these. Lord Gifford, in delivering the judgment, thus expressed himself: "In Scotland, as in England, I apprehend that where parties consent that a thing shall be done on the judgment of a particular individual, they must be bound by that consent, and therefore, it appears to me that Mr Dickson must be bound by the judgment of Mr Telford." There are many other decisions to the same effect; and it would evidently be a departure from the principles of these decisions to sustain the objections of the defender.

Lord Gillies.—I concur in every one word that your Lordship has said, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to go over the proceedings. Indeed, I am unable to see any good objection to the first report. By the terms of the remit, if there was no original insufficiency, it was impossible for the reporter to do more than say there was none. It is true he was asked to distinguish between original insufficiency and ordinary tear and wear. This could only mean he was to distinguish, provided there was insufficiency. Plainly, if there was none, it was an utter impossibility to make a distinction. Then it is said, that he ought to have called parties before him. Perhaps he ought, but power to do so should have been expressly given him. He could not go beyond the terms of the remit, and therefore, the absence of parties, if an irregularity, is an irregularity for which he is not to blame. It is said that the report was vague—that it ought to have stated the various particulars. What particulars? Was he to have specified all the doors and windows, and made remarks on each? The report would, in that case, have been as long as the pleadings. He tells what is sufficient; and had we had nothing before us but the first report, I would have been clear for sustaining it. By declining to sustain such reports as these, we should just be putting an end to the very useful and necessary practice of ordering remits.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur. If the remit had been made by the authority of the Court alone, without the consent of the parties, I might have had some difficulty. The Lord Ordinary supposes this to have been the case, but erroneously; for the remit was made on the motion of the defender. He did not ask that the inspector should be appointed by himself, and when Mr Brown was appointed by the Court, he did not reclaim. In these circumstances, I hold the appointment equivalent to a remit with consent. Now, though such a remit is not a judicial reference in the ordinary sense, binding parties as in an arbitration, it is so far of the nature of it, that after the remit has been made, parties are not entitled either to go into a proof at large, or have a new remit, unless there is some gross failure on the part of the individual appointed. There can be no doubt that this is the rule. I recollect many instances of it in the Outer-House. I always took care, in ordering remits, to state in the interlocutor that it was done with consent; and this was never objected to. Here the party moved for a remit, and I think the Sheriff would have been entitled, in remitting to Brown, to say that it was done with consent. If I had any objection to the procedure, it would be of a different kind. I am doubtful if there should have been any remit at all, for it would rather appear that the pursuer was not answerable for the particular parts of the work in which the deficiency was alleged, as it had been done by separate contract. The Sheriff, however, has not gone on that, and we cannot now take it up. Was there then any fault committed by the reporter so gross as to call for a new reporter, or a proof at large? I don't think there was. It would be highly unsafe to open the matter up. As to the first report, I think there was good ground for exception. Whether the fault was owing to the reporter or the Sheriff, the inspection ought undoubtedly to have taken place at the sight of parties. It is not customary, I believe, to give an express order for this, but it must always be understood. No doubt a mason may judge as accurately in the absence of parties as in their presence, but it may be otherwise; for they may be able to call his attention to objects which he might be apt to overlook. But then he makes a second report when the parties are present, and adheres to his former judgment. There the case ought to have ended. No party had a right to go farther. I concur in your Lordship's observations on the additional remarks made by the reporter. Perhaps he had been a little too much blamed, and he felt it. As to the employment of Snodgrass, the agent of one of the parties, to write the report, it is not a practice to be recommended. It was right in the defender to notice it, but it did not amount to corruption. I have no idea at all that there was anything in the reporter but the most perfect honesty. As to the oath, I think the report would have been as good without it. As it is, it cannot make the matter worse; and, at all events, it bars us from putting it. Without further observation, I think we must alter the interlocutor.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree entirely with the views now expressed by Lord Mackenzie.

The Court altered the interlocutor, and remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff.

No. 75.—MAGISTRATES and TOWN COUNCIL of JEDBURGH, Pursuers, v. JOHN MADDER and OTHERS, Defenders.

Process.—Proof.—Commission and Diligence.

In an action of declarator of a right of thirlage and for abstracted multures, two separate issues were prepared to try these questions. At this stage the Lord Ordinary granted a diligence for the recovery not only of writings tending to instruct the right of thirlage, but also of all books, accounts, and other documents of the defenders, instructive of the multures abstracted. The defenders reclaimed, and craved to have the diligence restricted to the recovery of writings tending to instruct the right of thirlage. On the suggestion of the Court, the pursuers agreed to postpone the trying of the second issue until the first should be determined. And in respect of this consent, the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to restrict the diligence hoc statu.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 76.—ELIZABETH WILSON, Pursuer, v. ARCHIBALD BROWN, Defender.

Parent and Child.—Paternity.—Illegitimate Child.—Oath in Supplement.—Circumstances held not sufficient to amount to a semiplena probatio, so as to have entitled a party to her oath in supplement.

Parent and Child.—Judicial Declaration.—Question, Whether the declaration of a defender at the outset of a cause, before proof, and before a suspicion has been established against him, is consistent with the principles applicable to the relation between pursuer and defender?

Proof.—Witness.—Disqualification.—A witness, the mother of the pursuer, deposed in initialibus, that the child for whose aliment the action was raised, was in part supported by the earnings of the deponent,—that she had expressed her approval of the instituting of the action,—and that she had asked the other witnesses what they had said.—Held that she was disqualified, on the ground of interest and interference in the cause.

This was an action for the aliment of a child brought forth by the pursuer on the 12th April 1840, and alleged to have been begotten on her in fornication by the defender, a Glasgow warper, on the 15th July 1839. It was proved that the pursuer, a weaver's daughter, was on intimate terms with the defender's family; that she met with him on the night in question, in the presence of his sister and a girl called Amelia Dawson; that they all went together into a public-house and had some drink; that thereafter they went to the defender's father's house, where they remained for a while. The pursuer, the defender, and Dawson then left, and went into another public-house, where they had some whisky. Thereafter the three went to the pursuer's mother's house, but the mother being the worse of liquor, would not allow her daughter to enter, and beat Dawson down stairs. Thereupon the three went to Dawson's house, which the pursuer and defender left together about twelve o'clock. According to the judicial declaration of the defender, he then went home with the pursuer, and remained about an hour at the foot of the stair leading up to the pursuer's house, or at the close mouth, which, he added, was occasioned by the pursuer not getting into her mother's house. In the course of the proof led by the pursuer, her mother was produced; and being interrogated in initialibus, deposed,

"That she has had some conversation with the pursuer as to this case; and being interrogated, if she gave the pursuer any advice to prosecute the defender? Depones, That her daughter, the pursuer, said she was going to do so, and the deponent said it was very right, as they were not able to keep it: That the child lives in the house with the deponent, and is kept by the earnings of the deponent and the pursuer. Interrogated, Whether her daughter told her what any of the witnesses said when examined for the pursuer, and if so, what they said? Depones, That her daughter was not present, but some of the witnesses told deponent something of what had been said, and she asked some of them what they said, and they accordingly told her something what they said."

An objection having been taken to the admissibility of the witness, upon which the defender craved the opinion of the Court, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Glasgow, 9th November 1840.—Having considered the objections and answers to the admissibility of the pursuer's proposed witness, Margaret Wilson, for the reasons stated in the annexed note, alters the deliverance of the commissioner; sustains the objections to the admissibility of said witness, and ordains the sealed packet, No. 15, containing her deposition taken, to lie in retentis, to be withdrawn from process."

(Signed) "HENRY GLASSFORD BELL."

"Note.—The proposed witness is the mother of the pursuer. This, of course, since the passing of the Act 3d and 4th Victoria, cap. 59, is no sufficient objection; but in her initial examination, the mother has admitted circumstances clearly sufficient to exclude her, on the ground both of interest and partial counsel. She depones, 'That she has had some conversation with the pursuer as to this case,' &c., as quoted above. Now, though the late Act provides that it shall not be imperative to reject a witness, who, without any culpable negligence or criminal intent, has been present in Court during the proceedings, there is, in the present instance, a very different species facti admitted than the accidental overhearing the depositions of other witnesses. There is not only the conversation with the pursuer as to the case, and not only the being told by other witnesses out of Court what they had said, but the actual asking these witnesses to tell, and receiving the information in consequence. It would be extremely dangerous to hold that the recent Act countenances the admissibility of witnesses who, by their own act, and from their anxiety as to the issue of the cause, have made themselves acquainted with the evidence given previous to their own examination. It is settled by numerous decisions, that the mere circumstance of being present at a consultation disqualifies a witness, even although nothing passed at the consultation regarding the point as to which the witness is adduced, and surely, multo magis, disqualification must ensue, if a party has gone about and obtained from preceding witnesses the substance of their depositions. On the ground of interest, the objection is no less fatal. From the time of Lord Stair downwards, the rule has been preserved inviolate, that a direct pecuniary interest disqualifies, that is, when the witness can either gain or lose by the judgment to be pronounced. 'It may be observed,' says Mr Tait, 'that where the interest of the witness is direct, the rule of disqualification is universal, and applies to every case, however inconsiderable the pecuniary interest may be, or however high the character and fortune of the proposed witness may raise him above suspicion.' Now, the mother of the pursuer admits that the child is partly supported by her exertions, and is a burden on her. The interest, therefore, in the issue of the action is such as, according to all the decisions and authorities, must exclude her."

This judgment was affirmed on appeal to the Sheriff, and on the 16th December 1840, the Sheriff-substitute found that the pursuer had failed to establish a semiplena probatio against the defender, and assoilzied him from the conclusions of the summons. On appeal, the Sheriff altered this interlocutor, and allowed the pursuer her oath in supplement, adding the following note:

"The grounds on which the Sheriff conceives that a semiplena probatio has been made out here, according to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, are these:—The child is proved to have been born at its full time on the 12th of April 1840; now, on the Monday after the Glasgow Fair of 1839, which was about the 8th of July, or just nine months and six days before the pursuer and defender are proved to have been together in a public house at the Broomielaw, when 'she used a great many freedoms with his person,' after which they went out together and alone. It is proved, moreover, that on one occasion, in December 1839, the defender was seen coming out early in the morning from the pursuer's house, and a man's voice was heard there the night before, so as to have impressed on a neighbouring woman the belief that he was there all night; and farther, it is proved that the pursuer had long been on intimate terms with the defender, and had lived in his house, in so much so that many of the neighbours looked upon them as lad and lass. These circumstances taken together, and especially the first, are much stronger than those that occurred in the case of Lennox v. Agnew, decided by Lord Jeffrey in 1839, where the Court allowed the oath in supplement to be taken."

The defender having advocated the cause, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"25th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the advocator, and considered the process, repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits to the Sheriff simpliciter: Finds the advocator liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—Independently of various other circumstances, the semiplena probatio is established by the single fact in the advocator's own declaration, viz.,—he and the respondent were an hour or so together, and by themselves, in a stair about midnight. He argued that this was 'only opportunity;' what else is being in bed?

"It was not the pursuer's business to call the defender's father at first, because the fact of minority only transpired in the course of the proceedings, and after, his citation on incident diligence was sufficient, if his citation at all was necessary in such a case.

"The Lord Ordinary having decided for the respondent, has had no occasion to give any judgment on the objection to the admissibility of her mother; but his opinion is, that she was legally rejected."

The advocator reclaimed, and pleaded—

That this was not only a clear case, but also an honest one. The defender is decerned against entirely on an admission contained in his declaration which could not have been proved otherwise. The ground of the judgment is, that there was opportunity; if this be sufficient, then the law is in a most dangerous state. There must not only be opportunity, but facts denoting that there was an intent in the parties to avail themselves of it. The occasion of meeting was not sought after by the defender; and if the pursuer were the puella intacta she represents herself to have been, she is not likely to have surrendered her virtue for the first time in such a situation. The point as to the inadmissibility of the pursuer's mother as a witness, is not raised in the additional pleas; and this is not a question of status, where the Court ex proprio motu might suggest a new plea.

Replied—

That the plea is raised on the record, and the whole case comes up by advocacy, so that the Court may review every interlocutor pronounced in the cause.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—You had a plea, but waived it. Your only plea in the advocacy is, that you have proved the defender to be the father of the child in question by competent and sufficient evidence, but you did not ask the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on the rejection of the witness.

Lord Moncreiff.—If we were all clear as to adhering, this state of matters might be very well; but if we are not, a very little additional evidence might turn the scale, particularly where there is such difference of opinion.

Anderson.—The Lord Ordinary gives no judgment upon the point, and the Court may either dispose of it now, or remit to the Lord Ordinary. The additional pleas are merely supplementary to those stated in the Inferior Court.

Lord Moncreiff.—The Lord Ordinary indicates his opinion, that the witness was legally rejected, and if you can now satisfy us that she was not, then we can remit.

Anderson resumed.—In order to disqualify a witness on the ground of interest, it must be direct, and not collateral. The mere fact of the child living in the witness' house is not sufficient, for there was no legal obligation on her to maintain the child. As to the ground of partial counsel, a witness will be rejected if it appears that the party has been tampering with him; where the witness is brought to a consultation by the party, this also disqualifies; but if the witness be brought by a third party, or is present by accident, the objection does not hold; for a party is not to suffer because the witness has done what is not regular and proper.

Lord Medwyn.—I have no difficulty in thinking that the witness was properly rejected. The grounds of interest and partial counsel are distinct in themselves; but here they are combined. If the witness had an interest, this might move her to make the inquiries which she did. No doubt there was no legal obligation on her to maintain the child, but she admits the fact that she was maintaining it, and that the object of the action was to get quit of this burden. This makes her the more anxious to know what the witnesses were saying, and thus she was enabled to fashion her own testimony.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion, and that the grounds of the objection cannot be taken separately. If the ground of interest stood alone, it might not be sufficient; but de facto she was maintaining the child; and knowing that she was to be examined as a witness, she not only accidentally learns what the others had said, but she goes and asks them. She did this with a view to regulate her own testimony; and in the circumstances, I think she was disqualified.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur entirely. Whether there was a legal interest or not, or whether that interest was direct or consequential, is of no moment, in considering its effect upon the objection on the ground of interference. It is clear the witness did not go to the others to ask unimportant questions. If she did, the pursuer should have pushed the examination, and seen what it was that was stated to her in answer. The Statute rendering her a competent witness, ought to have made her the more cautious in keeping herself pure. The objection is not so much one of partial counsel, as an interference in the cause with the view of preparing herself to give evidence.

On the merits:

Lord Medwyn.—The case may be a narrow one, but looking to the whole circumstances, I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—At first I was of the opinion of Lord Medwyn, but I have great doubt of it now. The parties were intimate, and if they were regarded as lad and lass, it was undoubtedly in carrying on an honourable courtship. They had been in many situations more favourable to intercourse, and nothing came of it. They met accidentally on the night of the 15th July 1839, and there is no concealment in the matter. There was also, as is proved by Dawson, a real difficulty in the pursuer getting into her mother's house. They then went to Dawson's, and after remaining some time, the pursuer and defender again went to try and get in to her own house. It just comes to this, they remained an hour together at the foot of the stair, when there was a real object, viz., to get admission, which had been refused. I have great difficulty in holding that this amounts to more than suspicion, and I think it would be hazardous to find that it was more.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur in the difficulties which have been expressed. In cases of this description, we are too apt to lose sight of the principles applicable to the relation between a pursuer and defender. I never can see the principle upon which a man's judicial declaration is to be taken before the proof, or a case of suspicion has been made out against him; and where this is done, I will always give a defender the fullest benefit of his declaration in his own favour, where that declaration is candid. Here it is candid; and we must take his reasons for meeting with the pursuer on the night alleged. I don't put much upon their drinking together, considering the rank of life to which they belong. They then go home to his father's house, and this is favourable to both parties. He afterwards goes home with the pursuer, with the intention of leaving her there, and then going home with Dawson. The mother is the worse of drink, and not only refuses the pursuer admittance, but beats Dawson down stairs. They then go to Dawson's, and afterwards the lad takes charge of her to see her home. She was the companion of his sister, and was intimate in his own family. His conduct, therefore, was most natural; and he acted both kindly and properly. For a considerable time the pursuer can't get into her mother's house, and they remain together. Now, what does this woman ask me to believe,—that she, a respectable person, intimate in the defender's family, allows herself to be overcome for the first time in a common stair; a situation likely enough for prostitution, but not for the seduction of a virtuous girl. If any thing suspicious had been seen or heard, that would have been different; because facts overcome presumption. In all the cases, there was some suspicious fact accompanying the opportunity; here we have nothing suspicious. They remained an hour together, but the defender says it was because the pursuer was shut out. This might have been contradicted by the mother, but she goes and disqualifies herself; and it is not the fault of the defender that he could not show that her intoxication continued, and that she did not hear them asking admittance. Justice to the defender requires that his declaration be taken with its qualification. The circumstances are only suspicious, and do not create a reasonable belief in my mind.

Lord Medwyn.—I entirely dissent from the observations made by your Lordship against the practice of taking judicial declarations. The declarations of both parties are often the best way of getting at the truth, and saving a proof altogether. It is the general practice, and I should be sorry to see it departed from. If the defender wants the judicial declaration of the pursuer, it is always in his power to get it.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have no objection to declarations, but to their being taken at the outset of the cause.

NO. 77.—ALEXANDER MOREEN, Petitioner.

Poors' Roll—Certificate under A. S., 16th June 1819—1. Circumstances in which a certificate was sustained, though signed by the minister and elders on different papers. 2. The certificate does not require to be given in kirk-session.

Alexander Moreen, a parishioner of Marnoch, with the view of being admitted to the poors' roll, applied to the minister and elders for the usual certificate. The minister, intimated a meeting of the kirk-session for that purpose from the pulpit; but none of the elders having attended, he signed the certificate, and accompanied it with a statement that the elders had "declined to act in this matter." This declinature was brought under the notice of the Court by the applicant's counsel, and warrant was granted to cite them before the Court "should they still continue to decline to act in this matter."

The cause being again called,

Rutherford, for the elders, stated—

That they had first become acquainted with their alleged declinature from the notice which had been taken of it in the newspapers. The state of matters in Marnoch was well known. Mr Edwards had been inducted in consequence of legal proceedings in this Court, but the great body of the parishioners did not acknowledge him as their minister; and the elders, from the same feeling, refused either to attend his church, or to meet with him in kirk-session. In this way the intimation from the pulpit had never been communicated to them; and Mr Edwards, knowing the circumstances, was not warranted in certifying, as he had done, that the elders declined to act in the matter. The certificate required by the Act of Sederunt might be given without any meeting of the kirk-session, and therefore an intimation of a meeting of kirk-session was not the kind of intimation which the elders were entitled to receive. Their absence from such a meeting might have warranted Mr Edwards to certify that they refused to act with him as a kirk-session, but gave no warrant whatever for certifying that they declined to act in the matter of giving a certificate to an applicant for the poors' roll. After the interlocutor of the Court was served upon them, with notice of a diet to be held for the purpose of granting the certificate, the elders appeared to act; and though they refused to sign a paper with the minister, bearing, "that we, the undersigned minister and elders," &c., they signed another in exactly the same terms, except that it commenced with the words, "we, the undersigned elders," &c. They tendered this certificate to the applicant, but, strange to say, he declined to receive it, and took a protest that they should be held liable to him in all the consequences of refusing to grant a certificate. One would have thought that if his only object was to get on the poors' roll, he would have been glad to have received the certificate in any form which he could make available; but he now appears to argue against the sufficiency of his own certificate, and subject the elders in expenses on the ground of its insufficiency. The question thus raised, therefore, is, Whether the Act of Sederunt requires that the minister and elders must meet in kirk-session to grant this certificate? Now, the Act of Sederunt says nothing of a kirk-session at all. It simply requires a certificate signed by the minister and two elders. Here the certificate is in all respects in terms of the Act of Sederunt, except that it is contained on two separate papers,—the signature of the minister being on the one, and those of the elders on the other. Is it necessary to construe the Act of Sederunt so strictly? Because it uses the word "certificate," must those elders who, from any cause, decline to sign with the minister, while they offer to sign separately, be held guilty of a contempt of Court? Many causes may be imagined which might justify elders in refusing to act with the minister; but whatever these causes may be—should they amount to nothing more than certain scruples—there is nothing in the Act of Sederunt compelling them to forego them, if they prefer signing separately. It is evident from the language which the elders have used in their written statement, that they entertain all proper deference for the Court. There is no desire on their part, still less on that of their counsel, to question the authority of the Act of Sederunt, which is most expedient and beneficial. But, undoubtedly, if the matter were to be carried farther, and a rigid construction of the Act to be determined on, there would be room for grave consideration as to the competency of issuing such an Act of Sederunt, and issuing it under the penalty of subjecting in expenses, or something more serious, those not observing it to the very letter. That, however, is a question which the elders have no interest and no wish to raise. The first person deserving blame is Mr Edwards, who misled the Court by a false statement; and the next party to blame is the applicant himself. What right had he to say,—I won't take a separate certificate from you: I have got one from the minister; and if you refuse to sign it, it is at your peril? It looks as if there were other matters here than the obtaining of a certificate.

Ross, for the applicant, stated—

That he had no wish, and no interest to object to the separate certificates, if the Court should be pleased to sustain their sufficiency; but the Act of Sederunt speaks only of a certificate; and the applicant had certainly an interest in seeing that what the elders offered him was such as the Act of Sederunt required. With regard to the declinature to act, it was well known, that whether the signing of the certificate were a sessional act or not, the usual mode of intimating a diet for doing it, was by notice from the pulpit. Mr Edwards had adopted this usual mode; and presuming, from the non-appearance of the elders, that they declined to act, he was entitled to certify the fact. One thing is certain, that these elders, by continuing to hold office while they declined to discharge its duties, instead of resigning their office, and allowing their place to be supplied by others who would discharge them, had subjected the applicant to great delay, trouble and expense; and for these he would submit that he was clearly entitled to reparation.

Lord President.—I am bound to state, that from the terms in which Mr Edwards has couched his statement, I was led to believe that his elders had declined to act in this particular matter. I did not understand him to mean that he had got no elders who would act with him in any matter. It was under the impression of a distinct refusal in the particular matter that I suggested the interlocutor which the Court pronounced. Now, however, the circumstances are fully before us, and the case bears a very different complexion. With regard to the Act of Sederunt, I think that, on a fair construction of its terms, it is impossible to hold that what it requires is an act of the kirk-session. Had that been the thing required, the Act would have mentioned the kirk-session, and been satisfied, as in all sessional acts, with the signature of the minister as moderator. Instead of that, it mentions only the minister and two elders. Now, it appears that we have a certificate by the minister and by the elders, but on separate papers; and the question is, ought such a certificate to be sustained? I am inclined to sustain it as a bona fide compliance with the Act of Sederunt. It is quite evident that these elders meant no disrespect to the Court, and that there is no reality in the statement, that they personally declined to act in the matter. This is clear, both from their own written statement, and the statement now made by their counsel; and I therefore move the Court to sustain the certificate. We have nothing to do here with the state of matters in the kirk-session.

Lord Gillies concurred.

Lord Mackenzie.—When this matter was formerly before us, my impression was the same as your Lordship's. I am clear that the Act of Sederunt does not contemplate a proceeding by the kirk-session. If it did so, it would of course require that the certificate should be granted, at least, by a majority of the kirk-session. On the contrary, the number of elders may be a dozen; and though ten of them may be against granting the certificate, yet if two of them, with the minister, concur in granting it, it is sufficient. The only question is, whether we can sustain this certificate, where the minister and elders sign on separate documents? I cannot comprehend their scruples to sign with the minister. It seems to me they might just as well refuse to read the same newspaper with him; but that is their matter; and I think the circumstance of their signing separately is too insignificant to call for a rejection of the certificate. With regard to the power of the Court to enforce the Act of Sederunt, I at one time thought, that in the case of a refusal, all that the Court could do was to bring up the recusants, and make them give evidence as witnesses. I have changed that opinion. I think that, as the proper object of the Act is to save the expenses of process, the Court are entitled, under the Statute authorising them to make acts for that purpose, to enforce this Act.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur entirely.

The Court sustained the certificate.

Act. Ross.—Alt. Rutherford.—[H.B.]

18th January 1842.

No. 78.—NICOL ROBERTSON, Pursuer, v. ALEXANDER DAVIDSON and OTHERS, Defendants.

Friendly Society—Forfeiture—Acquiescence—Proof—Under a regulation of a friendly society saving from forfeiture those members who could prove to the satisfaction of the society that they had been "prevented from paying up, either by imprisonment in a foreign country, or some other urgent necessity"—Held competent for a member, eight years after his forfeiture had been declared, to prove that he had been so prevented.

In 1803, a society was formed in Stromness under the name of the "Friendly Society of the Village of Stromness for the relief of Widows, Orphans, and Disabled Men." It was provided that the society should consist of two classes—the one containing those who, on becoming members, were not above thirty years of age, paid £2 of entry-money, and contributed 2s. 6d. quarterly, or 10s. 6d. annually; and the other class containing those who paid only £1 as entry-money, and 1s. 3d. quarterly, or 5s. annually. The 15th article of the society is as follows:

"If any member shall not, before the last Wednesday of November, have paid, or at least shall then pay, the quarterly payments due from his class for the year preceeding, then, and in that case, such members shall be liable to pay, as the penalty of such neglect, for the first time, the sum of one quarter's payment of his class; for the second neglect two quarters' payments; and for the third offence three quarters' payments of his class, and that in addition to, and along with the arrears of quarterly payments due by him; and if any member shall be deficient in paying up his quarterly payments for the space of four years successively, then his name shall be struck off from the list of subscribers, and his widow and children shall not be entitled to any benefit from the funds, unless he can prove, to the satisfaction of the society, that he has been prevented from paying up, either by imprisonment in a foreign country, or some other urgent necessity."

The 22d article provided:

"If any member of the society shall, by misfortune or accidents, be rendered unable to gain a subsistence for himself or his family, such member shall be entitled to such annuity as his widow or children would have received,—the members of the society, or the committee for the time, to be judges of his claim for inability, and to sustain or reject the same as they shall see cause."

The pursuer, Nicol Robertson, was an original member of the first class, and continued in the regular payment of his contributions till 1820. He also paid £1 to account of arrears in 1823. The 24th article of the society provides, that intimation of the time and place of the quarterly meetings should be intimated to the members; and, in accordance with that article, these quarterly meetings were intimated to Robertson till 1829, when he was declared to have forfeited his right, and his name was struck off from the list of members. It did not appear that this proceeding had been regularly communicated to him, but after it, the intimation of the quarterly meetings which he had previously received was discontinued. In 1834, the capital of the society, composed chiefly of contributions of the members, but partly also of donations from the Hudson's Bay Company, Sir William Forbes and others, amounted to above £700, but the affairs of the society were said to be by no means in a flourishing condition, as the number of members paying regularly their quarter pennies was only twenty, while the fund was burdened with twenty-five widows and pensioners of the first class, and five of the second. The articles of the society did not contain any provision for its dissolution; but at a meeting in November 1835, a motion for dissolving the society was discussed, and an adjourned meeting was fixed for the last Wednesday of February 1836, for the purpose of finally disposing of the motion. This meeting was not intimated to the pursuer, who was living in Stromness, but was advertised in the newspapers of the district. The meeting in February unanimously agreed to the dissolution, which was said to have been afterwards consented to by the widows and pensioners. In January 1837, when a meeting of the committee was held, the following petition was given in by the pursuer:

"Stromness, January 17th 1837.—Unto the President, Vice-President, and Committee of the Friendly Society of Stromness, Nicol Robertson Humbly Showeth, That he is one of the first founders of that Society, and one of the first class, and paid into it I think for more than twenty years, and never left paying into it, until by severe rheumatisms and severe fever, rendered me next to miserable, by losing the strength nearly of one side, which has rendered me cripple for more than twenty years, which is well known to you all; and although I never pleaded poverty so long as I was able to make a small fend for myself, with the help of friends, in an honest way, I certainly was entitled to help from our Society, although I did not ask it from the day I left paying into it; and now when the funds of the Society is begun to be divided among able and stout men, I hope you will see it just, when you consider the above facts, that I am entitled to my right and lawful share along with you, and send it me accordingly, as you have done to others, without putting you or me to any further trouble.

"I am, Gentlemen, your most obedient servant."
(Signed) "NICOL ROBERTSON, senior."

The petition was refused; but on making the final division of the funds, it was agreed to set apart about £100 for the paying twenty-five per cent. upon the respective contributions of those individuals "who had become defaulters through carelessness, inattention, or perhaps through poverty." The pursuer declined to accept of this provision, and brought the present action, in which he averred that his failure to pay his contributions was caused by an inability which would have entitled him to become a pensioner on the funds, and concluded that the defenders, Alexander Davidson and others, members of the society, should be compelled either to pay him the annuity of a first-class member, or the amount of the contributions which he had paid to the society, with interest.

The following are his pleas in law:—1. The pursuer's inability to pay his contributions since the year 1823, afforded sufficient excuse for non-payment thereof; and the alleged minute striking him off the list of members was irregular and illegal. 2. The pursuer, as a disabled member of the said friendly society, is entitled to such annuity from the funds of the said society as his widow or children would have received had he been dead. The pursuer being always ready and willing to pay up the arrears of his contributions, if it shall be found that he is bound so to do, the said annuity is payable, as concluded for in the libel. 3. For the purpose of ascertaining the amount of said annuity, the defenders are bound to produce the whole minutes, minute-books, accounts, books, vouchers, papers, securities, and other documents of and concerning the society, with full and particular states of their annual income and other funds, and the application and distribution thereof, and of the various widows, orphans, and other annuitants thereon. 4. The defenders having taken upon them to declare the society dissolved, and divided the funds among themselves, are jointly and severally liable to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £100, or such other sum as shall be ascertained to be the value of said annuity as at the 17th January 1837. 5. The minute of the defenders, bearing that they dissolved the society, was ultra vires of the defenders, and unauthorised by the rules of the society, and contrary to the objects and purposes of its formation, and wholly illegal. 6. In the event of the pursuer not being found entitled to said annuity as a disabled member of said society, the defenders are liable, conjunctly and severally, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £29. 7. 6., being the amount of the pursuer's contributions to the funds of said society, with interest, as concluded for in the libel.

The defenders pleaded—1. As the pursuer ceased in the year 1829 to be a member of the society, he has no title to pursue this action, or right to obtain, in any form, aid or benefit from the society's funds. 2. As the association was merely a private society, it was competent to dissolve it at any time by consent of its members; who, along with the other parties interested, were entitled to distribute the funds among themselves. 3. As the pursuer had forfeited and lost the right of membership in 1829, by being eight successive years in arrear of his quarterly contributions, he was validly and effectually struck off the list of members, and from thence ceased to have any right or interest in the society or its funds. 4. Even on the supposition that his statement in regard to his alleged state of health were true, his averment is not relevant to warrant either conclusion of the summons, for it was a quality and condition of a member's right to purge the irritancy incurred by his failure to make his contributions for four years, that he should prove to the satisfaction of the society, or committee of its members, that he was prevented from making such payment by imprisonment in a foreign country, or some other urgent necessity; but not only was no attempt of the kind made by the pursuer, but his failure to make it is admitted by the pursuer. 5. Esto the pursuer's claim had been competent during the existence of the society, it is altogether inadmissible now, after the society has been legally dissolved, and the funds distributed among those having right to them; and, even on the condition of tendering payment of his arrears, he has effectually excluded himself from a claim upon the funds under any conditions. 6. Farther, on the supposition that the pursuer's statements were relevant to warrant the conclusions of the summons, or either of them, the averments are groundless in fact. Lastly, The defenders are not bound to exhibit their books, papers, and states of their accounts to the pursuer; but they are, on the contrary, entitled to absolvitor from all the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

"7th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the pursuer, and then, of consent, made avizandum, and considered the process, finds, that in the circumstances, the pursuer has no well-founded claim against the defenders: Sustains this defence, assolizies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report.

Note.—The Lord Ordinary does not attach so much importance to the dissolution of the society as the defenders seem to do; because, if it be true that the pursuer continued a member, it could not be dissolved, in so far as his interests were concerned, without his consent: But he decides chiefly upon the long period of admitted arrear, and the still longer period of admitted acquiescence in the resolution striking him off. Even though this resolution had been liable to all the objections stated against it, the fact is not disputed, that after being struck off in February 1829, he made no complaint till January 1837, though he was living all the while in or near Stromness, the smallness of which excludes the possibility of his being ignorant of what had been done. This one fact implies a consciousness that he had been dealt with fairly, and is inconsistent with the whole of his present claim."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—We are told, on the one hand, that the pursuer's situation is worse, from the fact that the society has been dissolved. But, on the other hand, it is admitted in the defences, that the claim was intimated before the dissolution; and it is therefore clear that the dissolution does not make the pursuer's situation either better or worse. The case has now been brought before us with the interlocutor and note of the Lord Ordinary; and I must fairly confess I am not able to concur in his Lordship's view, that the long delay amounted to acquiescence on the part of the pursuer; that is, to acquiescence in the resolution striking his name from the list of members. Had there been, as the Lord Ordinary supposes, an admitted acquiescence of eleven years' duration, there can be no doubt that this would have been a solid ground on which to found the plea; but then the fact seems to be very different from what is supposed. Is it not essentially necessary that the party against whom the plea of acquiescence is urged, should have known what he is said to have acquiesced in? Now, it appears that no intimation was given to the pursuer at the time when his name was struck off. It is said, indeed, that the meeting at which he was struck off was intimated to him, and that the resolution to do so was carried into effect in February 1829; but when the question was put to the defender's counsel, whether the fact of his having been so struck off was intimated, he was unable to answer in the affirmative. He merely says, that because the pursuer was living on the spot at the time, and because Stromness is a small place, it is to be presumed that the fact must have been known to him. Now, it is impossible to adopt this presumption. Before we can apply the principle of acquiescence, it is essentially necessary to be assured that there was a knowledge of the thing acquiesced in. This is not proved here, and therefore I cannot hold that the pursuer is barred by acquiescence from proving the facts which he offers to establish. Since, therefore, the Lord Ordinary has rested his judgment solely on the plea of acquiescence, I have the greatest possible difficulty in adhering to it. But, then, looking at the regulation (p. 5 of record), I cannot see how the members of the society can take the benefit of that regulation without giving the benefit of it. No doubt there was an express certification, that after the failure of payments for a certain period, the names were to be struck off; but this was under the qualification as to their being unable to pay, or out of the country. Now, when it is averred that the failure to pay was owing to bodily infirmity and poverty, the pursuer, on that supposition, is still entitled to his privilege. Now, his own statement is, according to his own homely phrase, that he had endeavoured to "fend" as he best could, but that his poverty was the sole ground of his not paying. I don't know what he may be able to prove; but when he avers this, I cannot see that we should shut him out from the proof. If a dissolution has taken place so as to preclude the society from acting on the regulation, whose fault is that? Let the matter be investigated thoroughly, and let the society say conscientiously that there is not sufficient evidence to establish his averments, and the case will be very different. But, in the face of the regulation, it is impossible to debar him from the proof which he offers, that he was kept in ignorance of his being struck off, and of his other averments. If he establishes his averments, I should think him entitled, on paying his arrears, to a fair share of the fund. I must own that I am not affected by the defenders' argument, that this was a society for mutual assurance, and that the interests of members must be determined by a nice calculation. That might be a good argument if the sum claimed by him were to go to widows, and others entitled to provisions. But that is not the case; for they say it is expedient to put an end to the society; and having agreed to put an end to it, we cannot listen to that argument. The principle of decision in the cases founded on is sound, and I see little difference between them and the present. There it was pleaded that the party was unable to pay from poverty; and that is just what is pleaded here. There is the case of Steele in 1808. In the case of Boyes in 1834, the Court held that they could not qualify the Act of Parliament, and therefore that decision does not interfere with the case of Steele.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur, but not without difficulty, and only from regard to the cases founded on. According to the ordinary condition of insurance on lives, failure in any year to pay the annual premium produces a forfeiture of all right in the insured,—a hard condition in cases of inability to pay, and scarcely consistent with our law against unequal conditions. Yet custom has sanctioned it. But in the present case, it was made an express condition in the regulations of the society, that a party failing to pay should forfeit his right, unless he were unable to do so from bodily infirmity, or the like. I admit, that if at the time this party had offered to prove his inability on such grounds, he would have been entitled to relief. But I do not think that the thing expressly stipulated was, that he was to get relief before he stated his claim to it. Yet in two cases it has been found that it is still open to the party who has been declared forfeited for non-payment of annual contributions, to prove at any time thereafter that he was in poverty, and that that was the reason of his not paying the annual sum, though he did not claim relief in these years. This he may do to the effect of rescinding the forfeiture. I should have doubted of this construction of the regulation, if it had not been adopted in these cases. I admit at once, that if the party had come forward in reasonable time, he would have been entitled to his proof; but I should have had great doubts of his being entitled to do so after such a lapse of time. It is said he was not bound to know of his name having been struck off; but by the very terms of the contract he was bound to know, that if he did not pay he would forfeit; and knowing this, he was bound to look after his interest, perhaps not instantly, but within a reasonable time. If he did not, then I should have thought that he was not entitled to prove his poverty, so as to be relieved from the forfeiture at all. But the Court has decided that there is to be no such limitation; and that if the failure to pay has been from necessity, this may be proved, and the forfeiture rescinded at any time. If the party here was bound to know of the forfeiture, he was entitled to know this interpretation adopted in the decisions of this Court settling the law. On the whole, I think him entitled to the proof which he offers; but I rest very much upon the decisions, which I do not consider myself entitled to go against.

Lord Fullerton.—I have the greatest difficulty in adopting the opinions just expressed. I rather think the interlocutor ought to be adhered to. The circumstance of the dissolution of the society may be entirely discarded. The only question is, Whether or not, at the time of that dissolution, the pursuer can be held to have been a member of it? Now, certainly, the cases referred to—I mean those of Steele in 1808, and Boyes in 1834—go far to modify, on equitable considerations, the strict rule of law mainly founded on by the defenders,—farther, perhaps, than I should have been disposed to go, if the question had been open. But it would be dangerous to go a step farther; and I think it would be going a great deal farther to sustain this claim in the circumstances of this case. It may be said to be fixed by those decisions, that where, by the rules of a society of this kind, a failure to pay the periodical contributions excludes from the society; while, by the same rules, a contributor, disabled by ill health or poverty from gaining a livelihood, is entitled to support from the society, the party against whom the exclusion is enforced may relevantly aver and prove that his failure to pay was owing to that disability. But in both of those cases, the challenge of the exclusion took place within a moderately, or a comparatively short time after the penalty had been incurred. Certainly, in neither of the cases does it appear to have been pleaded, that the party excluded had given any ground for holding that he had acquiesced in the forfeiture of his rights. Now, here the exclusion took place in 1829. It might have taken place several years sooner, as he had for several years failed to pay; but it did not; and until that year the pursuer regularly received the notices to attend the meetings, according to the rules of the society. But in that year the exclusion took place, and from that time, in February 1829, it is admitted no notices to attend were sent. It is also admitted he continued to reside in, or in the neighbourhood of, Stromness; and yet from the year 1829 till the year 1837, he never made the slightest objection, or any attempt to question, or procure the recall of his exclusion. In these circumstances, it seems hardly to be denied, that if the resolution to exclude him had been intimated to him, this silence of his, for so long a period, must have been fatal to his claim. But it does not appear to me, that in such a case any intimation was necessary. He must be presumed to have known the rules of the society of which he was a member. He knew that he had not paid for several years. Even supposing that his ill health previously would, by the force of the exception in the 15th article, have afforded him an excuse for not paying, he knew that excuse had not been tendered; so that for more than the specified period he had neither tendered payment nor apology; and he knew that, from February 1829, the notices to him to attend the quarterly meetings, which all the members were, by the 24th regulation, entitled to receive, had been discontinued. It cannot be doubted, then, that he must have known,—1st, that he had incurred the penalty of exclusion; and, 2dly, that from February 1829, he was dealt with on the footing of that exclusion having taken place; and yet, for eight years he took no step for getting his excuse accepted, or himself replaced. I think that this does afford a most manifest and important distinction between the cases referred to and the present; and I see no reason, but on the contrary the greatest danger, in extending the principle of those decisions. I am disposed to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Gillies.—I concur in thinking that the interlocutor must be altered, but I think it unnecessary to enter at length into my reasons. The cases referred to are decisive; and I must confess, that if the question was still open, and these cases were now before us for the first time, I would be disposed to repeat them. I think them well founded. But it is said that there is an acquiescence in the present case, which did not exist in former cases. In those cases, length of time was certainly founded on, for it is expressly pleaded in one of them that four years had elapsed from the date of payment. That was debated, surely. But then it is said, that though length of time might have been pleaded, acquiescence was not pleaded. How then, is it pleaded here? The Lord Ordinary says that he proceeds chiefly on the long period of time which has elapsed; but how lapse of time can be construed into acquiescence, if the party did not know the fact in which he is said to have acquiesced, I cannot understand. The allegation of acquiescence is made not only without evidence, but against the admission of the defenders themselves. I cannot see how there can be acquiescence in a fact which never existed—I mean, a fact of which the man had no knowledge. But then, it is said, that by the regulations he must have known that if he intermitted payment for four years, his name would be struck off. This is somewhat odd. For it so happens, in point of fact, that not only four, but five, six, seven years elapse, and still his name continues on the list of members, although it is assumed that during all these years he must have known that he was no member. They took an arbitrary time for cutting him off, and he was no more bound to know that he was cut off at eight years, than at any of the preceding four, five, six, seven. I cannot, therefore, sustain the plea of acquiescence. With regard to the dissolution, I have some doubt how far the society were entitled to dissolve. It is said that they have funds to the amount of £800, and the twenty existing members propose to divide it among themselves. Now, part of that sum appears to have been contributed, not by the members, but by charitable individuals for the benefit of the society, considered as a charitable institution. I see the names of Sir W. Forbes, and the Hudson Bay Company, mentioned as contributors. The money so contributed, be its amount what it may, the members were not entitled to share among themselves to the amount of one farthing. But the question of dissolution is not properly before us. As to the merits, I am clear that the interlocutor must be altered, as it proceeds on the understanding of an acquiescence which could not exist if the fact said to be acquiesced in was not known.

The Court altered, and allowed a proof.

20th January 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 79.—ROBERT BALFOUR WARDLAW RAMSAY,
Pursuer, v. THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Retrocession.—A lease, not assignable without the landlord's consent, was assigned, and the landlord consented by a writing to that effect indorsed on the assignment.—Held that the assignee (a bank), though alleging that the assignment was only in security, was substituted for the original tenant, and could not retrocess him without a new consent from the landlord.

By a lease executed in 1834, Mr Robert Wardlaw Ramsay, the pursuer's father, let to George Wilson, his heirs and successors, for twenty-seven years from Martinmas 1832, a feu at Haugh Mill, in the parish of Markinch, with the houses, spinning-mill, and others built upon it, a garden and three acres of ground adjoining, as also the whole of the machinery, large and small, then used in the premises, with a right to use as much water as could be conducted from the Leven by a sluice of certain dimensions. The rent of the first year was £60, and of the subsequent years £176. 12s. 4d. The lease expressly excluded assignees and subtenants, "excepting such as shall be approved of by the landlord by a writing under his hand;" and it was "specially provided and declared, that if any assignation or subset shall be granted of the premises hereby let, or of these presents, by the said George Wilson or his aforesaid, he and they shall nevertheless continue responsible to the said Robert Wardlaw Ramsay and his aforesaid for payment of the rent and performance of the whole stipulations and provisions contained in these presents." The tenant was also taken bound to purchase the whole of the small machines, as specified in a schedule, at the price of £400, payable at Martinmas 1845. By a supplementary addition to the lease in 1835, the tenant became bound, in return for an expenditure by the landlord of £600 in erecting new buildings, to pay for five years an additional rent of £60, and thereafter of £40.

Wilson having become deeply indebted to the Commercial Bank through their agency at Kirkcaldy in 1836, executed an assignation, which, after narrating the lease and supplementary addition verbatim, proceeds as follows:

"And farther, considering that John Reid, agent for the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Kirkcaldy, for himself, and as agent fore-said, has advanced various sums of money to me, amounting to £1990, of which I do hereby acknowledge the receipt, renouncing all exceptions to the contrary. Therefore, I the said George Wilson, with the special consent of the said Robert Wardlaw Ramsay, have made and constituted, as I do by these presents, make and constitute the said John Reid, for himself, and as agent fore-said, and his heirs and successors, my lawful cessioners and assignees, in and to the before-recited tack and supplementary minute, or addition thereto, during the whole years and terms thereof yet to run, from and after the term of Martinmas last, and to all the clauses, obligations, and stipulations therein contained, with the whole profits and emoluments of every description which may arise therefrom, and all action and execution competent to me and my fore-saids thereupon; and I do hereby assign, convey, and make over to the said John Reid, and his fore-saids, all right, title, and interest which I have or can claim, or pretend to the large and small machinery, specified and contained in the schedules annexed to the said tack; and, moreover, I the said George Wilson, without prejudice to the foregoing assignation, but in corroboration thereof, do hereby sell, assign, convey, and make over to the said John Reid, and his fore-saids, the whole machinery, implements, and utensils belonging to me, and presently situated on the premises, contained in the said lease, and which are specially enumerated and contained in a list or schedule hereunto annexed, subscribed by me as relative hereto, with all right, title, and interest which I have or can claim, or pretend to the said machinery, implements, and utensils, or any part thereof, with power to the said John Reid, and his fore-saids, to occupy, possess, and enjoy the said spinning-mill, houses, ground, and others contained in the said tack, and the machinery, implements, and utensils hereby conveyed, and to let the said premises to tenants if they shall think proper, and to intromit with, uplift, and discharge the rents, profits, and duties thereof, during the remaining space of the said tack yet to run; and also to let the said machinery, implements, and utensils, along with the said spinning-mill and premises, or to sell and dispose of the said implements and utensils as he or they may think proper; surrogating hereby and substituting the said John Reid, and his fore-saids, in my full right and place of the whole premises, with power to him and them to exercise every right and title concerning the premises, which I could have done before granting hereof: Providing always and declaring, that the said John Reid and his fore-saids, shall be bound and obliged, as by acceptance hereof, he binds and obliges himself and them, to make payment of the rent or tack-duty stipulated by the said tack and supplementary minute or addition thereto, at the terms therein specified; and also to perform, implement, and fulfil the whole other obligations and conditions incumbent on the tenant by the said tack and supplementary minute or addition thereto."

The landlord's consent to the assignation was expressed on the back of the deed in the following terms: "I consent to the preceding assignation, and hold it as duly intimated to me." (Signed) "R. WARDLAW RAMSAY." Of the same date the bank took an instrument of possession, and two days after granted a sublease to Wilson at the yearly rent of £1000. It appears that a back-bond was also executed in the following month (February), by which the bank became bound to retrocess Wilson as soon as the debt which he had incurred to them was paid. In October 1836, the bank through their agent, and with the landlord's consent, granted a sublease of the lands connected with the spinning-mill, to be used as a bleachfield. The half-year's rent falling due the first Whitsunday after the assignation, was paid to the landlord by Wilson. Another half-year's rent fell due at Martinmas 1836. The receipt for it by Mr Dewar, the landlord's factor, is as follows:

"Received, pro R. W. Ramsay, Esq. of Tillicoultry, from John Reid, Esq., Kirkaldy, by Mr Geo. Wilson, £119.—11s. Sterling, being rent of Haugh Spinning Mill, from Whitsunday 1836 to Martinmas following, interest on store-room, &c., included, which are hereby discharged."

On the 27th April 1837, the bank applied to the Sheriff for sequestration against Wilson for the year's rent from Martinmas 1836 to Martinmas 1837, and obtained warrant of sale to the extent of £500, for the half-year's rent payable at Whitsunday. On this occasion the defenders' agent wrote to the landlord's agent as follows:

"I beg to mention to you, on behalf of Mr Reid, the Commercial Bank agent at Kirkaldy, that he has found it necessary, as the principal tenant under the late Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, to sequestrate the effects at Haugh Mill, belonging to his subtenant Mr George Wilson, for the rent due by Mr Wilson to him, as agent for the Commercial Bank.

"The Commercial Bank agent will be ready to pay you the rent due to Mr Wardlaw Ramsay at Whitsunday first."

On the 8th May 1837, Wilson's estates were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act. The rents of 1837 and 1838 were paid to Mr Ramsay by the bank, who took receipts as for rent due by them. One receipt is as follows:

"Edinburgh, 22d November 1838.—Received from the Commercial Bank of Scotland, £131 Sterling, being half a-year's rent due by said bank at Martinmas 1838, as tenants of the Haugh Spinning Mill, belonging to the representatives of the late Robert Wardlaw Ramsay, Esq. of Whitehill,—which half year's rent is hereby discharged by us their agents."

There are indorsements on these receipts by Mr Aytoun, the trustee on Wilson's sequestrated estate, bearing that he had paid the sums contained in them to the bank. In February 1838, Mr Aytoun brought an action of reduction and declarator against the bank, concluding for reduction of the assignation and instrument of possession in their favour, and of the sublease to Wilson, and to have it found and declared that the assignation had not conferred upon the bank any right in prejudice and to the exclusion of the other just and lawful creditors of Wilson. After an interlocutor had been pronounced remitting the cause to the jury roll with a view to the preparation of issues, a minute was given into process of the following tenor:

"Whigham, for the pursuer, stated, that the parties in this cause had come to an arrangement, whereby it became unnecessary to litigate farther, inasmuch as the defenders had consented to allow decree to be pronounced against them in terms of the libel, and he therefore craved his Lordship to recal his interlocutor remitting the cause to the Jury Court, and to decern in terms of the libel, but finding no expenses due to either party. To which statement, Shank More, for the defenders, answered, that the pursuer, with the approbation of Wilson's creditors, having agreed to pay to the defenders, the Commercial Bank, the sum of £650, out of the first and readiest of the funds, and to allow the said bank to rank along with the other creditors, for every debt due to the said bank, from the estate of the said George Wilson, and to draw the dividend effeiring thereto, the said defenders had agreed to allow decree to pass in terms of the libel, (but finding no expenses due to either party); and John Reid, late agent at Kirkaldy for said bank, had agreed, with consent of said bank, to retrocess George Wilson in the lease mentioned in the action of reduction, in the same manner as if the said assignation sought to be reduced had never been granted; therefore he consented to decree being pronounced in the terms above mentioned."

Decree was accordingly pronounced in June 1839, and in July following a retrocession was executed in Wilson's favour. The deed of retrocession, after narrating the assignation, instrument of possession, sub-lease, back bond, and stipulations of the above minute lodged in the process of reduction, proceeds on the part of John Reid the agent, with the consent of the bank, and also of Mr Aytoun the trustee, to retrocess Wilson, his heirs and successors, "to their own right and place of the premises before recited, tack and supplementary addition thereto, during the whole years and terms thereof yet to run." The first half-year's rent which fell due at Martinmas after this retrocession, was paid by the bank, as in the two previous years, on a receipt bearing to be for payment of "rent due by them" "for Haugh Spinning Mill;" but in June 1840, when a similar receipt was sent for payment of the Whitsunday's rent of that year, the bank declined payment, on the ground that they "had now no concern with the mill." Mr Aytoun also intimated that he was quite ready "to pay the half-year's rent due at Whitsunday last on Mr Wilson's account, whenever a discharge approved by him shall be granted for the Haugh Mill rent by his landlord;" and Wilson wrote a letter to the law-agent of the bank, stating, inter alia:

"If you think proper, I will consign the money in the meantime into the hands of Mr Aytoun, my late trustee, or his brother in Edinburgh, until Messrs Stevenson and Yule and you come to a proper understanding on the subject. The Court having found the bank's claim invalid, completely nullified the assignation, and my discharge having been legally procured, as well as being retrocessed into the property, I consider myself fairly the landlord's tenant, as if no assignation or bankruptcy had ever taken place."

The pursuer, who had succeeded to his father, the granter of the lease, declined to acquiesce in this view, and brought the present action, concluding that the Commercial Bank ought to be decreed to make payment of the rent of each year, "during the currency of the said tack, for all the years thereof yet to run from and after the said term of Martinmas 1840, the terms of payment thereof being always first come and bygone;" "and to implement, pay, and perform the whole prestations and obligations incumbent on the said Commercial Bank as tenants and assignees foresaid, in virtue of the said lease, and supplementary minute or addition thereto, and assignation thereof."

In support of this action the pursuer pleaded—1. By the assignation and intimation thereof libelled, the defenders became tenants under the original lease, and are therefore bound to fulfil all the obligations imposed on the tenant by the said lease, during the whole period of its currency. 2. Under the circumstances, the assignation in question would have operated as an effectual transference of the lease to the defenders, even in a question with creditors. At all events, in a question with the present parties, the liability of the defenders, as assignees, cannot be affected by any such consideration. 3. A landlord who has once accepted of an assignee as his tenant under a lease excluding assignees, except such as he should approve of, is not bound to consent to a second assignation, even although the proposed assignee be the same person as the original tenant, and although the assignation should be executed in the form of a retrocession in his favour. 4. At least the landlord is not so bound, without reference to the circumstances of such party at the date of the proposed retrocession, or where, as in the present case, the landlord has reasonable grounds for his refusal.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. All right which the defenders ever had, even in security, to the subjects of the lease held by George Wilson, having been brought to a close by the decrees of reduction, and the connection of the defenders with the lease having ceased, there is no legal ground upon which the conclusions of the action against them for payment of the rents, during the whole currency of the lease, can be maintained. 2. At all events, no change having taken place in the actual possession of the subjects, and there having been no absolute or effectual transference of the lease to the defenders, so as to operate a change in the tenancy, the defenders are not bound to implement the obligations of the lease, but are in this respect as free of responsibility as if the assignation in their favour had not been granted. 3. Even had their assignation to the lease not been reduced, and supposing it to have been open to no challenge, still, having been a right merely in security, and for repayment of their advances, and having been brought to a close by their settlement with the creditors of Wilson, no obligation can in the circumstances be inferred against the defenders, binding them to implement the prestations of the lease, as assignees thereto, and as tenants of the subjects; the more especially as, by the express terms of the lease, Wilson and his heirs remained bound to the landlord for the whole rents and other prestations under the lease, notwithstanding an assignation thereof. 4. The deed of retrocession, executed by the defenders in favour of Wilson, effectually divested them of all right in the premises, and terminated whatever liabilities might have been inferred against them prior to such retrocession; and all prior liabilities having been discharged, no claim exists on the part of the pursuer for any of the prestations or obligations of the lease, which can be legally enforced against the defenders.

"23d November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the closed record, and thereafter considered the documents produced, and whole process, Finds that the pursuer's father let the spinning-mill and machinery libelled on for twenty-seven years from Martinmas 1832, 'to George Wilson, and his heirs and successors, but expressly excluding assignees and sub-tenants, excepting such as should be approved of by the landlord by a writing under his hand.' Finds that Wilson having contracted a debt of £1990 to the Commercial Bank, he, on the 21st January 1836, assigned the said lease to Mr John Reid, as agent for the bank of Kirkaldy; and the deceased Mr Ramsay, by a doquet on the back of the lease, consented thereto, and held the assignation as intimated to him: Finds that an instrument of possession was taken by the bank upon this assignation; and that, unico contextu, a sub-lease was prepared as from the bank to Wilson, sub-letting the whole premises to him: Finds that George Wilson became bankrupt, and that his estate was sequestrated on 8th May 1837, and his whole estates, real and personal, were judicially adjudged and assigned to Mr James Aytoun as trustee in his sequestration: Finds it not offered to be proved in this action that, prior to the sequestration, the bank had obtained any such actual possession of the premises let, as would have been available to them against the claim of the onerous creditors and judicial trustee, whose title and possession after the sequestration were incontestable: Finds in particular that, prior to the sequestration, the bank drew no rent from Wilson as sub-tenant, and that the principal rents due to the heritable proprietor continued to be paid to the landlord's factor by Wilson as the party in possession, notwithstanding the assignation: Finds, that soon after the sequestration, the trustee on the sequestrated estate raised a process of reduction of the said assignation, as being null, void, and ineffectual, from no possession having followed thereon: Finds that during the dependence of that action, the bank advanced the rents to the proprietor as they fell due, which was necessary to save the lease from forfeiture: Finds that the bank were ultimately advised to enter into a compromise of the action of reduction on receiving payment of £650, and a right to rank for their debt on the estate of the bankrupt, to allow decree of reduction of the said assignment to pass; and that, accordingly, decree of reduction was pronounced at the instance of the said trustee on 28th June 1839: Finds that thereafter the agent for the bank, at desire and with consent of the trustee on the said estate, executed a retrocession of the lease in favour of the said George Wilson, the original tenant, who at the same time offered a composition to his whole creditors, and was discharged of all his debts contracted prior to the sequestration: Finds that Wilson still is in actual possession of the mill and machinery libelled on, and that he has offered to pay the whole rents claimable by the landlord, and consigned the same from time to time as they fell due: Finds, under these circumstances, that the pursuer has no claim on the defenders as assignees under their ineffectual and rescinded assignment, and therefore sustains the defences, and assoliszes the defenders from this action: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

“Note.—Under the circumstances of this case, as articulately detailed in the interlocutor, it is thought that the claim of the pursuer is not maintainable on any principle of law or practice applicable to the case.

“1. Although the general rule is now clearly fixed, that ordinary assignees of leases who have entered into possession on an assignment, are liable in all the obligations for past and future rents, as well as for the other prestations imposed on the original tenants, that obligation cannot be extended to the case where the assignment has been reduced at the instance of a competent and preferable party, and declared judicially to have been null and void from the beginning. It would indeed be a result most anomalous and unjust, if a party, after being deprived of all the benefit of an assignment, could nevertheless be subjected in its heaviest burdens. There is no example of any such claim being preferred, still less of its being sustained. Accordingly, although the present case is almost identical with the noted one of Brock and Cabbell, so long the subject of discussion both in this Court and the House of Lords, and although the assignment in that instance was finally held to be ineffectual, it does not appear that Mr Johnston of Alva ever attempted to claim the rent from the Glasgow Bank, after the reduction of their assignment.

“Indeed, it is apprehended that the principles of the strictest law, as well as of essential justice, are opposed to the claim. The liability of an assignee for the rent and prestations of a lease, arise from his having right to all the future benefit of the contract under a complete title; but if the title never has been completed by possession, and if it has been finally reduced by a court of law, there are no termini habiles for sustaining the obligation. When there is no possession, the landlord is bound to know, and has the same means as the rest of the public of seeing, that the assignee's right is incomplete.

“In the present instance, the pursuer does not allege that the decree reducing the bank's right was collusive, or that the defenders' right was, in point of fact, completed by possession at the date of the bankruptcy. The Lord Ordinary specially put it to the pursuer, if he was ready to undertake a proof to show that the bank ever had actual possession, and was answered in the negative. He urged, however, that it was the fault of the bank themselves that they did not get possession, and it was said that the pursuer should not suffer from that omission. But, with deference, the landlord did not stipulate that the assignees' right should be completed within a definite time; all that was asked from him, was his consent to the assignment, which he gave, leaving the assignees power to complete it or not as they chose; but if the assignees lost the benefit of the assignment, and never obtained possession, no obligation arose in the landlord's favour from that omission. The possession continued with the principal tenant, the party favoured and selected by the landlord; the bank never derived the great benefit which a complete assignment would have given them; and they justly stated at the debate, that if the landlord could have given and warranted possession to them, they would most readily have undertaken all the responsibilities under the lease. But surely the landlord is not entitled to found any claim against a party who has thus sustained a great loss from the non-completion of a contemplated right, and when the possession was allowed to remain with the principal tenant to whom he himself granted the lease.

“If the proprietor had a claim against any party as assignee, it possibly might have been plausibly raised against the trustee and creditors who reduced the bank's assignment, and claimed possession for themselves; but as the landlord never gave any consent to their right, it seems very questionable whether he would have succeeded in establishing the character of assignees on the creditors at large in the present case.

“2. There is another ground upon which it is supposed that the defenders are entitled to resist the claim now under consideration. The lease here is in peculiar terms: it permits assignments with consent of the landlord, but under this special condition, that if any assignment or subset should be granted of the premises thereby let, or of the said lease by the said George Wilson or his forebears, he and they should nevertheless continue responsible to the said Robert Wardlaw Ramsay and his forebears for payment of the rent and performance of the whole stipulations and provisions contained in the said tack.

“The effect of this stipulation appears to be to retain Wilson as principal tenant, bound to the landlord for the rent conjunctly and severally with every assignee during the whole course of the lease. The original tenant is thus never entirely divested of his obligations and rights under this contract; and it must be competent for an assignee at any time to renounce his right, and grant a retrocession to the tenant so held bound. It is not in the landlord's mouth to object that this is an assignment to a stranger not consented to by him; his consent to the principal tenant was the foundation of the original contract; and a retrocession to that tenant falls within the permissive words of the lease, as given to a party ‘approved of by the landlord by a writing under his hand.’

“It was objected to this view of the case, that Wilson's circumstances were now altered and embarrassed, and that the landlord was not bound to receive him now; but while the principal tenant continues bound for the rent, it is apprehended that the landlord cannot refuse to give him possession, and to receive him as tenant if he chooses to enter. The allegations as to his bankruptcy and embarrassment are totally irrelevant. As there was no clause of forfeiture in the lease, in case of bankruptcy or insolvency of the tenant, the landlord could never have put an end to the lease, or compelled the tenant to quit possession in consequence of any embarrassment in his affairs, so long as he paid the rent. As little could he object on that ground to the principal tenant resuming possession if he had ever quitted it, when he was still bound for the rent of the subjects.

“This plea, it is supposed, would have been competent, even if the bank had been for a short time in actual possession of these premises; but it is doubly available when the fact appears to be indisputable that the bank were never in possession.”

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—The present case is one of importance in this department of law, but it cannot be at all assimilated to the cases of Yeaman or Brock and Cabbell. The circumstances are these:—George Wilson, in 1834, obtained from the late Mr Wardlaw Ramsay a lease of the mill and machinery, and mill-lands of Haugh Mill, with right of water from the river Leven, for the period of twenty-seven years from 1832, the date of his entry; and after a certain addition was made to his possession, a rent of about £160 became payable during the currency of the lease. The lease debarred the tenant from assigning, except with the consent of the landlord by a writing under his hand; and it also provided, that in the event of such an assignment, Wilson should still continue bound to Mr Ramsay for the stipulated rent. In 1836 an assignment of this lease was granted, setting forth its full terms, and also narrating on its face that £1990 had been advanced by John Reid, the agent for the Commercial Bank at Kirkcaldy, and accordingly assigning over to him, for himself and the said bank, as cessioner and assignee, the full right of the lease during its currency, with all the stipulations and obligations contained in it, and expressly providing, that the assignee should be bound and obliged, "as by acceptance hereof he binds and obliges himself and them (the bank), to make payment of the rent or tack-duty stipulated by the said tack, and supplementary minute or addition thereto, at the terms therein specified; and also to perform, implement and fulfil the whole other obligations and conditions incumbent on the tenant by the said tack, and supplementary minute or addition thereto." And the instrument bears that a copy of the said tack and minute were delivered up to the said John Reid. Seven days after the execution of this deed of assignation, which bears to be with the consent of Mr Ramsay (though it was not subscribed by him), there were indorsed on the deed by Mr Ramsay these words: "Edinburgh, 10th January 1836. I consent to the preceding assignation, and hold it duly intimated to me." It appears that an instrument of possession was forthwith made out, and a ceremony of removing the tacksmen from the mill, and subsequently a sub-lease of the premises, was executed in favour of Wilson, stipulating a rent of £1000 a-year, over and above the rent due to Mr Ramsay. Wilson continued to possess and carry on the operations in the spinning-mill for some time. He soon after, however, became embarrassed, though it is said he had paid a half-year's rent to the agents of the landlord, who died soon after; and Mr Reid thereafter actually applied to the Sheriff for sequestration, from a doubt of his solvency, and an arrear of rent. Ultimately a warrant to sell to the extent of £500 was granted by the Sheriff, but, owing to subsequent events, never executed. Shortly after, Wilson was sequestrated by other creditors under the Bankrupt Act, and a trustee appointed. Several terms' rents which afterwards became due to Mr Ramsay were paid to his agents by the Commercial Bank, as expressed in the various receipts. In these circumstances, the trustee on Wilson's estate raised a reduction of the assignation in favour of the bank, and after a variety of procedure (the rent still continuing to be paid in terms of the above receipts), a remit was made to try the case by a jury. After this remit, Mr Reid and the bank (doubtful, it is said, if they would be able to defend their right against the creditors) entered into a compromise, agreeing that, in consequence of a sum of £650 having been paid down to the bank by the trustee, and the bank being allowed to rank for its debt on Wilson's estate, decree in the reduction should be allowed to pass. Decree was pronounced accordingly. Wilson was afterwards discharged on a composition. Mr Ramsay did not claim as a creditor, and was no party to the reduction of the assignation, which was never communicated either to him or his agents. After this Mr Reid, for himself and the bank, executed a formal deed, retrocessing Wilson in the full right of the lease. Mr Ramsay, the son of the grantor of the lease, having again demanded the rent from the bank, was refused, on the ground that the bank had no longer any connection with the lease, and in consequence, the present action has been raised, which concludes that the bank shall be ordained to pay certain rents past due, and those of future years as they fall due, and in general, to pay and perform the whole prestations and obligations incumbent on them as tenants. From this action the Lord Ordinary has assolized the defenders; and the question is, whether that interlocutor should be adhered to. First of all, it admits of no doubt that Mr Reid, as acting with full powers from the Commercial Bank, did accept the assignation granted by Wilson, and to which Mr Ramsay gave a formal consent, and an acknowledgment of intimation. This acceptance is proved by the instrument of possession, the execution of the sub-lease, by a sequestration of the sub-tenant for rent, and a warrant of sale, as well as by the subsequent payments of rent by the bank. But if the acceptance of the assignation is thus irrevocably fixed upon the defenders, does it not irresistibly follow that the conditions of that acceptance, imposed upon them by the express terms of the instrument, were binding on them also? These were, that the assignee should be bound and obliged to pay the rent, and perform all the prestations of the lease. How can it be asserted that such a deed, which could not have been granted with effect without the landlord's consent, did not, after his consent was obtained, create an obligation in which the landlord was interested, or that what was done amounted merely to an arrangement between Wilson and the bank, with which the landlord had little or no concern? I am compelled to draw from the nature of this transaction a very different conclusion. The assignation bearing on its face the fact that the bank had so recently after the date of the lease advanced to Wilson nearly £2000 (of which fact Mr Ramsay could not but be aware, though he could see nothing in the assignation indicating that it was granted merely in security, and there is no reason for holding that he did in fact know of it), was sufficient to inform the landlord that Wilson was not in a very flourishing condition. Having it in his power, however, to prevent his assigning his lease, Mr Ramsay was led to consider whether it would be beneficial for him to agree to the arrangement proposed; and looking to the security of the Commercial Bank, who agreed to take an unqualified assignation binding themselves as tenants, in addition to Wilson's own liability which was to continue, it was perfectly natural for Mr Ramsay to give his consent, on the understanding that he had the bank so bound to him as tenants during the whole duration of the lease, and that they could not again get free of their obligation without his full consent. An important relation was thus established between Mr Ramsay and the defenders; and from the manner in which the transaction was completed, and there being a direct personal contract between them, there arises a complete distinction, in so far as the interests of the landlord and the assignees are concerned, between the present case and those of Yeaman and of Brock and Cabbell, referred to. These related solely to questions between assignees and the creditors of the cedent, and raised no such questions as arise here. So far as the landlord could interfere, there was nothing done, or refrained from being done by him, to prevent the Commercial Bank, after receiving the assignation, from making it perfectly effectual against Wilson and all his creditors. It was open to them either to grant him a sub-lease out and out, or to remove him entirely from the subjects. But supposing the measures that were adopted by the bank to have been abortive for that purpose, it was their own fault, and not ascribable at all to Mr Ramsay. In point of fact, however, a sub-lease was granted, and this was followed by the important step of the bank sequestrating Wilson as the sub-tenant for rent due. This was a serious judicial step, and actually led to a warrant to sell to the extent of £500. There afterwards followed those payments of the rent directly by the bank to Mr Ramsay's agent, and receipts granted to them "as tenants at the Haugh Mill." Whatever indorsements these receipts bear as to the money having been handed over by Wilson's trustee, they cannot do away the terms in which the rents were discharged without challenge. And what can be said to evade the effect of the letter of the 27th April 1837, from Mr Campbell, the agent of the bank, to the agents of the landlord? I hold it impossible to put two meanings on this letter, as to the clear understanding of the parties at its date. It demonstrates that the bank did then clearly hold itself as principal tenant, and that Mr Ramsay stood in the relation of landlord, having the bank bound to him. Now, at this time, in consequence of the situation of Wilson's affairs, which soon after became so disastrous as to lead to his sequestration, the landlord had an undoubted right to hold the Commercial Bank as bound to implement their obligation under the deed to which he had fully consented; and he was, moreover, justly entitled to rely on nothing being done subsequently to his prejudice by the bank, and certainly on his not being thrown back entirely on Wilson as his tenant without his full consent. For a time thereafter, the rents were accordingly paid by the bank to the agents of the landlord; and after the reduction of the assignation had been raised by the trustee for Wilson's creditors against the bank, of which no intimation was given to those acting for Mr Ramsay, and preparation made by a remit for jury trial, the compromise and arrangement entered into, and decree of reduction granted in terms of it, were proceedings solely conducted by the Commercial Bank. To complete the whole matter, after receiving £650 as the price of the compromise, the deed of retrocession was granted by the bank in favour of Wilson, who had got rid of his debts by composition, and was discharged; and thus the bank imagined it had got rid of all obligation under the assignation. I cannot hold that, in these transactions, sufficient attention had been paid to the rights of the landlord. The change in Wilson's status, after his bankruptcy, was very manifest, and the bank had no legal power to throw him back on the landlord as sole tenant. If the bank had really supposed it could get free of its obligation to Mr Ramsay by such a course of procedure, he ought to have been made a party to the reduction, and an opportunity afforded to him to resist it, when, at all events, he could have at once stated he would consent to no new assignation, either to Wilson or any one else. If this had been done, how could a reduction have had the effect of liberating the bank? Its assent to decree of reduction was purchased for a price; and Mr Ramsay is not to suffer by such a transaction, followed up as it was by the bank's being allowed to rank on Wilson's estate for their debt. Those proceedings, behind Mr Ramsay's back, cannot affect his interests. The conclusion of the action appears, therefore, to be well founded, and the bank still continues liable with Wilson to fulfil the conditions of the lease. If it is true, as the bank states, that Wilson is now quite solvent, sound in credit, and able to fulfil the obligations of the lease, so much the better for the bank; but after the completion of the transaction, the bank cannot shake itself free of it by such proceedings as those which it adopted.

Lord Gillies.—When I first read this case, I entertained doubts of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and since then this adverse opinion has not been shaken, but confirmed. If any proposition be clear in law, it is this, that rights and obligations can be constituted only by deeds and transactions to which the person claiming or incurring them is a party,—not by those with which he has no concern. No doubt there is such a thing as a jus quæsitum tertii which may be acquired, in particular circumstances, by a person not actually a party to an agreement. But I can conceive no case in which rights can be destroyed, or obligations imposed, without the concurrence of the party, or by transactions inter alios. They may be by delict, but there is nothing of the kind here. By res inter alios actæ they cannot. Now, how stands the fact? A lease was granted by Wardlaw Ramsay to Wilson. This lease contained, 1st, a clause excluding assignees and sub-tenants, without the consent of the landlord by a writing under his hand; 2d, a clause declaring that if any assignation should be granted, the original tenant, as well as the assignee, should be liable for the rent. Well, an assignation is granted to the Commercial Bank. This, of course, could only be granted in terms of the lease. What, then, are the terms of the assignation? It states that the bank had advanced a sum of money of which receipt is acknowledged, and it then constitutes the bank Wilson's cessioners and assignees. Then there is the clause providing that John Reid, the agent of the bank, shall be bound to make payment of the rent, and perform all the obligations of the tenant under the lease. How do the defenders interpret this clause? As having no meaning at all. They say they were liable only while in possession of the farm. The clause then means nothing. The bank would be liable at any rate if they possessed the farm; but this clause makes them liable whether they possessed it or not; otherwise, it imposes no obligation, and is a mere nullity. This assignation was consented to by the landlord. It was not consent to an assignation in the abstract, but to this particular assignation, by which the bank were bound to pay the rent. How was Mr Ramsay to be deprived of his interest in this obligation? Has he said, or done, or acquiesced in any thing to affect it? Certainly not. Every thing done was res inter alios. He was no party to any of the subsequent transactions. The bank not only accepted the assignation, but acted as assignees. Can any thing be clearer than this? Can they shake themselves free of that character? I do not think their obligation such a nullity. Afterwards they sequester Wilson for rent. This was a most illegal, oppressive, and unjust proceeding, if they were not assignees. Then they paid rent as tenants. Lastly they granted a retrocession. This is the clearest proof of all. How could they grant a retrocession without being assignees? It is said the assignation was not real, but fictitious. The bank cannot plead this against the landlord. Then, what is called the decree of reduction was a mere compromise, and a compromise in which the bank availed themselves of their right, by receiving a price for the abandonment of it. It is said the landlord had shown a delectus personæ in the first tenant's favour, and may therefore be compelled to take him back. But people's opinions change. If a man divorce his wife, can he be compelled to take her back, on the plea that, by marrying her, he had shown a delectus personæ?

Lord Mackenzie.—As your Lordship has already sufficiently stated the circumstances in which this question arises, it is unnecessary that I should repeat them. I have some observations, however, to make upon one or two points which have been pleaded before us:—1. The last point pleaded by the defender's counsel was a general and important one; and if he had been right with respect to it, he would have been successful in the cause. It is generally that the holder of an assignation, with the landlord's consent, to a lease not assignable without that consent, is entitled to re-assign the lease to the original tenant without the landlord's consent. If that be law, there can be no doubt that the defenders are free, as there was an assignation by them to the original tenant. But I do not conceive that to be the law. It is not supported either by reason or by authority. When a landlord grants a lease containing the condition that no assignation shall be made without his consent, and an assignation is granted with his consent, the lease passes to the assignee with all its conditions. But one of these is, that there shall be no assignation without the landlord's consent. There can, therefore, be no re-assignation, which is just an assignation, without his consent. It is true the landlord agreed to take this man as original tenant. But that does not infer, that when he has got another in place of him, he shall be willing to take him back again. And that reason applies a fortiori, if there have been a change in the circumstances of the original tenant, as, if he have become insolvent. But here, before the re-assignation, the tenant had become bankrupt, and in these circumstances, it would be plainly unjust to hold that the landlord was bound to take back the bad tenant, whom he had got quit of, and lose the good tenant he had acquired. Nor is there any authority for this doctrine of the defenders. I am not aware of any decision, or even dictum, which sanctions the rule, that a landlord may be compelled to take back the original tenant, or any of the previous assignees, when there had been several assignations; for it must be pushed that length. It is said that it is the general understanding of the country. My understanding is just the other way. I never understood that if a tenant went wrong, and with the landlord's consent got a good substitute in the lease, that substitute might hold it as long as it was profitable, but as soon as it became otherwise, might give it back to the original tenant and be free. 2. It is said, in the second place, that the landlord was a party to what he knew to be a mere assignation in security. Here, again, the plea is a good one, if it had been made out. If it had appeared in evidence that the landlord had been a party to a mere assignation in security, he must have been bound to consent to the re-assignation, on payment or satisfaction of the debt. But there is no such evidence; there is evidence to the contrary. The writings constituting the transaction with Mr Ramsay make no allusion to the assignation being one in security. No doubt there was a back-bond, which, so far as regards the original tenant and the assignee, showed the nature of the transaction to be in security. But with that the landlord had nothing to do. In relation to him there was no back-bond—no letter of the nature of a letter of regress. It is said that the very names of the parties were as good as a letter of regress. But I cannot adopt that. It may be true that one might guess that the bank did not enter into the lease by way of mere agricultural adventure or speculation. But what reason can be given why they might not take the lease in satisfaction of a debt which they could not otherwise receive, with the view of a profit by subsetting? Unless such a profit was looked to, how could the lease afford any security? If good for security to the bank, it was good for satisfaction of what was due to them. We cannot hold, in contradiction of the instruments, that the landlord did that which he, being dead, cannot admit, and his representative denies he did, and which the instruments do not bear. 3. It is said, in the third place, that the bank are not liable for rent, because the assignation in their favour is void and null. Here, again, if the fact were so, there would be a great deal in the argument. If the assignation had turned out to be an absolute nullity, on the ground of interdiction, or some other such ground, I doubt whether the bank would have been liable for rent without having acquired a right to the lease. But it is not true that the assignation was a nullity. No doubt there was a formal decree reducing it. But I pay no attention to that. The landlord was no party to that decree, and I hold that it must be entirely disregarded. Want of possession was pleaded as the reason of reduction of the assignation; I rather think there was possession. Lord Gillies has spoken to that. But there is this distinct ground on which the decree of reduction could never stand. The creditors had no title to pursue the action without the landlord's consent, which he was ready to refuse. They could not have taken the lease to themselves without his consent, and therefore the bank had only to get his declaration that he would not consent, in order to show that the creditors had no right to maintain the action. But it is plain that this was properly no decree—it was a mere transaction. A large sum was paid to the bank to obtain its consent, and pro forma. In short, it was nothing more than a bargain for a re-assignation. In my apprehension the bank are still the tenants. It is said they cannot get possession. I think they are in possession. The former tenant was, and is their sub-tenant. Even if they were not in possession, they could not be hindered from taking it. The creditors are barred from claiming the lease itself, by the clause requiring the landlord's consent to an assignation. This consent being refused, they cannot exclude the bank. The original tenant has assigned to the bank, and is bound to give them possession, if they have it not already. The landlord is bound, and most willing to put them in possession, if they are not in possession already. I think, therefore, the bank are unsuccessful on all points. They are the tenants, except for their own unavailing attempt to assign the lease, and therefore are liable for the rents to the landlord.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court recalled the interlocutor, and decerned in terms of the libel.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 80.—ANTHONY DIXON, JOSEPH DIXON, and OTHERS, four of the nearest of kin of the late Jacob Dixon, senior, Merchant in Dumbarton, Appellants, v. MRS BROWN or DIXON, Relict, and JOSEPH DIXON and OTHERS, Children of the late Jacob Dixon, junior, and DANIEL BROWN, as Curator and Factor to the said Children, Respondents.

Testament—Parent and Child—Provision to Children—Legacy—Lapsing—Conditio si sine liberis—Trust—Where a father, in a family trust-settlement, left special legacies to his younger children and their heirs, and the residue of his means and estate to his eldest son, but without mentioning his heirs; although it was provided in his favour that his share of the succession should amount to a sum greater than the largest provision of any of the younger children; the eldest son having predeceased his father some hours, leaving children—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that his share of his father's succession did not lapse, but went to his children, notwithstanding the distinction made in the terms of the settlement between him and the younger children of the testator, and that his children were alive at its date.

Jacob Dixon, senior, succeeded in 1822, as sole surviving partner, to the whole property, works, and trade of the Dumbarton Glass-Work Company, and thereupon formed a new copartnership with a stock of £98,400, divided into forty-one shares, of which he retained to himself twenty-one shares, giving ten shares to his nephew John Dixon, junior, of Leven Grove (who paid up £24,000, the price of his stock, besides allowing a sum to lie in the hands of the company), and the remaining ten shares to his eldest son Jacob Dixon, junior, who advanced no capital—his proportion being put to his debit in the company books. In November 1824, Jacob Dixon, senior, executed a family trust-settlement, in which he provided for his children in the following manner:

"In the second place, my said trustees shall pay the several provisions following, viz.:—To Anthony Dixon, my second lawful son in life, and the heirs of his body, the sum of £2800, which, with £1200 which I have already paid and advanced for my said son, for outfitting and putting him in business, makes up the sum of £4000 Sterling, which I intend to be the amount of his provision as one of my children, payable the said sum of £2800 to the said Anthony Dixon and his forebears, as follows,' &c.: 'To Joseph Dixon, my third lawful son now in life, and to the heirs of his body, the sum of £1500, which, with the sum of £2500 already advanced to him, or paid by me on his account, makes up the sum of £4000 Sterling, which I intend to be the amount of his provision as one of my children, payable the said sum of £1500 to the said Joseph Dixon and his forebears, as follows,' &c. 'To Elizabeth Dixon, my eldest lawful daughter, spouse of the Reverend William Jaffray, minister of the gospel at Dumbarton, and to the heirs of her body, the sum of £1500, which, with the sum of £1500 which I have already paid and advanced to my said daughter and her husband, makes up the sum of £3000 Sterling, which I intend to be the amount of her provision as one of my children, payable the said sum of £1500 to the said Elizabeth Dixon or Jaffray and her forebears, as follows,' &c. 'To Louisa Dixon, my second lawful daughter, the sum of £3000 Sterling, and to Catherine Ann Sophia Dixon, my youngest lawful daughter, the like sum of £3000 Sterling, payable the said sums to my said daughters at the expiry of one year after their respective majorities or marriages, whichever of these events shall first happen after my decease, or in the event of my surviving these periods, or either of them, then to be payable as follows,' &c. 'In the third place, I appoint my said trustees to make payment of the provisions, annuities, and others, and sustain delivery made by me of the effects specified, and contained in a separate or supplementary trust-deed executed by me in favour of the said trustees, of even date with these presents, to the persons thereafter mentioned. Lastly, I appoint my said trustees to convey, deliver, and make over to Jacob Dixon, my eldest son, the residue of my said means and estate, after satisfying the provisions and others above mentioned, and that so soon after my death as my said trustees may have recovered and laid aside sums sufficient for satisfying the provisions, annuities and others provided by this deed, and the relative supplementary deed before mentioned; care being always taken that my said eldest lawful son shall not receive less out of my means and estate than the sum of £6000 Sterling, or the value thereof."

Jacob Dixon, junior, died on the 25th of September 1831, predeceasing his father, who died the day following, and leaving several children, who were alive at the date of the foresaid settlement. The other children of the testator survived their father. Mr Dixon, senior, left some heritable property, but it was burdened with debts and provisions to a greater amount than its value. His moveable property was very considerable. The pursuers, as the nearest of kin of Mr Jacob Dixon, senior, now brought the present action of declarator against the widow and children of Jacob Dixon, junior, narrating the assumption of Mr Dixon, junior, as a partner of the Dumbarton Glass Company, without contribution of funds, whereby he had been made independent by his father,—that he had formed an illicit connexion with, and subsequently recognised a person of low rank as his wife, by whom he had a family, and the consequent displeasure of Mr Dixon, senior, who never intended to benefit that family; and concluding—That Jacob Dixon, junior, having predeceased his father, the testator, the legacy in his favour had lapsed and became void, and did not transmit or accrue to his children or representatives, nor was there ground for implying in their favour any conditional institution: That Jacob Dixon, senior, having, by the lapse of this legacy, died intestate, as to the residue of his estate, that residue, which, both in respect of the testator's directions to realise by sale the whole of his funds, and because the heritable property he left was exhausted by heritable debt, consisted entirely of moveable succession, belonged to the pursuers and others, the next of kin of Jacob Dixon, senior, and must be accounted for to them by his trustees: That the pursuers, though taking their specific provisions under the said deed, were not barred from maintaining that the said legacy had lapsed, or from claiming their share of their father's intestate succession.

The defenders answered—That the testator was on good terms with his eldest son's family at the date of the settlement, and pleaded, that the provisions made in the trust-deed and settlement of Mr Jacob Dixon, senior, in favour of his eldest son, Mr Jacob Dixon, junior, did not lapse by his predeceasing his father, but implied a conditional institution in favour of his children; and, consequently, that the defenders were entitled to claim the said provisions: That the pursuers were, by the trust-deed, expressly debarred from making any other claim against the estate and effects of Mr Jacob Dickson, senior, except for the special provisions bequeathed to them.

“ 24th February 1836.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the debate, with the closed record and whole process, in respect that the question relates to the construction and effect of a general family settlement by a father upon his children, by which it is manifest that he intended his whole succession to be regulated, and to leave no part of his property to the distribution of the law: And farther, in respect, that by the said settlement, the eldest son is evidently the persona predilecta, and that his share is not, like that of the other children, a definite sum or portion, in full satisfaction of all legal claims, but the whole residue of the estate, after paying the portions of the other children, and even guaranteed, at the expense of those portions, to the extent of a minimum, greatly exceeding the maximum of what is thus provided to each of the other children: Finds that the provision so made in favour of Jacob Dixon, the younger, the testator's said eldest son, did not lapse or fall to the heirs ab intestato of the father, by the said eldest son having predeceased his said father by a few hours; but that the principle of the implied condition si sine liberis decesserit, carries the whole right and benefit of the said provision to the defenders in this action, the surviving children of the said Jacob Dixon, the younger, as conditional institutes in the same; and therefore sustains the defences, assolizies the said defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged, to the auditor for his taxation and report.

“ Note.—Holding the conditio si sine liberis to depend on the presumpta voluntas of the testator, there probably have been few cases, where, on the whole matter, there were so strong reasons for applying it as the present. The only circumstances which could give a colour to the claim of the pursuers, are, 1st,

That the father was aware, when he made his settlement, that his eldest son had children; and, 2d, That in providing for such of his other children as had issue, he has expressly cilled the heirs of their bodies as conditional institutes, but left his provision to the eldest son individually, and without any such addition. In an ordinary case, these circumstances might be of moment, and it is with a view to obviate their effect that the Lord Ordinary has brought into notice the other circumstances which are stated in the body of his judgment; and taking them altogether as elements in the complex question as to the real or presumed will of the testator, he thinks it cannot be reasonably doubted how that question should be decided.

“ The existence of children at the date of the settlement is not of much weight per se, and has often been disregarded in cases of this kind. The variance of style in the provisions for the other married children, and for the eldest son, is no doubt much more material, and in some cases has been held conclusive as to the presumed intention of the testator; and even in the present case, it would present great difficulties, if the eldest son had stood in the settlement in the same line or rank with the other children; that is, as a proper or special legatee for a definite sum of money. But though this is their condition, his is fundamentally different. He is not a legatee in the proper sense at all, but the general heir or successor to the father's whole estate, burdened only with the special legacies to his brothers and sisters, or the heirs of their bodies, and insured even against those encroaching on his inheritance beyond a certain amount. It might be very natural, therefore, for the father to express his intention of continuing those special burdens on his general succession, in favour of the issue of his other children, while he considered no such intimation necessary as to the more comprehensive and final destination of that succession to his eldest son.

“ It is impossible to read the settlement with its codicils, without seeing that it was the testator's enixa voluntas, not to die intestate with regard to any part of this property; and when the concluding words of the deed are attended to, along with the necessary effect of sustaining the claims of the pursuers, it is apprehended that, if effect is to be given to that will and intention, those claims must be rejected. The deed not only leaves the whole residue to the eldest son, but expressly provides, that the portions allotted to the children shall be in full of all legitim, executry, and all that they could ask or claim through his (the father's) death, or that of their mother; and farther declares, that if any of them shall in any way quarrel or object to the settlement, they shall forfeit all right under it. Now, though this clause may appear, in words, to apply to the eldest son as well as the other children, it is manifest that, in substance and effect, it can apply to them only; since the eldest son is made successor in universum jus of the father, and could never therefore be paid off or satisfied of his legal rights by the tender of any specific sum. The meaning of the clause in short is, plainly to exclude and extinguish any claim on the part of the other children or next of kin, as heirs-at-law (in mobilibus) of the father. But it is impossible to give it this effect as against the eldest son, who, by the very terms of this deed, is made heir-at-law and universal successor to the father, under the burden only of their provisions, which are thus limited and conditioned for his sole and exclusive benefit. But the pursuers of this action are those other children, and the claim now insisted in by them is, that, as heirs-at-law, they shall take beyond what they are limited to by the terms of the deed, and make an intestate succession, by denying that there is any ground for presuming that this was in any way contrary to the wish and intention of the testator.

“ From what has now been said, it will be easily seen that, in the view the Lord Ordinary takes of the matter, the cases in which the conditio si sine liberis merely prevents a partial intestacy (where the deceased has settled his whole property by deed), and excludes only the heirs-at-law, to whom nothing is there provided, in that character, are far more favourable cases for its application, than where its effect is to disappoint and exclude nominatim substitutes, who are preferred to such heirs-at-law, and expressly pointed out in the deed as next in the testator's favour to the parents of the children, who are, notwithstanding, allowed to exclude them; and the grounds of this opinion are thought to be too obvious to need explanation. It was not without some surprise, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary found the pursuers maintaining at the debate, that the case which here occurs was the least favourable for the application of the condition in question; and that it was even inadmissible, except where introduced to disappoint an express substitution.

"The argument seemed to be very much rested on the circumstance of the principle of extending a provision for a parent to his children, though not mentioned, being generally described as a condition; which, it was said, implied that there must be some ulterior destination to be effected by such condition; and that this was not the case, where, on the failure of the legatee named, the provision merely fell back into the general estate of the testator. In all this, however, it seems to the Lord Ordinary that the true reason and principle of the law is overlooked for a mere verbal subtlety. It is impossible to reflect for a moment on that principle, without seeing that the only question in all such cases, is, whether there is sufficient ground for holding that the testator truly wished and intended that a provision made to an individual should, on his predecease, go to his surviving children, though not named in the bequest, rather than to that person (whoever he might be), to whom it must have gone if there had been no such children? There must always be some one to whom, in that case, it would have gone; and whether that person was a nominatim substitute, or the next of kin of the testator, is plainly a matter of indifference, except as affording more or less ground for concluding as to the testator's probable intention; and in that view, it seems impossible to doubt that the interest of a nominatim substitute, who is named to the prejudice of the next of kin, must have been more tenderly regarded by the testator, than his next of kin, who is excluded. If the children, therefore, are allowed to cut out the nominatim substitute, it would be strange if they should fail as against the next of kin. Whether they are properly described as succeeding in either case, by virtue of an implied condition on the succession of those who must take, if they do not;—or, whether this is less of the nature of a condition, where the person so taking claims only on the hereditas jacens of the testator, —are matters which do not seem at all to touch the plain principle upon which they do succeed, and resolve rather into criticism on the language used in law books in relation to this rule of law, than arguments as to the grounds of its application. If the heirs-at-law had been actually called, by a form of words importing a substitution, is it possible to suppose that this would have given the children of the predeceasing eldest son a better right to exclude them, than if they had been passed by altogether, and never once named (in that character) in the settlement? and yet this is the argument of the pursuers. If the testator had said, 'and failing my said eldest son, I direct the provision hereby made for him to be divided equally among my next of kin,' the pursuers admit that they would have been excluded by his surviving children. But they contend that the children can have no claim in this case, because the next of kin are not called at all in the settlement; and that their taking any thing in that character is indeed anxiously precluded. To the Lord Ordinary it seems impossible to give any weight to such an argument, of which he can find no trace in any former case on the subject. On the contrary, it appears that effect was given to the principle, as against heirs-at-law, in one branch at least of the case of Wallace, 28th January 1807 (Mor. App. voce Clause, No. 6), and in the very recent case of Wilkie against Jackson, which was decided last week by the First Division, adhering to an interlocutor of Lord Corehouse of 30th June 1835. That last case indeed presented both the grounds of difficulty on which the pursuers rely in the present; the children who prevailed having been in existence at the date of the settlement, and the provisions to the other children, in the same deed, being taken expressly to their heirs, while those to their mother were only given to her individually."

The pursuers reclaimed, maintaining that Mr Dixon, senior, never intended to favour the offspring of his eldest son, and that the conditio si sine liberis only applied where there was an ulterior substitution.

At advising on the 10th June 1836, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review, in so far as it finds that the provision made in favour of Jacob Dixon, the younger, the testator's eldest son, did not lapse or fall to the heirs ab intestato of the father, by the said eldest son predeceasing his father, and assuages the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and finds them entitled to expenses: Find additional expenses due, allow an account to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report, and decern."

The pursuers appealed, pleading—(1.) That according to the doctrines of the Roman law, as explained by the best commentators, the presumption of pietas paterna, on which this case was decided in the Court below, is plainly inadmissible in the circumstances, inasmuch as contrary presumptions combine to exclude its application: Justinian, L. 6, Cod. de Inst. et Subst. Voet. ad Lib. Dig. 36, t. 1, § 17, 18, 19. Mantica, Lib. X. t. 8, § 9, 16, 22. Grassus Recept. Senten. Lib. de Fideicom. Quæstio, 25. (2.) The respondents' plea, under the existing circumstances, derives no support from any of the institutional writers, and is plainly inconsistent with the dicta of Erskine and Bankton. See Bankt. Vol. I. p. 227. Ersk. B. III. t. 8, § 46. (3.) It is at variance with the principles of many of the decisions of the Scottish Courts, and no one decision can be quoted as plainly and unequivocally supporting it. It is particularly opposed to the case of Yule v. Yule, 20th December 1758, Mor. p. 6400. Watt v. Jervie, 30th July 1760, Mor. p. 6401. Oliphant v. Oliphant, 19th June 1793. It is not supported by the case of Neilson v. Baillie, 4th June 1822, which was not properly a case of presumed intention, but rather of express intention imperfectly worded; and the principle for which the appellants contend was clearly recognised in the cases of Lord Lauderdale, 19th May 1830. Greig v. Malcolm, 5th March 1835, and Leitch v. Leitch, affirmed 17th February 1829. In the case of Wilkie v. Jackson, 11th February 1836, founded on by the Lord Ordinary, the material plea as to the supposed lapsing of the provisions was given up, and not pressed to a decision in the Inner-House, and it cannot, therefore, be a precedent. The ratio assigned by the Lord Ordinary, of the eldest son having been evidently the persona predilecta, can have no application to the circumstances of his children, whose birth and acquired status of legitimation had been matter of offence to the testator.

The respondents pleaded an affirmance, and founded (1.) on the general doctrine of the Roman law, si sine liberis, as admittedly embodied into the Scottish law, and recognised in numerous decisions, both of an early and recent date: Magistrates of Montrose v. Robertson, 21st November 1738, Mor. p. 6398. Walker, 7th December 1744, Elchies, voce "Implied Will," No. 5. Wood, 26th June 1789, Mor. p. 13,043. Binning, 21st January 1767, Mor. p. 13,047. Baillie v. Neilson, 4th June 1822. Cuthbertson, 1st March 1781, Mor. p. 6279. Wallace, 28th January 1807, Mor. App., voce "Clause," No. 5. Christie, 5th July 1822, F. C., p. 667. Booth, 8th February 1831. Colquhoun v. Campbell, 5th June 1829. Wilkie, 11th February 1836. (2.) On the true construction of Mr Jacob Dixon's settlement, and its plain meaning, by which the appellants were barred from making any demand against his estate, except for the special provisions given to them by the deed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case, when your Lordships heard the argument ex parte, I entertained some doubt as to the interlocutor which is the subject-matter of appeal. Upon looking, however, into the cases that were referred to, and the principle on which the cases depend, I am perfectly satisfied that the interlocutor is right. My Lords, the rule, that where there is a gift to a child, and a gift over upon the death of that child, the gift over does not take effect if the child has issue,—is established beyond all question, and is not matter of dispute. There seems below to have been some contest as to whether that principle applied to the case where the gift was of the surplus, and there was no gift over. Now it appears to me, as it was stated by the Lord Ordinary below, that that is a much stronger case in favour of the principle. Where there is a gift over, the gift over does not take effect because of the presumption of law, that the intention of the settler was that the issue of the child should take; and it would therefore be very strange, if, when there was a mere gift, and no gift over, the same presumption did not arise, and the issue of the child stood in the place of the parent. So far, therefore, as that general principle regulates this case, very little difficulty or doubt has been raised at your Lordships' bar. But it is said, that in this case there are two peculiarities which make it an exception to that rule: The one is, that the father, the settler, was aware of the existence of the issue of the child: The other is, that in the same instrument provision is made for the issue of his other children. Now, with regard to the first, I do not find that that ever has been considered, per se, as constituting an exception to the rule. No doubt it is a circumstance by which, aided by other circumstances, the presumption of law may be rebutted, but, per se, it does not constitute an exception to the rule; and it would be very strange if it were so decided. In the first place, it would be strange that the father of the child should not know the state of his own family—that may happen from the birth of a posthumous child, or from other circumstances which rarely can occur,—but as soon as the principle is established, viz., that there is a presumption of law in favour of the issue of a child, it naturally follows that the necessity of introducing the words is to a certain degree taken away; and it would be very strange indeed, when the law, under these circumstances, gives the provision to the issue of the child, if the father were presumed not to have intended that which the principle of the law presumes for him. That circumstance, however, per se, has never, as far as I can find in the authorities which were referred to, been considered as constituting an exception to the rule. Then the other exception undoubtedly is entitled to a little more consideration, which is, that in providing for his married daughter, he provides for the children of that married daughter. My Lords, the Lord Ordinary makes observations upon that part of the case which are entitled to weight and consideration. He takes notice of the different position in which the daughter and the eldest son (the interests of whose children are now in question) were placed. With regard to the daughter, there is a certain sum of money given to her, and provision is made for her and her children after her, in the event of her death. With regard to the son, he makes him general heir of his real and personal estate,—a difference of disposition which may well explain why the testator has varied the terms of provision for the one and the other. But, my Lords, independently of that, I have not found any cases in which a variation in the provision for children has per se been considered to rebut the presumption of law; but, on the contrary, there are several cases in which it has existed, and in which, at the same time, the presumption has been considered as arising—coupled with other circumstances it is true; and other circumstances there are in this case. Now the two cases to which I more particularly refer, are the case of Roughhead v. Rainnie, in Morrison, 6403, and the other case which is particularly referred to by the Lord Ordinary. In both those cases there were express provisions for the issue of the children, and yet the Court considered that that presumption of law was raised. My Lords—finding, therefore, that the principle is established, that it is clearly not in dispute, but acknowledged to be part of the law of Scotland, and this case not falling within the exceptions to that rule,—I have come to the clear conclusion, that the interlocutor appealed from is correct; and under the circumstances, the interlocutor having been pronounced with the unanimous opinion of the Judges of the Court below, I would propose to your Lordships that it should be affirmed, with costs.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, that the judgment below is right, and ought to be affirmed; and I shall state to your Lordships the grounds upon which I have, with him, arrived at this conclusion. It is unnecessary to examine the origin of the rule, that the condition of failure of issue is implied where provisions are made for children, and the subject-matter of these provisions is given over, whether to other children or to strangers, and that such provisions generally do not lapse by predecease of the legatee, leaving issue; or to inquire how far the civil law adopted the same rule, which must be admitted to have been exceedingly consistent with its general principle, that children could only be disinherited expressly, and in a certain manner and mode. It is very possible that the Scotch law may have carried the principle somewhat further than the Roman. It appears, indeed, that the late decisions have extended it beyond the doctrine in former times recognised as law; and there seems a doubt, whether, at the time when Mr Erskine wrote, it prevailed to its full extent. The current of these decisions seems to leave no reasonable doubt that such is the rule; that it has been extended even to collateral, though near relations of the settler or testator, and that it must prevail upon the ground of a presumed intention not expressed, unless something appears sufficient to rebut the presumption. The question here is, whether any such thing exists in the present case. The two circumstances to which my noble and learned friend has referred, and which are relied upon, are the existence of Jacob Dixon's children with the knowledge of his father when he made his settlement, and the different manner in which the provision is made for Jacob, and for the other sons and the married daughter. It does not appear that the sons are married, but the eldest daughter is married. It is clear that the existence of children will not take the case out of the rule; for if this had been sufficient, several of the cases could not have been decided as they have been,—among others, the case of Neilson v. Baillie, in which the eldest daughter had two children at the time of executing the trust-deed. The words "and foresaids" have been relied upon as the ground of this decision; and it certainly does appear that those words were in the deed, and were taken notice of by one of the learned Judges who decided that case. But, on examining the judgment, it appears that only one of the five learned Judges makes any reference to these words; and even he does not ground his opinion upon them, but relies, as the others do, upon the general rule of si sine liberis, which would not have been at all necessary had words of inheritance been in the limitation sufficient of themselves to prevent a lapse. Indeed, the words in question ("and foresaids") do not appear to affect the whole gift, which is of the general residue, real and personal, while these words are introduced in excepting a part of the estate from the operation of the gift during the life of the wife. In other instances, it has been said, the existence of a child for a length of time after the settlement, without any alteration being made in it, repelled the presumption. But in the leading case of the Magistrates of Montrose v. Robertson, this circumstance had no effect: nor does it appear that this circumstance determined the case of Yule v. Yule, which was only a partial settlement affecting one-fourth of the father's property. The mention of the heirs of the body in the provision for the other sons and the married daughter, appears to be a stronger circumstance than the existence of Jacob's children, and the existence of Jacob's children known to the settler, otherwise it could not have any effect. But it does not appear sufficient in this case to countervail the presumption which would exclude a lapse. It is needless to inquire what would have been the effect of such a diversity, had the question arisen upon a provision to the eldest son of the same kind with the provisions to the other sons, and differing only by the omission of words of inheritance; because this is not that case. We are here upon a gift of the entire residue of the whole estate, real and personal, as my noble and learned friend has justly observed, and as the Lord Ordinary observed, after special provision carried out of it for the younger children; and that residuary gift further distinguished from the other gifts by a direction, that it shall, at all events, and at the cost, if need be, of the other provisions, be made up to a certain sum at the least, which sum, as the learned Lord Ordinary has remarked, is greater than the largest amount given to any of the other children. This is not a case in which the different frame of the other limitations can exclude the application of the rule by rebutting the presumed intention of the settler,—nor does it appear that such a difference, though certainly a very strong circumstance, can be held, generally and absolutely, as sufficient to exclude the application of the rule, even where the provisions to which the diversity applies are exactly of the same nature. The argument which has been maintained, both in the cases and at the bar, that the rule rests, in many of the decisions, upon the force of the words “children or issue,” can never be extended to the rule generally; but it seems very seldom, if ever, to have been the ground of decision. Indeed, it cannot be the ground of any decision which turns upon the provision being to children; for the rule does not extend to legacies from strangers: it is always rested upon the pietas paterna, and proceeds upon the presumption that the parent would not disappoint the issue of his children, if those children happened to predecease himself. But the cases are numerous which leave no doubt on this point, and particularly the case of the Magistrates of Montrose v. Robertson, where the bond was made payable to the four sons by name. Nay, in Wood v. Acheson, 26th June 1789, we find the counsel—who argued against the application of the rule to the case of unborn issue—admitting that the law might be different as to the descendants of those to whom the gift was made nominatim, and whom he seems to have thought clearly within the application of the rule. The Court held, that in “all such provisions, both of the one class and the other, the issue of children predeceasing were entitled to the parents’ share. Nor is it immaterial to observe that the counsel, whose admission is referred to, was Mr Wright, and the Judge, whose view of the subject was adopted by the Court, was Lord Braxfield—two of the most eminent lawyers of their day. The case just now referred to (of the Magistrates of Montrose v. Robertson) is exceedingly strong upon the general principle, and appears to have been held as deciding the question for a long time past. We find it referred to in all the decisions. Nor is the decision the less strong for having been given in a question between the party claiming the benefit of provision, and the obligors in a bond granted by them to the father, which obligors had paid the money, as was alleged, and was held by the Court in their own wrong. It is the stronger on this account; and, indeed, it does not distinctly appear that the money in question was the sole provision made for the parties. It amounted only to about £10 among four children, all named. My noble and learned friend having referred to the case of Routhead, it is unnecessary to observe upon the other cases which have been cited in support of this judgment, excepting that of Wilkie v. Jackson, which is very material, even if we were to admit that there is weight in the observations made for the appellant touching its peculiarities, and that these distinguish it in some respects from the present case. For, in the first place, it affords an additional confirmation of the doctrine already stated, that the implied condition si sine liberis is not at all confined to limitations to children or issue,—Margaret and Janet being expressly named, and the claim being made by the grandson of Margaret, as representing her eldest son, against James the grandson of the settler, as representing his uncles, sons of the settler: So that the claimant did not come in under any limitation to children or issue; and, secondly, all the provisions made to Margaret, the settler’s eldest daughter, were held to descend upon her son, and, through him, upon her grandson, as well those which had been made to her without any mention of heirs and assigns, as those which had been made to her with mention of heirs and assigns. This, therefore, meets the principal objection to the application of the rule in the present case. Nor is it any answer to urge, that the general clause making the provisions for the younger children burdens upon the land, has the words “and their aforesaid,” because, admitting this to mean “their heirs aforesaid,” it would only affect those preceding limitations in which heirs had been mentioned, were it not for the implied condition si sine liberis, and would of itself only make those preceding provisions which were limited by such words, burdens on the land, and not the other provisions; and yet J. Wilkie recovered for the whole, as well for those that had not the words of inheritance as for those that had. The ground of the decision is, that by force of the implied condition si sine liberis, the provisions to Margaret did not lapse by her predecease; and this, be it observed, is the decision of the same very learned Judge (Lord Corehouse) who has been cited as holding in another case (Greig v. Malcolm), that the difference of omitting the mention of heirs in one limitation and inserting it in another, is, as it were, conclusive proof of a different intention, and excludes the application of the rule. The case of Greig v. Malcolm, when examined, does not at all bear out this inference as to the scope of Lord Corehouse’s observation; but were that left in any doubt, his Lordship’s decision in Wilkie v. Jackson would remove it. I therefore agree entirely with my noble and learned friend, that the decision of the Court below has proceeded upon right grounds; and for the reasons which I have stated, and which have been stated by my noble and learned friend, I agree with him that the decision ought to be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

Second Division.—Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—Archibald Grahame, Appellants’ Solicitor.—Richardson and Connell, Respondents’ Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

16th March 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 81.—GEORGE CAIRNS, Solicitor-at-Law, Edinburgh, Appellant, v. ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, Esq. of Thirdpart, Respondent.

Mandate—Expenses—Process—Foreign—A foreigner brought an action in this Court, and sisted a mandatory; and while the record was in the course of preparation, the mandatory lodged in process a minute of withdrawal as mandatory, which was not objected to, and a new mandatory was ordered to be sisted, but it afterwards appeared that at the date of lodging this minute, the mandant had died, or was believed to have died abroad; his representatives failing to appear and sist themselves as parties—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the mandatory, though not entitled to carry on the action for the purpose of showing that no expenses would in the issue have been found due to the defender, was nevertheless liable to the defender in the expenses incurred by him in the process during the subsistence of the mandate. 2. That the mandatory was not entitled to be reponed against the judgment of the Court of Session finding him liable in these expenses, on the allegation that it had since been discovered that the mandant was still alive.

In October 1833, John Rogers of Well Street, London, raised an action against Major Anstruther for payment of a £500 bill, on which his name appeared as an indorser. To that action Cairns was sisted as mandatory on behalf of Rogers. Anstruther pleaded a variety of defences; inter alia, that the bill had not been duly negotiated, and that he had indorsed it without value; and, after a condescendence and answers had been lodged, a protracted examination, on commission, of havens ensued, and among others, Rogers himself was examined. The diligence was reported; but before the record was closed or parties heard, and while no decerniture, interim or otherwise, had been pronounced, Cairns intimated his intention to withdraw as mandatory. He accordingly lodged a minute in November 1836, to that effect in process, which was duly seen, and not objected to, and intimation was made to Rogers, at his address, by post, of the fact; and thereafter the Lord Ordinary appointed Rogers to sist a mandatory. No mandatory, however, having been sisted, the defender enrolled the cause and asked decree of absolvitor, and likewise a decree against Cairns for the whole expenses incurred by the defender in the process.

It appeared, or was at all events confidently believed, that, at the date of Cairns's lodging the minute withdrawing from process as mandatory, Rogers had died in America, which accounted for the failure to obtemper the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Cairns denied that he knew at that time of the mandant's death.

The Lord Ordinary reported the point as to the mandatory's liability for the expenses, to the Court, when, on consultation, it was suggested that the case should be superseded for some time, in order to allow the representatives of Rogers to sist themselves; but they failed to appear. The Lord Ordinary again reported the case, when the parties were ordered to give in minutes of debate, for the argument maintained in which see ante, Vol. XI. pp. 55-57. On advising these, the Court (15th November 1838) found the mandatory liable in the expenses hitherto incurred by the defender, and in the expense of discussing the point.

The mandatory appealed, and in his appeal case pleaded a reversal for the following reasons:—1. Because the mandate having fallen, and the action having become abated by the death of Rogers, the pursuer and mandant, whose representative has neither been sisted, nor otherwise made a party, there was no existing process in which any interlocutors, either on the merits of the cause or on the accessory question of costs, could be competently or lawfully pronounced. 2. Because it was premature, irregular, and illegal to give decree for expenses of process, without determining the merits of the cause, or otherwise disposing of the conclusions of the summons. 3. Because, although the action had not become abated, the interlocutors under appeal were erroneous and unjust; in respect the condition of the appellant's obligation as mandatory was, that he should be answerable for costs, only in the event of their being awarded against his constituent; whereas no such award has yet been pronounced, and the appellant did not, either ex mandato or otherwise, contract any obligation to guarantee or insure the respondent against the contingency of the pursuer's death, or to be responsible in any other event, except that of a judgment for costs against the pursuer. 4. Because, if the action were to be held as subsisting to the effect of entitling the respondent to ask a decree for costs against the appellant, it follows that it must also be subsisting to the effect of entitling the appellant to show, by trying the cause on its merits or otherwise, that no decree for costs ought to be pronounced against him. 5. Because, even on the respondent's own showing, his claim against the appellant is not such as can be competently made effectual by any step in the original process, but requires a separate suit, in which the respondent must instruct his cause of action habili modo, while the appellant, on the other hand, will have the usual privilege of showing cause why decree should not be pronounced against him.

The respondent, in his appeal case, maintained the same argument which had been successful in the Court of Session.

At the hearing of the appeal the appellant stated, that since the date of the judgment of the Court below, it had been discovered that the mandant Rogers was still alive, and he pleaded, that this res noviter changed the aspect of the case, and of itself entitled him to be reponed against the judgment under appeal.

The respondent answered, that the allegation of the mandant being alive, if true, did not in the least degree affect the rationes of the judgment appealed against, which proceeded upon the failure of Rogers himself, or his representatives, to find a new mandatory, though regularly called upon to do so.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case appeared at your Lordships' bar under peculiar circumstances. The course of the proceeding below was to fix a mandatory with the costs of an action in which he had joined with the pursuer, up to the time of his applying to the Court for liberty to be discharged. Now, that it was competent to him to make that application cannot be disputed; and it is equally clear, indeed, that was not disputed at the bar; and if it had been, the case of Gordon v. Gordon would have established beyond all question, that although he had a right to withdraw from the situation of mandatory, he could not relieve himself from the costs that had been incurred during the period for which he had continued the mandatory of the pursuer; and it appears from the case of Gordon v. Gordon to be equally clear, that, according to the course of proceeding in Scotland, if the principal pursuer have notice that his mandatory has applied for leave to withdraw, and to be relieved from the responsibility of the future costs, and to have a new mandatory substituted in his place, and fail to sist another mandatory, the defender would be absolved from the consequences of the action, and the mandatory would have been liable to pay the costs up to the time of his withdrawal. The case of Gordon v. Gordon establishes that proposition to its fullest extent. Now, it appears that in this case the mandatory took that course, and made an application to be relieved from the liability for future costs; and in the second page of the appellant's case, the proceedings for the purpose are thus stated: "And this intimation the memorialist followed up, of this date (23d November 1836), by lodging in process a minute withdrawing from the process as mandatory for the pursuer, Rogers. In this minute the memorialist prayed the Lord Ordinary to authorise notice of his resignation to be given to Mr Rogers, so as to afford him an opportunity of sisting another mandatory, and, for that purpose, to address a letter through the post-office to Mr Rogers at his last-known residence in London, containing a copy of the minute and interlocutor. The minute was of this date,"—that is, 25th November—"allowed to be seen at a calling of the cause, attended by the defender's counsel; and thereafter, of this date (23d December), Lord Corehouse, Ordinary, pronounced an interlocutor appointing intimation to be made in terms of the foregoing minute, in order that the pursuer (Rogers) may have an opportunity of authorising a new mandatory in this cause." Then, under the date of 1st March 1837, "the Lord Ordinary appointed Mr Rogers to give in a mandate in favour of a mandatory ready to sist himself; but no mandatory having been sisted, the defender enrolled the cause, and asked decree of absolvitor, and also a decree for expenses of process against the memorialist, Mr Cairns, as mandatory." In that state of the cause it appears that a proceeding took place with regard to the defender; and before the matter was ultimately disposed of, it appears that an impression prevailed,—which seems to have originated in a communication from the defender, it is true, but adopted without inquiry by the pursuer, the mandatory—that Rogers was dead. Now, the Court had proceeded regularly for the relief of the mandatory from future costs, but had subjected him, undoubtedly, to the costs already incurred,—a new mandatory being to be named by Rogers, the pursuer. In that state of the case, the matter came before the Court with a statement that seemed to be admitted, and acquiesced in on both sides, that instead of Rogers being in a situation to appoint a new mandatory, he was dead. Now, if he had been dead, the course of proceeding, I apprehend, would have been to call upon his representatives to have gone on with the cause; and upon their declining to go on with the cause which

Rogers had instituted in his lifetime, the consequences would have been the same,—namely, that the mandatory would have been liable in the costs incurred up to that period. But it does not appear that anything was done, calling upon the representatives to adopt that course. Whether there was or was not, does not very distinctly appear. There is nothing in the papers showing that anything was done pursuing that course. It is obvious that some proceeding of that sort ought to have been adopted, upon the supposition of Rogers being dead, for this reason, that it was quite possible—perhaps probable—that if any representatives had been called upon to prosecute the cause, it might ultimately have been discovered that there were no costs to be paid by the mandatory at all. The result of the suit, whether carried on by the original pursuer or by his representatives, might have established such a case against the defender as would have made the defender liable for the costs, or, at all events, have prevented the pursuer from being liable for any part of the costs, or have prevented the mandatory from being liable to pay any part of the costs. Notice to the representatives of the pursuer to go on with the cause might, I say, have ultimately produced that effect if they had appeared, and had gone on with the suit; but there is, in substance, no evidence of any notice having been given to the representatives. If the case had stopped there, it would have been for your Lordships to consider whether the better and safer course would not have been to have remitted it to the Court of Session for the purpose of seeing that that course was pursued, which it appears necessary should be pursued, in order to meet the exigency of the case which I have spoken of as likely and possible to exist. But, at your Lordships' bar, the case has taken a completely different turn; for now the appellant, who complains of this procedure, tells your Lordships that the pursuer is not dead,—that Rogers is in fact still alive, although, in the Court below, the interlocutor appealed from has proceeded on the assumption that he is dead. It is stated as a matter of some suspicion, and was so stated at your Lordships' bar when the case was first heard some six weeks ago, and that was repeated when an opportunity for investigating the fact had occurred on the last day when the case was in hearing, but your Lordships have to rely on the statement of the appellant, that there has been that misapprehension as to the fact of the proceeding below. Whether that misapprehension arose originally from any statement on the part of the defender, or from want of due inquiry on the part of the mandatory, is not very material for the present purpose. I am calling your Lordships' attention to it, for the purpose of stating to your Lordships what appears to me to be the right course to be pursued under these circumstances. If the cause were remitted to the Court of Session with a view to further proceedings adapted to the alleged change of circumstances, and, if Mr Rogers is still alive, still these proceedings must terminate in the same order which has been pronounced: whatever difference there may be in point of form, it must be in substance the same. It appears, from what I have stated from the appellant's case, that all the proceedings calling on Rogers to substitute a new mandatory had been gone through, and that he had not done so. The case was in that state in which it was competent for the Court to make the mandatory pay the costs at the time he applied to be discharged: therefore, the obvious result—the necessary result of this proceeding in the Court of Session would be, to obtain an order in substance precisely the same. That being the case in point of fact, it appears to me that it would be an idle course of proceeding, and putting the parties to unnecessary expense, that your Lordships should remit the cause to the Court of Session, and thus oblige them to obtain the same end by an expensive and circuitous proceeding. Under these circumstances,—it being, I understand, admitted by the appellant that the pursuer, Rogers, is alive, and therefore it being admitted that those proceedings were regular in which he was called upon to substitute a new mandatory,—and it being admitted that he had not done so,—it appearing to me from the case of Gordon v. Gordon, that the necessary result of that state of proceedings would be to absolve the defender, and to make the mandatory pay the costs up to the time when he applied to be discharged, which is, in substance, the order of which the appellant complains,—I conceive your Lordships will be of opinion that you are not bound to put the parties to the expense of being exposed to additional delay and costs, for the purpose of arriving at the same end. Under these circumstances, therefore, and on the ground that Rogers is now alive, though the Court below proceeded upon a misapprehension as to the fact, as the reasons for their procedure are in substance proved to be correct, and the result must be precisely the same, I think that your Lordships' safest course would be, to affirm the interlocutor originally appealed from. If, however, it be suggested that there is any doubt as to the fact which has been stated at your Lordships' bar, that might induce your Lordships to take a different course. But, assuming that the appellant is right in stating that Rogers is alive, I think your Lordships, upon the ground of that admission, will be doing that which is best for all parties, by affirming the interlocutor.

Interlocutor affirmed, with costs.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 82.—DAME ANNE CAMPBELL BAIRD PRESTON of Valleyfield, Appellant, v. THE RIGHT HONOURABLE VISCOUNT MELVILLE AND OTHERS, Trustees of Sir Robert Preston, Bart., Respondents.—(First Appeal).

The SAME PARTY Appellant, v. The SAME PARTIES Respondents.—(Second Appeal).

Trust.—Testament.—Entail.—Jurisdiction.—Foreign.—Executry.—Administration, Right of.—A testator left a general trust-deed of his heritable and moveable property, wherever situated, in favour of trustees, for certain purposes,—the trust to be subject to any entail of the heritage which he might execute, and which entail, it was declared, should be held and taken to be a part of the trust. The testator subsequently executed an entail. On his decease, the trustees named in the trust-deed declined to act. The heiress of entail first entitled to succeed made up titles under the entail and was infest, and likewise confirmed to the moveables in Scotland, and administered to the personally in England. With consent of all concerned, including the said heiress of entail, new trustees were appointed by the Court, in place of those who declined to act. These new trustees then brought two actions against the said heiress of entail; the 1st, to have it declared that the whole property, funds and effects, belonging to the testator in Scotland, England, and elsewhere, including the funds and effects held by the said heiress of entail under the letters of administration, pertain to, and are vested in the pursuers in trust; and the 2d, to have it declared that the pursuers are entitled to all the powers given to the trustees named in the trust-deed, and as such, to make up titles to the lands in which the said heiress of entail was infest, and to obtain themselves seized therein, so as to carry into effect the purposes of the trust—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the power of appointing persons to recover and administer property situated in England is vested exclusively in the ecclesiastical courts of that country, and therefore, that the administration of the testator's property in England must remain with the said heiress of entail, by virtue of the letters of administration held by her; but, 2. (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that notwithstanding the infestment of the heiress of entail under the entail, it was feudally competent for the trustees to obtain themselves seized in the whole lands, qua trustees, in order to effect the objects of the trust.

The late Sir Robert Preston of Valleyfield, who was a domiciled Scotsman, died in this country on 7th May 1834, leaving several deeds regulating his succession. He had executed (in October 1832 and April 1833) a general disposition and deed of settlement, whereby, under certain reservations, he conveyed his whole property, whether heritable or moveable, and wherever situated, to Sir Coutts Trotter, Bart., Edward Marjoribanks, and Sir Edmund Antrobus, Bart., as trustees, to be held in trust for certain purposes; and these parties were also appointed sole executors and intromitters with his personal funds and estate. This deed did not contain any special enumeration or conveyance of the truster's property, and there was no procuratory or precept. In regard to the vesting of the property in the trustees, the deed proceeded:

"Surrogating, and by these presents substituting the said trustees, and the survivors of them, in my full right and place of the premises, with power to them to do every thing that I could have done before granting hereof, and binding and obliging me and my heirs to make up complete titles to the said lands, heritages, and heritable debts above disposed, if necessary, and to convey the same in all form to the persons above mentioned" (the trustees named) "and their foresaids, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned."

It was provided that the trustees should hold the lands of Spencerfield, Inverkeithing and others, situated in the county of Fife, and all others belonging to the testator in fee-simple, with the exception of certain other lands therein named,

"subject to the entail or entails thereof, to be executed by me subsequent to the date hereof, in favour of myself and the heirs whatsoever of my body; whom failing, in favour of Dame Anne Preston Campbell or Baird, my niece, eldest daughter of my brother, Patrick Preston, younger of Valleyfield, and relict of General Sir David Baird, Bart., and Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, and the heirs of her body; whom failing, Catherine Preston, my niece, youngest daughter of the said Patrick Preston, and the heirs of her body; whom failing, Dame Anne Preston or Hay, my niece, daughter of my brother, Colonel George Preston, and wife of Sir John Hay of Smithfield and Haystoun, Bart., and the heirs of her body; whom failing, Charles Dashwood Bruce, merchant in London, nephew of Thomas Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, the Honourable James Bruce, the second son of the said Thomas Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, so long as he shall not succeed to and be in right of the title of Earl of Elgin, and the heirs-male of the body of the said James Bruce not succeeding to, or in right of the said title; whom failing, to the third and other younger sons of the said Thomas Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, in the order of their seniority, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, not succeeding to, or being in the right of the said title; whom all failing, my own nearest heirs whatsoever, or assignees, and subject to all the provisions, declarations, reservations, limitations, burdens, clauses prohibitory, irritant, and resolute, powers, and faculties to be contained in such deed or deeds of entail: which deed or deeds of entail shall be held and taken to be a part hereof."

Power was reserved to execute deeds of entail; and in case of the trustees failing to do so, or the deeds of entail to be executed being thought subject to exception, the trustees were taken bound to execute valid deeds of entail on the series of heirs he had indicated, and containing all the conditions, provisions, &c., of a strict tailzie.

Under the second head of the deed it was provided that the trustees should hold

"the said abbey and estate of Culross, and all other lands and heritages which shall belong to me in fee-simple, and situated within the parish of Culross, and also the lands and farm of Ranniewalls, including the dominium utile of the lands of Kirkbrae, to which I have right, subject to the other entail or entails thereof, to be executed by me subsequent to the date hereof, in favour of myself and the heirs whatsoever of my body; whom failing, in favour of the said Dame Anne Preston Campbell or Baird, for her life; whom failing," in favour of the same series of heirs as above; "which deed or deeds of entail shall be held and taken to be a part hereof; and I not only reserve power and liberty to execute such deed or deeds of entail of the said abbey, estate and others last mentioned, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

The truster further took his trustees bound to execute a valid entail in favour of that series of heirs, in case any nullity should be objected to the deeds of entail he might execute,—to record the deeds of entail in the proper register after his death; "and to make up and complete all necessary and feudal titles to the lands included therein, so that the said entails may be rendered effectual in law." The deed further provided:

"But declaring that any entails of the said lands and others, whether executed by myself or my trustees, or titles completed thereto in the persons of any of my said heirs, shall not interfere with or come in competition with the ends and purposes declared in the present trust, of and concerning my said fee-simple lands and heritages, during the survivance of my said three nieces first called to the succession thereof, but said entails shall, during the lives of my said three nieces, and survivors and survivor of them, continue suspended and in abeyance, so far as regards the rents and produce of my said lands and estates, which shall be received and applied by my trustees in the manner after declared."

In virtue of the powers reserved in the above trust-deed, Sir Robert Preston, "agreeably to, and in terms of my trust-disposition and deed of settlement, dated 17th October 1832," executed two separate entails in November 1832, of the heritable property generally conveyed by the trust-deed in favour of the defender and the series of substitute heirs mentioned in the trust-deed.

Sir Robert Preston died leaving, in addition to his heritable property in Scotland, large personal funds vested in Bank of England stock and in the public funds.

The trustees named by the general trust-settlement declined to accept. Meantime, the defender had herself served heiress of entail and provision, and completed her titles under the entail, and was duly infeft. It was averred that these steps had been taken, as one of several measures, with the concurrence of all concerned, with a view to effect an arrangement for the management of the estate situated in Scotland, and further, in view of taking other measures for the management of the personal property situated in England. About the same time (July 1834), letters of administration quoad the personal property in England, were expedited in favour of the defender—Miss Catherine Preston and Lady Hay, wife of Sir John Hay, becoming her sureties therein; and, besides, confirmation was expedited in Scotland as to the moveable property there, in favour of the defender qua nearest of kin to the testator. These steps, it was said, were taken with a view to a general arrangement, rendered necessary by the state of embarrassment into which matters had been thrown by the trustees declining to act, but not with a view to supersede the trust-deed.

Thereafter, an application was presented to the Court in July 1834, by Charles Dashwood Bruce, Esq., the Honourable James Bruce, and the Honourable Alexander Maconochie of Meadowbank, all of whom were interested in the testator's succession under the trust-settlement, setting forth the deed, the declinature of the trustees therein named, &c., and subsuming, that as the testator was a domiciled Scotsman, the whole of his moveable property, wherever situated, was subject to the laws and regulations of the Courts of Scotland, and praying the Court, inter alia, to appoint James Ferguson, one of the principal clerks of Court, or some other proper person, trustee for executing the foresaid trust-disposition and deed of settlement.

This application was opposed by Sir John and Lady Hay, who were both interested in the succession, and who, on a similar narrative and subsumption to the other application, prayed the Court to appoint the present pursuers (respondents) as trustees, and to ordain the present defender and Dame Anne Hay, as the executrix qua nearest of kin and heir-at-law of the testator, to execute such conveyances of the trust-property vested in them, in favour of the pursuers, so named trustees, as might be necessary for vesting in them the right and administration of the whole of the testator's estate, real and personal, situated in Scotland or elsewhere, and for enabling them to carry into effect the purposes of the trust.

The trustees averred that this proceeding, as well as the others, had been taken with the concurrence of the defender, in order that the purposes of the trust might be executed, and matters explicated; and it was not contemplated that the defender was to retain possession of the English funds under her letters of administration, or that she was to throw the affairs into Chancery, but that she was, so far as in her lay, to assist in making over these funds to the parties to be named as trustees by the Court, for the purposes of the trust. These statements were, however, denied.

Appearance was made by the defender and others, who opposed these applications; but afterwards parties came to an understanding, and the Court, on 19th May 1835, of consent,

"appoint the" pursuers, "and the survivors and survivor of them, to be trustees for executing the different powers, and carrying into effect the provisions contained in the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement and will, dated the 17th day of April 1833, executed by the deceased Sir Robert Preston of Valleyfield, Bart., and codicils thereto, referred to in the said petition, and that in room and place of the trustees named by the said Sir Robert Preston, who have declined to accept, and with all the powers and faculties conferred upon the said original trustees by the said trust-deed, and decern."

After extracting the above warrant in favour of the trustees, the defender, Lady Baird, in November 1835, then assigned to the trustees appointed by the Court, the personal property in Scotland to which she had confirmed; but in the deed of assignation she introduced a salvo of any right competent to her under Sir Robert Preston's deeds.

In regard to the personal property situated in England, to which she had administered, the defender admitted that she was bound to apply them, as administratrix, in fulfilment and payment of the purposes and legacies to which the money was destined by the testator; and she had accordingly paid various legacies, &c. She, however, declined to denude of the residue in favour of the pursuers, in consequence of which they filed a bill in Chancery, with a view to compel her to get her accounts passed, and herself exonered of her intromissions, and the residue vested in the pursuers. The defender filed a counter bill, narrating the Scotch deeds and proceedings, in which she prayed that the funds should be applied in terms of the trust, under the eye of the Court of Chancery; that the residue should be there ascertained, and her own rights and those of others declared by that Court. She prayed also, that the residue should be paid over to the accountant-general, on the ground that the pursuers wished the funds to be removed to Scotland, which, it was alleged, would be prejudicial to her and other parties interested.

Two actions in the Court of Session arose out of these circumstances. One was an action of declarator and payment at the instance of the respondents, as the trustees appointed for executing Sir Robert Preston's settlements, against the appellant, in which they concluded, inter alia, to have it "found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that all property and estate whatsoever, or of whatever denomination, which belonged to the said deceased Sir Robert Preston at the time of his death, wherever situated in Scotland, England, or elsewhere; and also all debts and sums of money due or belonging to him at the time of his death, heritable or moveable, real or personal, wherever and in whatever way secured, by heritable bonds or mortgages, or by personal bonds, invested in the public funds or banks, bills, or other documents; as also, all personal estate and effects of whatever nature, quality, or denomination, with the whole writs and title-deeds of the said heritable subjects, and the vouchers and instructions of the said debts, and in particular the whole funds and effects of the said deceased Sir Robert Preston, held by the said Dame Anne Campbell Baird Preston, defender, under the foresaid letters of administration granted and issued in her favour by the foresaid Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, now pertain and belong, and be vested in and transferred to the pursuers, and survivors and survivor of them, as trustees nominated and appointed by our said Lords for executing the settlements of the said deceased Sir Robert Preston, in room and place of the said Sir Coutts Trotter, Edward Marjoribanks, and Sir Edmund Antrobus, but in trust always for the uses, ends, and purposes specified and contained in the foresaid trust-disposition, deed of settlement and will, and that the whole rights, powers, faculties, privileges and immunities, vested in and bestowed by the before-recited trust-disposition, deed of settlement and will, in and upon the persons therein named, are now vested in and bestowed upon the pursuers, as trustees nominated and appointed by our said Lords."

In defence the appellant denied that the respondents stood in all respects in the same situation with the trustees named in the trust, and pleaded—1. That, in so far as relates to the personal estate of Sir Robert Preston situated in England, the present action falls to be dismissed, on the plea of lis alibi pendens, in respect of the dependence of the above-mentioned actions or suits instituted in England: 2. That the defender having obtained letters of administration of the personal funds in England from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury—having found caution in that Court, and being subject to the jurisdiction thereof, cannot, in any question relative to these funds, be made amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session: 3. That the rights and powers conferred on the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, by the not and decreet of the Court of Session, do not extend to the personal funds in England administered to by the defender, and the pursuers are not in titulo to discharge the defender of her actings and intromissions relative to these funds, nor can she be competently called on by this Court to make over the same to the pursuers.

The other action was one of declarator and constitution at the instance of the same pursuers (the respondents), and directed against the appellant. The conclusions of this action were, to have it found and declared, (1.) That the pursuers, as trustees appointed by the Court of Session, have vested in them the whole rights, powers, faculties, privileges, and immunities which were vested in the original trustees named by Sir Robert Preston's trust-deed and settlement: (2.) That the pursuers, as trustees, are entitled to make up fental titles, and be infeft in the whole lands and other heritable estate which belonged to Sir Robert Preston, including the lands in which the defender is infeft as heiress of entail; and further, if necessary, to adjudge the lands in implement of Sir Robert's trust-deed and settlement; and that Dame Anne Hay should be decerned and ordained to make up titles to the lands and estates as heiress of line and conquest, and to grant whatever deeds of conveyance might be necessary for completely vesting the pursuers in the estates, in terms of the trust-disposition and deed of settlement: the primary right being always burdened with the right belonging to the heirs of entail, under the deeds of entail.

To this the defender pleaded—1. That supposing the original trustees had been entitled to bring such an action, it was incompetent at the instance of the present pursuers, in respect that the appointment of them by the Court gave them no right equivalent to a general disposition of the lands, and, as appointees of the Court, they had not the same powers as the original trustees: 2. That supposing the decree of Court good to that extent, it did not clothe them with power to pursue such an action, to the effect of making up titles; and that the proper form to make up titles was to obtain authority by application to the Court. 3. The Chancery proceedings formed a lis alibi pendens: 4. That it was incompetent to have it declared that Lady Hay should enter to all the lands of Sir Robert: 5. That the present action cannot be judged of as a questio voluntatis, but must be determined by the strict legal principles applicable to feudal rights; and as the defender has been duly infeft under the entails, and the fee is full in her person, there remains nothing in hereditate jacente of Sir Robert Preston which can be taken up by his heir-at-law, or carried from that heir by adjudication in implement: 6. That supposing it to be competent to view the present question as a question of intention, the terms of the trust-deed and entails are sufficient to show that it was not the intention of the granter that feudal titles should be completed in the persons of the trustees, and also in the persons of the heirs of entail, but that the titles of the latter should alone form the feudal investiture of the estates.

The Lord Ordinary reported both these actions on cases to the Inner-House, who, in the first action above mentioned, pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Repel the defences, and decern in terms of the libel: Find the defender, Lady Baird Preston, liable to the pursuers in expenses,” &c.

And in the second action above mentioned, they pronounced this judgment:

“Find and declare in terms of the first conclusion of the libel, and decern, and to this extent allow an interim decree to go out: Quoad ultra, supersede consideration of the other conclusions of the libel, as also of the question of expenses.”

The defender appealed these judgments to the House of Lords, and both appeals were advised of the same date.

On the appeal in the first action above mentioned, the Lord Chancellor said—

My Lords, by the interlocutor appealed from in this case, the Court of Session found and declared in terms of the first conclusion of the libel. Some question was made as to what came within the description of the first conclusion of the libel; but it is clear that it embraces so much as prayed that it might be found and declared that all property and estate whatsoever which belonged to Sir Robert Preston in Scotland, England, or elsewhere, all debts, sums of money due and belonging to him at his death, and all personal estate and effects of whatsoever nature, and in particular, the whole funds and effects held by the appellant under the letters of administration, pertain and belong, and are vested in and transferred to the pursuers in trust, for the purposes of Sir Robert Preston's settlements, and that his whole rights, powers, faculties, privileges, and immunities vested by his trust-disposition and settlement upon the trustees therein named, are vested in, and bestowed upon, the pursuers. The appellant is the administratrix of Sir Robert Preston in England, by virtue of letters of administration from the Prerogative Court. The pursuers have been appointed trustees by the Court of Session in the place of certain persons who were named as trustees and executors by Sir Robert Preston, but who declined to act. This appointment took place with the consent of the appellant. The act of appointment is dated 19th May 1835, and is expressed to be by such consent, and it nominates and appoints the pursuers to be trustees for executing the different powers, and carrying into effect the provisions contained in the trust-disposition, deed of settlement, and will of Sir Robert Preston, and that in the room and place of the trustees named by him who had declined to accept, and with all the powers and faculties conferred upon the said original trustees by the said trust-deed. In January 1836, the respondents filed a bill in the Exchequer in England, praying that the whole of the personal estate in the hands of the administratrix might be paid to them, they undertaking to pay the debts; or if the Court should be of opinion that such personal estate ought to be administered in this country, then that such estate might be administered accordingly, and the residue paid to the plaintiffs upon the trusts of the settlement. In February 1836, the appellant, the administratrix, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in England, praying the usual decree for the accounts and administration of the personal estate, and that the residue might be secured for the benefit of the parties interested, and that the respondents, the trustees, might be restrained from proceedings in Scotland to compel the appellant, the administratrix, to pay over the personal estate to them. In March 1836, the respondents, the trustees, abandoned their suit in the Exchequer, and filed a bill in the Court of Chancery for the same purposes. The effect of the interlocutor appealed from is to declare, that all the funds and personal estate in the hands of the appellant or administratrix belong to, and ought to be transferred to the pursuers as trustees,—that is to say, that the personal estate in this country at the time of the death of Sir Robert Preston, and now in the hands of his administratrix, under letters of administration from the Prerogative Court, ought not to be administered in this country, but ought to be paid and transferred to the trustees in Scotland, appointed by the Court of Session, who are not the personal representatives of the deceased. By the law of England, the person to whom administration is granted by the ecclesiastical court, is, by Statute, bound to administer the estate, and to pay the debts of the deceased. The letters of administration under which he acts directs him so to do, and he takes an oath that he will well and truly administer all and every the goods of the deceased, and pay his debts so far as the goods will extend, and exhibit a full and true inventory of the goods, and render a true account of his administration. That such are the duties of an executor or administrator acting under a probate or letters of administration in this country is certain, although the testator or intestate may have been domiciled elsewhere. The domicile regulates the right of succession, but the administration must be in the country in which possession is taken, and held under lawful authority, of the property of the deceased. The interlocutor appealed from assumes that this is not so, and that all the property in the hands of the administratrix, though unadministered, ought to be transferred to the trustees, leaving the creditors of the deceased in this country, if any such there be, and others having claims upon his property, to follow it to Scotland. It is true, that so long as the appellant remains in England, this declaration will be inoperative; but as the interlocutor stands, if she should happen to come within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, she would be liable, upon the footing of such declaration, to transfer the property to the trustees, and by so doing to act in violation of the oath she has taken, and in dereliction of the duties of the office with which she has been invested in this country. It is not possible this could have been intended. The pursuers, as trustees appointed by the Court of Session, assuming that to have been properly done, have no right to administer the estate in England, as against the administratrix appointed for that purpose by the proper ecclesiastical court; and of this the Courts in Scotland are bound to take notice. The confusion seems to have arisen from Sir Robert Preston having appointed the same persons trustees and executors; and if they had proved the will in England, and taken upon themselves the execution of the trusts, the duties of administering the property and of carrying into effect the trusts declared, would have been united in the same persons. It may be assumed for the present purpose, that upon their refusal the Court of Session properly appointed the pursuers, as trustees in their place; but that Court had not any jurisdiction to appoint persons to exercise the duty of recovering or administering the property which happened to be in England. That power, by the law of England, is vested exclusively in the ecclesiastical courts of this country, and can only be exercised by executors or administrators acting under their authority; and in that situation the appellant now is. Sir Robert Preston might, indeed, have appointed whom he pleased to administer his property in England, by naming them as executors, but he had no power to authorise or enable any persons to act in such administration, otherwise than under the authority of the ecclesiastical courts. The pursuers, the trustees, have no such authority, nor has the Court of Session any jurisdiction or power to confer it. The administration of the personal estate in England rests, therefore, and must remain with the appellant. If, after such administration shall have been completed, any surplus should remain, and it shall appear that there are trusts to be performed in Scotland, to which it was devoted by Sir Robert Preston, it will be for the Court of Chancery to consider whether such surplus ought or ought not to be paid to the pursuers for the purpose of being applied in the performance of such trusts; and in considering that question, every attention ought to be paid to the authority under which the pursuers have been appointed trustees, and the consent which led to such appointment. It is premature to decide that point, it being at present unascertained whether there be any surplus of the personal estate, in this country, or what will be the amount of it; and no declaration of right by the Court of Session would be binding upon the Court of Chancery, under whose jurisdiction the property in England is placed by the suits which have been instituted; but although the transfer of the surplus of the property in England, if any, must depend upon the judgment of the Court of Chancery, it may be very competent for the Court of Session, at the proper time, to declare the rights and duties of the trustees appointed under its authority. But, if such trustees have not any right or title to the funds in England, until the administration shall have been completed in England, and the surplus ascertained, it does not appear that any benefit can arise from any declaration of such rights and duties, before it has been ascertained that there will be any surplus to which such rights and duties will attach. This, however, may be left to the discretion of the Court of Session. The interlocutor, proceeding upon the ground that the trustees are entitled to have transferred to them the property in England before the administration has been completed, must, I think, be reversed; but as the pursuers may be entitled to some declaration of right, and to some decree of the Court of Session, so far as the Court of Session has jurisdiction over the property, I think the better and safer course will be, to declare that the property of Sir Robert Preston in England ought to be administered by the appellant, by virtue of the letters of administration granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; and with this declaration, reverse the interlocutor appealed from, and remit it to the Court of Session to consider and adjudicate upon the first conclusion of the libel, either separately or altogether with the other conclusions of the libel, as such Court shall think fit, in conformity with the above declaration.

Interlocutor reversed, and cause remitted to the Court of Session, with a declaration.

On the appeal in the second action above mentioned, the Lord Chancellor said—

My Lords, in this case, the interlocutor appealed from repelled the defences, and decreed in terms of the libel,—the conclusion of which was, that the pursuers might be declared entitled to all the powers given by the trust-deed executed by Sir Robert Preston to the trustees therein named, and as such, to make up titles to the lands in question, and to obtain themselves duly seised therein, so as to carry into effect the trusts of that deed, and if necessary, to adjudge in implement of this trust-deed, and that Dame Anne Preston, otherwise Hay, as heiress of line of Sir Robert Preston, might procure herself to be served and retoured as such heiress of line and of conquest of the said lands; and after completing her titles to the said lands, to dispose and make over the same to the pursuers, as such trustees, without prejudice to any right or interest which might belong to the defenders, after being so vested in the pursuers; and also, that the appellant, as heiress of entail, and Catherine Preston, substituted heiress of entail, might be called as defenders for their interest. The judgment of the Court giving to the pursuers what they so asked, has decided that the pursuers are entitled to the feudal title, or the legal estate in the lands comprised in the testamentary dispositions executed by Sir Robert Preston, and to the assistance of the Court to complete such titles. This the appellant, who completed her title by infirmity under the deeds of entail, disputes, and contends, first, that the title claimed by the pursuers is inconsistent with that given to her, and that hers ought to prevail; and, secondly, that there was no intention expressed by Sir Robert Preston, that the pursuers should have the feudal or legal title in the lands. With respect to the first, it is, I think, sufficiently shown that there is not that inconsistency in the titles claimed by the pursuers, and possessed by the defenders, which can impeach the interlocutor appealed from, if it shall appear that the titles claimed by the pursuers were intended to be given to them by Sir Robert Preston, and are necessary for the due execution of the trusts of his dispositions. The real question therefore is, whether such intention is to be collected from those dispositions, and whether such necessity exists. I think it quite unnecessary to consider one point, which is the subject of much argument in the papers, namely, whether the Court of Session have the power of appointing new trustees in cases in which the trustees named by the authors of the trust-disposition fail, or decline to act; because, in this case, the pursuers were carrying into effect the provisions contained in the trust-disposition and deed of settlement and will of Sir Robert Preston, in room and place of the trustees named by him, who had declined to accept, with all powers and faculties conferred upon the said original trustees, and this with the consent of the appellant. This appointment stands in full force; and whilst it so stands, the title of the pursuers under it cannot be disputed by the appellant. I proceed, therefore, to examine the trust-disposition and will creating the entail, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they contain satisfactory proof of Sir Robert Preston's intentions as to whether the feudal or legal title should, during the continuance of the trust, vest in the trustees or in the appellant, the heiress of entail. The trust-disposition, which is dated 17th October 1832, commences by stating that the author, Sir Robert Preston, had resolved to vest all his estate in trustees, and bound himself and his heirs to make up complete titles to the lands if necessary, and to convey the same in all form to the trustees;

but he declares that the trustees shall hold such lands subject to the entail or entails thereof, the provisions and declarations of which are there specified, and under which the appellant claims,—which deed or deeds of entail were to be taken as part of the deed; and he reserved to himself the power of executing such deed or deeds of entail; and in the event of his failing so to do, he directed his trustees to execute such deed or deeds of entail, so as to settle the lands upon the persons therein mentioned, of which the appellant was the first-named, after failure of issue of the settler, and he appointed his trustees, as soon after his death as might be, to obtain it to be recorded in the Register of Entails, and to make up and complete all necessary feudal titles to the lands included therein, so that the said entails might be rendered effectual in law; but he declared that any entail of the said lands, whether executed by him or his trustees, or titles completed thereto in the persons of any of his heirs, *should not interfere with, or come in competition with the ends and purposes declared in the trust, during the survivorship of his three nieces first called to the succession thereof (of whom the appellant is the first), but that such entails should, during the lives of his said three nieces, and the survivor or survivors of them, continue suspended and in abeyance, so far as regards the rents and produce of his said lands, which were to be received and applied by his trustees in the manner after declared. He then gives to his trustees a power of selling his estates, and after payment of his debts, directs them to invest what shall remain of the produce of such sale, and of his personal estate, in the public funds or real securities. He then, after giving many annuities and legacies, directs his trustees to hold the abbey or estate of Culross, contained in the foresaid entail, as a residence and possession common for his three nieces during their lives, conferring on all of them, jointly, the right to live at, and manage the same, but without prejudice to feudal titles being completed thereto, under the said entails, in the persons of his nieces, or other heirs of entail in succession, as before directed. He then, in the ninth place, directed his trustees to pay and apply the free yearly produce of his property, in equal three parts, to his three nieces, with survivorship, and in order to give effect to that direction, he declared that the entails to be granted by him or his trustees in favour of his said nieces seriatim, should stand suspended during their lives, except that his nieces in succession, should exercise all rights of patronage belonging to his estates, and to enter vassals and feuars, for which purpose it should be competent for his trustees, immediately after his death, to apply for the recording of all deeds of entail executed by him, and to complete, at the expense of the trust-estate, proper feudal titles under the same to the said lands, in the persons of his said three nieces, according to their order of succession; but declaring, that notwithstanding the completion of such feudal titles in the persons of his said nieces, the whole rents and produce, and casualties of superiority, should be receivable by his trustees for the purposes expressed. He then directed his trustees, upon the death of the survivor of his nieces, to lay out the residue of his personalty in the purchase of lands in Scotland, and to execute and grant deeds of entail thereof, according to the declaration before directed, of his estates, and to cause such deeds of entail to be recorded, and to make up and complete feudal titles to the lands therein contained in the person of the heir having right thereto; and on such steps being taken as were necessary to render the said entails valid in law, and the prior purposes of the present trust being duly accomplished, the heir entitled to succeed should be thereupon let into possession, and that the trust should then be considered at an end. He then declared that the receipts and conveyances by his trustees should be available to all purchasing from, or assigning to them, and directed his trustees not to sell a part of his property during the lives of his nieces, but to sell it after their deaths; declaring, that such parts and other lands specified, were intended to be included in the present conveyance to his trustees. By two dispositions or deeds of entail, both dated 3d November 1832, he created entails of the different parts of his estate under which the appellant claims. Those deeds are in the usual form, but both commence by reciting that the same were made for the preservation of the estate in the line of succession thereby pointed out, and agreeably to, and in terms of his trust-disposition and deed of settlement. When the provisions of* this trust-deed are considered, there does not appear to be room for doubting that the author of it intended that his trustees, during the continuance of the trust, should have the complete dominion over the property, and all the estate, power and interest in it which could be necessary to carry his object into effect; which, indeed, if it were necessary, will be found further confirmed by the codicil of 17th April 1833, being after the date of the deeds of entail. That these trusts, and these objects of the testator, could not be carried into effect without the feudal or legal title to the estate, seems to be equally free from doubt; but as the trust-deed did not contain any precept of sasine, or covenant for infeftment in favour of the trustees, it was found necessary for them to complete their feudal title by constitution and adjudication in implement, which was therefore the object of the suit, and is the substance of the interlocutor appealed from. But the appellant contends that she has made up her feudal titles as heiress of entail, and that such title existing is inconsistent with that feudal title to be made up in favour of the trustees. There seems to be a sufficient answer to that proposition in law, but it does not appear to me to be necessary to enter into that point, because the interlocutor deals only with the heiress of line, and not with the appellant as heiress of entail. It only directs the heiress of line to do what the testator, by his trust-deed, undertook she should do; namely, if necessary, to make up and complete titles to the lands, and if necessary, to convey them to the trustees. If, under this trust-deed, the trustees are entitled to have such titles made up, how can the appellant, claiming as a purchaser under the author of this deed, and under an instrument declared to be agreeable to, and in terms of the trust-deed, by having made up her title under the entail which is directed to be suspended during the trust, be permitted to frustrate the intentions of the donor under whom she claims, and defeat the estate which he intended his trustees should hold for the purposes of the trust? For these reasons, I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutor affirmed, with costs.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 83.—THE MARQUESS OF BREADALBANE and JAMES AUCHINLECK CHEYNE and OTHERS, Appellants, v. CHARLES CAMPBELL of Combie, Respondent.

Entail—Fetters—Institute—Irritant Clause—An entail, with prohibitory and resolute clauses directed against the institute nominatim, but with an irritant clause directed against "any of the heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate"—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) not to be so fenced, in the irritant clause, as to strike at a sale of the estate by the institute.—Observed by the Chancellor, That reference cannot be made to other parts of a deed of entail, for the purpose of giving more effect to the irritant clause than is to be derived from the expressions used in that clause itself.

On the 25th of February 1809, David Campbell, Esquire of Combie, executed a procuratory of resignation of the estate of Combie, on the narrative that he was desirous to preserve the estate in the course of succession thereby established; and it directed resignation to be made in favour of himself in liferent, during all the days of his lifetime, and to Charles Campbell, his only lawful son, and the heirs-male to be lawfully procreated of his body;

"whom failing, to the heirs-female to be lawfully procreated of the body of the said Charles Campbell; whom failing, to Susanna Campbell, my only lawful daughter, and the heirs-male to be lawfully procreated of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female to be lawfully procreated of the body of the said

Susanna Campbell; whom failing, to such other person or persons as I shall hereafter name and appoint to succeed to my said lands and estate, by any writing under my hand, and even upon deathbed; and failing of such nomination, or the person or persons therein named, and their heirs to be therein mentioned, then to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, the eldest heir-female, so oft as the succession shall devolve upon females, excluding all other heirs-portioners, and succeeding always without division in all time coming, throughout the whole course of succession, whether of heirs of tailie, or as heirs whatsoever, who may happen to succeed in terms of the destination above specified."

The deed contained prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses. The first condition of the tailie was, "that the said Charles Campbell, and my whole heirs of tailie succeeding to the said lands and estate," should be obliged to use the name and arms of Campbell of Combie. It proceeded:

"And that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said Charles Campbell, or of any of the said heirs of tailie, to alter this present tailie, or the nomination, or other deed to be granted by me, or order of succession prescribed or to be prescribed thereby, or to grant any act or deed which may import or infer any innovation or change thereof, directly or indirectly, in any sort."

The prohibition against sale was thus expressed:

"And with and under this restriction, that it shall not be in the power of the said Charles Campbell, or any of the heirs succeeding in my said lands and estate, to sell, alienate, impignorate, or dispose the same, or any part thereof, either irredeemably, or under reversion, or to burden the same, in whole or in part, with any debts or sums of money, infestments or annualrent, or liferent, or any other burden, encumbrance or servitude whatever."

The irritant and resolute clause was expressed in the following manner:

"And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said Charles Campbell, or any of the heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before resigned, shall contravene the other before-written conditions herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said conditions and provisions, or any of them, or shall act contrary to the said before-written limitations or restrictions, or any of them; then, and in these cases, the person or persons so contravening shall, for him or herself only, ipso facto amit, lose and forfeit all right, title and interest which he or she hath to the lands and estate before resigned; and as such right shall become void and extinct, so the said lands and estate shall devolve, accresce, and belong to the next heir appointed to succeed, although descending of the contravener's own body, if enable to possess and enjoy the said estate, in the same manner as if the contravener were naturally dead, and had died before the contravention; and upon every contravention which may happen, by and through any of the heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate their failing to perform all or each of the conditions and provisions, or acting contrary to all or any of the restrictions and limitations before written, it is expressly provided and declared, not only that the lands and estate before resigned shall not be burdened with, or liable to the debts and deeds, crimes and acts of the heirs contravening, as is already herein provided, but also all debts contracted, deeds granted, or acts done contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me, or to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be of no force, strength or effect, and ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs called to succeed, and who, as well as the said lands and estate, shall be noways burdened therewith, but free therefrom, in the same manner as if such debts or deeds had not been granted or contracted, or such crimes, acts or omissions, had never been done or happened."

It was also provided:

"That it shall be free and lawful to every heir who shall have a title by and through any contravention, or the incapacity of any former heir, and although minor at the time, to sue and obtain declarator of his own right, and of the irritancy of the former heir's right, or to serve heir to the person who died last vested and seised in the lands and estate before resigned, preceding the heir becoming incapable or contravening, and thereby, or by adjudication, or any other formal or legal way or method, to establish in his or her person the right and title of and to the lands and estate, and that without being subjected or liable to the debts or deeds of the person or persons becoming incapable or contravening, excepting provisions to widows and children, as aforesaid, and without regard to their neglects or omissions, or any alterations made or intended, or acts done by them contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me: But all the heirs succeeding upon any incapacity or contravention, and the heirs succeeding to them, shall be subject and liable to the conditions, restrictions and irritancies aforesaid, throughout the whole course of succession, for ever."

The deed contained a reservation of the granter's liferent, and power to nominate other heirs:

"Reserving always to me, the said David Campbell, not only my own liferent of all and sundry the lands and others particularly and generally above resigned, during all the days of my lifetime, but also full power and liberty to me, at any time during my lifetime, to execute a farther nomination of heirs who are to succeed to my said lands and estate after the said Charles Campbell, and the heirs of tailie above mentioned."

The institute, being advised that the debts contracted, or acts of contravention done by him, were not struck at by the irritant clause, sold a part of the estate to the Marquess of Breadalbane for £23,500, and another portion to Mr James Auchinleck Cheyne for £16,500. He also, to try his right, brought an action against the substitute heirs of entail, to have it declared that he was entitled to sell and alienate the estate. To that action the tutor ad litem for the pursuer's children gave in defences denying the libel, and the power of their father to sell. The pleas maintained by them involved the same reasons as those maintained in the suspensions brought by the Marquess of Breadalbane and Mr Cheyne.

The Marquess of Breadalbane and Mr Cheyne refusing to pay till a valid title should be given to them, brought separate suspensions, as of a threatened charge for payment of the price stipulated for the lands sold to them. The grounds of suspension were:

"First, The substitute heirs of entail having been advised that the entail is effectual, and that the sale to the complainer being in contravention of its fetters, is null and void, intend, as the complainer is informed, to lodge defences to the said action of declarator, for the purpose of trying that question;—as the same points are necessarily involved in this suspension, it is a matter of invariable practice to pass the bill, that the merits may be determined on the expedite letters: Second, The entail is valid and effectual in terms of the Act 1685, and in particular, the fetters are effectually directed against alienations or other sales of the lands. The prohibitory and resolute clauses before quoted, include Mr Charles Campbell, the institute, and they are in every respect regular and sufficient, and they give the substitute heirs a sufficient title to challenge, so as effectually to resolve the right of Charles Campbell, the institute, in the event of his contravening the entail. With regard to the irritant clause, it would appear from the summons of declarator before referred to, that it is considered defective as directed solely against the substitute heirs, and not against Mr Campbell, the institute. The complainer does not admit that this is a correct interpretation of the irritant clause. It is expressed somewhat differently from the usual style of such clauses in entails, but still he conceives that it is so expressed as to affect the acts and deeds of the institute, as well as those of the substitute heirs of entail. By referring to the terms of the irritant and resolute clauses before quoted, it will be observed, that they are united, and form one single clause or paragraph, commencing with the words, 'and with and under this irritancy.' The grammatical construction and true meaning of this whole paragraph evidently is, that if Mr Campbell, the institute, or any of the heirs of entail contravene, not only shall they forfeit their right to the estate, which shall not be affected with their acts and deeds, but these acts and deeds shall be null and void. This construction will be rendered apparent by an examination of the paragraph in detail. It commences with the proper resolute clause, whereby it is provided, that in 'case the said Charles Campbell, or any of the heirs-substitute, shall contravene the entail, they shall forfeit their right, and the estate shall pass to the next heir in succession;' then follows a repetition or abridgement of the prohibitions of the entail, declaring, that 'upon every contravention which may happen by and through any of the heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate their failing to perform all or each of the conditions and provisions, or acting contrary to all or any of the restrictions and limitations before written,' not only shall the lands not be burdened with or liable to the debts and deeds, &c. of the heirs contravening, as is already herein provided; that is, in other words, not only shall the particular conditions, provisions, restrictions and limitations of the entail be effectual according to their true meaning and legal construction, for this is undoubtedly the effect of the reference to the foregoing clauses of the deed contained in the words, 'as is already herein provided.' This part of the paragraph, however, is evidently a redundancy—a mere repetition of what was before provided by several separate formal clauses, and cannot be held to supersede the intention of those clauses to which it refers for a more full explanation of its own meaning. What remains of the paragraph may be properly considered as the whole irritant clause of the deed. The words 'but also,' following immediately after the general reference, connect this clause with the other important essential clauses of the entail, whilst the clause itself is expressed in terms so general, and at the same time so specific, as to embrace all acts and deeds, by whomsoever committed or granted, which are contrary to all or any of the conditions or provisions of the entail. Nothing could be more general and comprehensive than the terms of this clause; it declares that 'all debts contracted, deeds granted, or acts done contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me (the entailor), or to the true intent and meaning hereof (of the entail), shall be of no force, strength, or effect,' &c. The test here put of the validity of any act or deed affecting the entailed estate, or any part of it, is, whether it is or is not contrary to the true intent and meaning of the entail; and, tried by this test, it must be admitted that the act of selling part of the entailed lands, and granting to the complainer a disposition of these lands in implement of the minute of sale before set forth, are acts and deeds most distinctly prohibited. The addition which follows this clause, viz., 'and ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs called to succeed,' &c., does not limit the foregoing general declaration, but is merely a repetition of the former provision of the entail, by which it is declared that any party contravening forfeits his own right merely, and does not injure the rights of after heirs of entail. On these grounds it is conceived that the entail in question is so effectually fenced, that Mr Charles Campbell had no power to sell any part of his entailed estate, and that he cannot grant a legal and valid title to the lands sold by him to the complainer."

In the record which was made up in the suspension, Campbell pleaded—(1.) The entail under which the respondent holds the estate sold to the suspender being defective, he is in a condition to give an effectual title to a purchaser; and the reason of suspension founded upon the alleged want of power in the respondent to give such a title, falls to be repelled as groundless. (2.) The irritant clause of the entail being exclusively directed against the acts, deeds, or debts of substitute heirs, cannot be held to render null and void the acts done or deeds executed by the respondent, who is not an heir-substitute, but the institute under the entail, and therefore the deed, in so far as relates to the respondent, is not in conformity to the provisions of the Act 1685. (3.) The entail being otherwise defective, both as regards the imposition of fetters on the respondent, and as relates to the right of substitute heirs to challenge acts done by him, or to complete titles on any contravention being committed, cannot prevent the completion of an onerous transaction of sale, or affect its validity when completed.

In the conjoined processes, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"29th June 1838.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record in the conjoined processes, In respect that the irritant clause in the deed of entail libelled is not directed against the institute, repels the reasons of suspension, and finds the letters and charges orderly proceeded in the processes of suspension, and decerns; and in the action of declarator, finds, declares and decerns, conform to the conclusions of declarator."

Against this judgment the tutor ad litem, on behalf of the children, and the Marquess of Breadalbane and Mr Cheyne, reclaimed; but the Court unanimously adhered.

The Marquess of Breadalbane, Mr Cheyne, and the children of the institute, appealed, pleading—That although the rule of law recognised in several decisions be, that in order to bind the institute, it is essential that the prohibitory, resolute and irritant clauses should be specially directed against him, there is no precise form of expression necessary, in order to make these clauses effectual. It is enough if the matter intended be actually done. Now, the irritant and resolute clause is in this case thrown into one. It is introduced with the words, "under this irritancy." It is then "conditioned and provided," that in case "the said Charles Campbell, or any of the heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before resigned, shall contravene," &c., then the person so contravening shall "forfeit all right," and as "such right shall become void and extinct, so the said lands and estate shall devolve," &c. to the next heir; "and upon every contravention which may happen by and through any of the heirs succeeding to the said lands their failing to perform all or each of the conditions and provisions," &c., it is expressly provided that the lands shall not be liable for their debts and deeds, "but also all debts contracted, deeds granted, or acts done contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me, or to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be of no force, strength, or effect, and ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs called to succeed, and who, as well as the said lands and estate, shall be noways burdened therewith, but free therefrom, in the same manner as if such debts or deeds had not been granted or contracted, or such crimes, acts, or omissions had never been done or happened." Now, this clause is differently constructed and expressed from any that have occurred in former cases of this description. The whole is one continued sentence, and both the declaration that the deed done shall be void, and that the right of the contravener shall be irritated, is contained within one clause, in which Charles Campbell, the institute, is named in the outset as the party against whom, along with the whole heirs of entail, the irritancy is directed. Admitting, then, to the fullest extent, the doctrine that the fetters must be imposed upon the institute, and that he is not to be considered as an heir of entail, and bound by what is directed against heirs of entail only, it is submitted that here, on a proper construction of the instrument, the respondent is bound, and that he is not in a condition to give the purchasers a sufficient title, on the one hand, nor, on the other, entitled to sell the estate to the prejudice of the substitute heirs.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, nothing but the extreme caution which, I think, it is the duty of this House to exercise in coming to any decision, or acting upon a first impression, however strong, would have made me think it necessary to take an opportunity of looking into this deed of entail. I have, however, since the hearing that took place on the day before yesterday, looked into this deed, and I cannot suggest to myself even a doubt as to the propriety of the interlocutors appealed from. Nothing can be more simple, with regard to a Scotch entail, than that the institute is not fettered unless the irritant clauses either name him or describe him. This must be considered as perfectly settled law. Now in those irritant clauses he is not named, nor is he described. The persons whom the irritant clauses describe are "heirs," and therefore, according to the decisions, he is not included within the irritant clauses. But then it is said, that though the word "heirs" only is used, the whole is one sentence, and that, in the commencement of the sentence, there are words which would supply the defect. Even that would be contrary to the rules which have been adopted. You cannot refer to other parts of the deed for the purpose of giving more effect to the irritant clauses than is to be derived from the expressions used in those clauses. But in point of fact, though it may be grammatically one sentence, yet in substance the two parts are totally distinct. The part which proceeds to impose the irritancies is quite distinct from those parts of the deed which contain the prohibitions. But even if that were not so, it is said that that part which is admitted to be prohibitory contains words which would apply to the case of selling. Now, I am very clearly of opinion, that, according to the rule of construction adopted in several other cases, although there may be found in the sentence words which, taken from the rest of the sentence, and used by themselves, might be applied to selling, namely, the words which speak of deeds affecting land, yet that, where they are mixed up in clauses clearly directed to another purpose, you cannot, in the strictness required in deeds of entail, select particular words, and give a sense to them inconsistent with the general sense of the sentence itself. That the sentence is intended to apply to deeds, and not to sales, is quite clear from the general construction of the sentence. But it is not necessary to resort to that part of the argument here. It is sufficient that there are irritant clauses which profess to name the heirs of entail, and do not name or describe the institute. For these reasons your Lordships will probably concur in the opinion, that there is no doubt of the propriety of the interlocutors appealed from.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 84.—MACPHUN v. MARSHALL.

Process.—Suspension and Liberation.—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5.—Held that a note of suspension of a decree in absence, presented under the 5th section of 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 86, and containing a prayer for liberation, is incompetent, in so far as it embraces liberation.

A decree in absence having been obtained against a party in the Court of Session, it was put in execution about ten or eleven months thereafter, and the debtor was incarcerated. He presented a note of suspension under the 5th section of the 1st and 2d Victoria, and prayed also for liberation. The note was strictly formal, and contained no statement of facts on which the application for liberation was founded. The Lord Ordinary, entertaining doubts of the competency of such a form of note, reported it verbally to the Court with a view to being advised as to the disposal of it. The 4th section of the Act relates to the judgment of any Inferior Court pronounced in foro, and provides, that "it shall be competent to suspend the decree, and any diligence or proceeding following thereon, by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a written note of suspension," &c. The 5th section relates to any decree in absence pronounced in the Court of Session, and provides for its suspension "by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a note of suspension, of the form and effect of notes of suspension before allowed to be brought of decrees in foro of Inferior Courts," &c. The 6th section enacts, "that all suspensions not otherwise provided for in this Act, may be brought by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a note in manner aforesaid, and there shall be annexed to such note an articulate statement of the facts on which such suspension is founded." The forms of these notes are not provided for by the Statute, but they are regulated by the Act of Sederunt, 24th December 1838; and a clause of liberation is given for insertion in the form which is applicable to the 6th section.

In support of the note it was pleaded.—That although the suspension of a decree which has been already completed, be incompetent, imprisonment is not implement of the decree, nor satisfaction of the debt. Suspension, therefore, is still competent, and the party is not bound to bring a reduction. The 5th section provides, that a decree in absence, pronounced in the Court of Session, shall be suspended by a note of the form and effect of suspensions before allowed. Now, by the 4th section, the effect of such suspensions is declared to be, "to suspend the decree, and any diligence or proceeding following thereon." The passing of the bill is therefore incompatible with the farther imprisonment of the debtor, for the decree is suspended, and the charge and whole grounds and warrants thereof.

Lord Medwyn.—The 1st and 4th sections of the Act refer to the suspension of the judgment of any Inferior Court pronounced in foro; the note is to be passed de plano, and its effect is to operate as an interim sist of diligence; but here the diligence has been actually carried into effect. The 5th section relates to decrees in absence pronounced in this Court, and the note of suspension is to be of the same form and effect as those before allowed; but I think the word effect there, refers only to a sist of diligence. A note praying for liberation is distinct from a note of suspension only. Formerly, a note of suspension and liberation could be passed only in the Inner-House, and is a well-known form of process. If the Legislature had intended that the debtor should be liberated on the simple passing of the bill of suspension, it is inconceivable that it should not have stated so in the 5th section. The 6th section provides for all suspensions and interdicts, and suspensions not otherwise provided for in this Act. The only other suspension conceivable, is a suspension and liberation, which must have annexed to it a statement of facts, and be intimated to, and answered by, the opposite party. The complainer having allowed the charge to expire, and a delay having taken place of not less than ten or eleven months from the date of the decree, he must now apply for liberation by presenting a note in the ordinary form.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am clearly of the same opinion. At first I was struck with the words—"of the same form and effect," which occur in the 5th section. There is a great distinction between suspension and liberation. Imprisonment is ultimate diligence, and this has always been considered different from decree, or diligence merely in progress. There never was such a thing heard of as liberation on a bill of suspension, without a conclusion for liberation; nor does it always follow, that where there is such a conclusion, liberation follows upon the passing of the bill. The 5th section provides for the suspension of a decree in absence, but it says nothing of suspension and liberation; and were we to give this effect to it, we would not be stopping any thing in cursu, but breaking down a thing already done, and that without knowing any thing of the matter. The 4th section provides for the suspension of a decree in foro, and stops progress, but it does not break down any thing. Still, if the decree in foro were completed, and a note of suspension were presented without a statement of facts and reasons assigned, it would not do. I don't think that the Legislature contemplated liberation without reasons assigned.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—If I could separate the 5th from the 4th section, I would concur. The distinction is deeply rooted in our law between decrees in absence and in foro; so deeply, that suspensions of decrees in absence pronounced by this Court are put in the same situation as decrees in foro in Inferior Courts. The terms of the 4th section are not repeated in the 5th section, but it is only in consequence of the word “effect” referring back to the 4th section, that you suspend a decree in absence at all: “Suspend the decree, and any diligence or proceeding following thereon.” I cannot limit these words. Imprisonment is not so high as a poinding, which is for satisfaction of the decree. Here we have a statutory declaration, and, in my opinion, it is imperative. The presenting of the note suspends the decree in absence, in consequence of the word “effect,” from which the clause derives its virtue and its value. Why has it not the same effect as to diligence—regarding imprisonment in the light of diligence? The 6th section says—other suspensions than those provided for in this Act; but is not this a suspension of a decree in absence, which is expressly provided for. If, under the 6th section, a separate note were to be presented with reasons for liberation, it would involve two processes; and although the Lord Ordinary conjoined the causes, the party might make a different case in answer to the bill, from what he did in his original summons. We are to construe liberally in favour of personal freedom; and the charger has himself to blame for the delay which has taken place. If the 5th section were to be viewed as merely superseding the necessity of a reduction, that would relieve it greatly from difficulty.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court advised the Lord Ordinary to pass the bill to the effect of reponing, and to refuse, quoad ultra, as incompetent, reserving right to the suspender to present a note of suspension and liberation in common form.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 85.—WILLIAM BALLANTYNE, Pursuer, v. MRS ELIZABETH CARTER, Defender.

Caution—Relief—Obligation—Cash-Account—Rei Interventus.—A letter of relief, addressed to a cautioner in a cash-account, enforced for all the sums paid by him under his cautionary obligation,—the letter having been dated the 28th January, and the bond of credit, though signed by him on the same day, not having been signed by the other cautioner till the 5th, nor operated upon till the 6th of February.

Alexander Moffat having obtained a cash-account for £1200 from the Commercial Bank, a bond of credit was granted in the usual form by him, his brother Thomas Moffat, and the pursuer William Ballantyne. The bond was signed by Alexander Moffat and William Ballantyne at Dalkeith, on the 30th of January, and by Thomas Moffat at Edinburgh, on the 5th of February 1838. Of the former date (30th January), the following letter was granted to Ballantyne by Mrs Elizabeth Carter, Alexander Moffat's mother-in-law:

“As you have become co-surety with Mr Thomas Moffat, 24, Middle Market, Edinburgh, for a cash-account with the Commercial Bank of Scotland, in favour of my son-in-law, Alexander Moffat, Dalkeith, I hereby bind myself to relieve you and your co-obligant from your guarantee.”

The account was first operated upon on the 6th of February.

Alexander Moffat became bankrupt, and the sum due by him to the bank, under the bond of credit, was £1251. 14. 9. Thomas Moffat and William Ballantyne having each paid a half, and obtained a discharge and assignation from the bank, William Ballantyne, founding on the letter granted to him by Mrs Elizabeth Carter, on the narrative that he had “declined to be a party to the bond unless he should previously receive such a letter of relief;” and “that the granting of that letter by her was followed by an important rei interventus, inasmuch as it was on the faith of that letter, and the obligation of relief therein contained, the pursuer afterwards signed the bond of credit, and became liable for the sums he has been compelled to pay,” concluded against her for payment of £625. 17. 4½, with interest, and of £100, more or less, as the expenses of process, and “of any diligence to be used on the dependence.”

Mrs Carter, in her defences, stated, that “on the 30th January 1838, she was residing at Dalkeith with her daughter and her son-in-law, Alexander Moffat. On that day her son-in-law told her, in presence of her daughter, that he was getting a new cash-account, and that the pursuer and Thomas Moffat were his cautioners, and requested her to become bound for the relief of the pursuer, by which she could not at the worst be subjected in payment of more than £400. With considerable reluctance she consented, and subscribed a document written by her son-in-law, but without examining it. The letter of relief now produced by the pursuer is quite at variance with the understanding of the defender, and proposed arrangement. The defender, therefore, now denies that she came under any such obligation as that expressed in the letter produced, and now libelled.” She therefore pleaded—1. The letter or writing founded on not being stamped, is null. 2. The writing libelled being neither probative nor holograph of the defender, and no rei interventus having taken place, action upon it cannot be maintained. 3. The conclusion in the summons for the expense of diligence is incompetent: Taylor v. Taylor, 25th January 1820, F. C.

The letter founded on having been stamped, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“16th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and considered the process, repels the three first defences, and decerns in terms of the libel, with the exception of that part of the last conclusion which relates to the expense of diligence, which is reserved hoc statu: Finds the defender liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

“Note.—The averment that the pursuer's bond to the bank was signed after obtaining the defender's letter of relief is not proved, and must therefore be disregarded. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, proceeds entirely on the rei interventus.

"He cannot go along with the reasoning by which the defender tries to maintain that there can be no rei interventus unless something be positively done, and that the pursuer did nothing. There are some loose expressions thrown out in the pleadings in the case of the Dunmore Coal Company (1st February 1811,) about the insufficiency of 'the assertion of a negative' to constitute real intervention. But what, in common sense, can amount more to acting on the faith of a letter of relief, than letting another continue to run the holder of the letter into debt? The pursuer could have stopped his guarantee at the bank whenever he chose; but relying on this letter from the defender, he allowed her son to go on drawing; and it is gravely said, that because permission is merely passive, it cannot imply positive rei interventus. The Lord Ordinary has no doubt that a mere abstinence from diligence, if it could be proved, would exclude the plea of locus penitentiae as effectually as the actual liberation of a debtor. A person is asked to become a cautioner that a gunpowder work will not injure a house. He agrees on getting a letter of relief. Trusting to this letter, he lets his caution be acted upon till the house is blown up. He is then told that the letter is informal, and that mere inactive acquiescence in the continuance of the danger and of the caution cannot form a rei interventus. Is there any practical sense in this?

"But, moreover, was not the letter in question granted in re mercatoria?"

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Mackenzie.—I am not prepared to say that the interlocutor should be altered. The Lord Ordinary, in his note, puts the question, whether the letter in question was not granted in re mercatoria? but his Lordship has not decided the point; and I would rather not decide it, as it is unnecessary. If the letter was not granted after the signing the bond, it was granted unico contextu. It is plain that the two formed one transaction. If the defender concurs in this joint transaction, and the parties proceed to act upon it, is it possible to say there is no rei interventus? Suppose Mrs Carter, after granting this letter, had gone to the bank, and, standing by, had seen money got upon the bond,—or suppose that all the parties had gone together,—would it have been possible to say that she was not answerable on the ground of there being no interventus? What more perfect interventus could there possibly be than actual advances after the letter of relief was granted? This supposition does not differ much from the actual case. This bond was granted in favour of the defender's son-in-law. She could not forget that it had been granted, or that he would proceed to operate upon it. She knew this as well as if she had seen him go, or gone with him to the bank; and she also knew just as well that the cautioners, in allowing their obligation to continue, were relying on her letter of relief. She must have known all these things, and therefore the case is almost the same as that which I have supposed. The continuance of the cautionary obligation, in reliance on the relief, is a complete interventus. It is true the letter was granted at the beginning of the transaction; but it appears to me to be just the same as if it had been renewed on every separate occasion when a sum was drawn from the account. In these circumstances, it is impossible for the defender to draw back and escape from her obligation of relief.

Lord Gillies.—The case is not free from difficulty, but I concur. There is something very metaphysical in the idea of a negative interventus of which the Lord Ordinary speaks; but I think there was something here very like a positive interventus. The pursuer says he would not have signed if he had not previously received the letter of relief. This statement, however, does not appear to be correct, for he did sign before receiving it; and I cannot, therefore, admit that this plea is available. But then he says, that though he signed, there was nothing drawn from the account before he received the letter, and that if he had not received it, he would have withdrawn his name from the bond. This is a better plea. The case, however, is not similar to the case of diligence supposed by the Lord Ordinary; and I would not readily subscribe to the opinion of his Lordship on that case. In the present circumstances, I think there is a positive interventus. I do not think, however, it can be held that this letter was granted in re mercatoria. It is true that bonds are often granted by mercantile men for mercantile purposes, but they are also granted by men who are not merchants. The present letter I consider to be of the latter description.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. The case is complicated a little by the specific terms in which the action is laid, making it desirable to show that the granting of the letter corresponds with the execution of the bond. I do not think the case turns much on that, for it is admitted that the account was not operated upon till the 6th of February. It is said there is here a kind of negative interventus; but that is owing merely to the form of stating it, for it equally admits of being stated positively. The pursuer might have withdrawn his cautionary obligation at any time; and the true interpretation of the letter of guarantee was simply this,—“As you are bound, and are to continue bound for the cash-credit, I engage to indemnify you for all the claims that may come against you on that account.” In this way the pursuer does not withdraw his obligation, but continues bound, and, in consequence, large sums are drawn. This continuance is, in its nature, affirmative, and just amounts to a positive interventus. I do not enter into the question, whether this letter is to be considered as granted in re mercatoria. I think there would be great difficulty in holding that it is.

Lord President.—I agree. Were we to go upon the ground of its being an obligation in re mercatoria, I would have great doubt; but, on the other ground, I have no difficulty whatever. It is impossible to look at the terms of the letter without understanding its true nature. It is a great misfortune for the lady, but her son-in-law requires a cash-account, and applies to the pursuer to be one of his sureties. He scruples, and then she grants the letter in question. The obligation constituted by that letter obviously looks forward to the future. It was not a guarantee for a day, but for all the days during which the pursuer, trusting to his relief, continued bound for the cash-account. This is the only fair inference which can be drawn from the letter. But then it is said that the letter was granted on the 28th of January, and that the bond of credit was not executed till the 5th of February. In one sense this is true, as the other cautioner did not sign till the latter date; but in another sense it is not; for it is to be observed, that both the letter of guarantee and the pursuer's signature were obtained on the 28th of January. It is also a material fact, that the account was not operated upon till the 6th of February. The guarantee thus contemplating future transactions, I am clear that there was a positive interventus. As to a negative interventus, I agree with Lord Gillies, that the idea is too metaphysical. However, we are not bound by the observations in the Lord Ordinary's note, though we concur in adhering to his Lordship's interlocutor.

The Court adhered, with additional expenses.

No. 86.—JAMES BEAUMONT NEILSON and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. HOUSEHILL COAL and IRON COMPANY, Defenders.

Exclusive Privilege—Patent—Process—Jury Trial—Issues—Reparation.—In an action of damages for the violation of a patent granted for “an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required”—Found that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, whether the invention described in the letters-patent and specification is not his original invention?—and that he was not bound to limit his issue to the question, whether he is the true and first inventor of the machinery and apparatus, for which the letters-patent were granted?

This was an action of damages for the contravention of a patent for "an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required." The warrant for the letters-patent, gives and grants to the pursuer, James Beaumont Neilson, "leave, license, and full power, sole privilege and authority," to "make, use, exercise, and vend the said invention within that part of his Majesty's united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Scotland," to the full end and term of fourteen years from the date of these presents: "Provided always, that if at any time during the said term hereby granted, it shall be made appear to his Majesty, his heirs or successors, or to any six or more of his or their Privy Council, that his grant is contrary to law, or prejudicial or inconvenient to his Majesty's subjects in general; or that the said invention is not a new invention, as to the public use and exercise thereof, in that part of his Majesty's said united kingdom called Scotland, or not invented by the said James Beaumont Neilson as aforesaid; then, upon signification thereof to be made by his Majesty, his heirs or successors, under his or their Signet or Privy Seal, or by the Lords and others of his or their Privy Council, or any six or more of them, under their hands and seals, these letters-patent shall forthwith cease, determine, and be utterly void, to all intents and purposes." Provided also, that "the said James Beaumont Neilson, within the space of four calendar months, to be computed from the date of the said intended letters-patent, do cause a particular description of the nature of his said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, by writing under his hand and seal, to be enrolled in his Majesty's Court of Chancery in that part of his Majesty's said united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Scotland, otherwise the said letters-patent to be void."

In compliance with this proviso, the specification proceeds in these terms: "I, the said James Beaumont Neilson, do hereby declare, that my invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, consists in introducing into, and applying to the fires, forges, and furnaces, atmospheric air, in the following manner:" Here follows a specific description of the manner.

The following draft issues were framed by the issue clerks:

"It being admitted, that on the 1st day of October 1828, the pursuer, James Beaumont Neilson, obtained letters-patent under the Great Seal used in Scotland, in place of the Great Seal thereof, whereby there was granted to him the exclusive privilege during the period of fourteen years from the said 1st day of October 1828, of using, as his original invention, certain machinery or apparatus for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, as described in the said letters-patent, and in the specification, which, it is admitted, was duly enrolled in terms of the proviso contained in the said letters-patent:

"It being also admitted that the pursuers, other than the said James Beaumont Neilson, have acquired by assignment from him, a joint interest with him in the said patent:

"Whether the said James Beaumont Neilson is the true and first inventor of the said machinery or apparatus for which the said letters-patent were granted? and Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders, in or at their iron-works at Househill, did by themselves or others, without the license, consent, or permission of the said James Beaumont Neilson, or the other pursuers, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use in or at their said works, machinery or apparatus in imitation of, and substantially the same with the machinery or apparatus described in said specification, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Or,

"Whether the description of the machinery or apparatus contained in the said specification, is not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make machinery or apparatus capable of producing the effects set forth in the said letters-patent?

"Whether machinery or apparatus, constructed according to the description in the said letters-patent and specification, is not practically useful for the purpose therein set forth?

"Whether machinery or apparatus, substantially the same with that described in the said letters-patent and specification, was used within Great Britain for the purpose aforesaid, before the said patent was obtained?"

The draft issues proposed by the pursuers were in these terms:

"It being admitted, that on the 1st day of October 1828, the pursuer, James Beaumont Neilson, obtained letters-patent under the Great Seal used in Scotland, in place of the Great Seal thereof, whereby there was granted to him the exclusive privilege, during the period of fourteen years from the said 1st day of October 1828, of using, exercising, and vending an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, as described in the said letters-patent, and in the specification, which it is admitted was duly enrolled in terms of the proviso contained in the said letters-patent:

"It being also admitted that the pursuers, other than the said James Beaumont Neilson, have acquired by assignment from him a joint interest with him in the said patent:

"Whether the said James Beaumont Neilson is the true and first inventor of the invention for which the said letters-patent were granted? and Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders, in or at their iron-works at Househill, did by themselves or others, without the license, consent, or permission of the said James Beaumont Neilson, or the other pursuers, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use, and put in practice the said invention in the smelting of iron, or otherwise, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Or,

"1. Whether the specification engrossed in the schedule hereunto annexed, does not sufficiently describe the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed?

"2. Whether the invention, as described in the said specification, is not practically useful for the purposes set forth in the letters-patent?

"3. Whether the said invention was not, at the time of granting the said letters-patent, a new invention, as to the public use and exercise thereof, in that part of the united kingdom called Scotland?"

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum with both drafts, accompanying his interlocutor with the following note:

"This is an action at the instance of a patentee and his partners, for the alleged infringement by the defenders of a patent granted to the pursuer, Mr Neilson, 'for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required.'

"Upon the record, as prepared and ready to be closed by the parties, the clerks have given out issues, in which the leading question put to the jury is expressed in the following terms,— 'Whether the said James Beaumont Neilson is the true and first inventor of the said machinery and apparatus for which the said letters-patent were granted,' &c. To which the pursuers object, and contend that they are entitled to have the question sent to the jury in more general and comprehensive terms, so as simply to require the jury to say, 'whether he is the true and first inventor of the invention for which the said letters-patent were granted,' &c., and corresponding corrections to the same effect are proposed in the alternative issues.

"The pursuers, in support of their draft, contend that the terms in which they have framed the issues present the correct questions which the Court and jury have to try in every case of patent;—that these should be framed with a due regard to the Statutes by which patents are regulated, and with specific reference to the conditions inserted in the patent itself; and that, accordingly, the words used in their draft are those in which the pleas of parties urging similar objections to patents in England, as those now maintained by the defenders, are technically expressed. The pursuers further allege, that the issues as framed by the clerks, might expose them to great hazard, even if they proved their invention to be new, as the question is limited to machinery and apparatus, and not to the principle or substance of the invention itself, for which the patent was granted.

"The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that the issues, as framed by the clerks, are those which have been sanctioned by this Court for a course of years in all analogous cases, and that there is no good reason for changing them, even though the pleas in English practice may be framed in the terms mentioned by the pursuers. They aver, that the question put by the clerks is best adapted to try the case, just because it is more specific and precise than that submitted by the defenders, and the terms of the presiding Judge's charge to the jury, in a case tried in England upon this very patent, were quoted, to show that truly the validity of the patent depended on the novelty of the machinery and apparatus described in the specification.

"It is fit that such a question should be decided by the Court before the ulterior proceedings must be conducted after the issues are adjusted.

"Had the Lord Ordinary given any decision on the point himself, he should have thought that there was great weight in the objection of the pursuers, at least as to the first issue. In Scotland, it is well known that prior to the Union, we had no special Statute legalizing patents; and none of our institutional writers before Professor Bell, allude to the subject, except Bankton, in whose work (published in 1751) some doubt is thrown out (Vol. I. p. 411,) as to the validity of exclusive privileges granted by the Sovereign in Scotland to private individuals or companies in matters of trade or manufacture. But it was soon found that the validity of these rights was incontestable, not only under the King's prerogative, which was probably never more limited in Scotland than in England, but under the Articles of Union, which provided (Art. 6,) 'that all parts of the united kingdom, for ever after the Union, shall have the same allowances, encouragements and drawbacks, and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade.'

"In virtue of that compact, the English Act of James I. cap. 23, legalizing patents for limited terms, has become law in Scotland,—and the late Statute passed in 1835, (5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 83, commonly called Lord Brougham's Act,) contains specific regulations for the protection and trial both of English and Scotch patents. The latter Statute, in particular, contains the following provision, which is much relied on by the pursuers. It is enacted, § 2, that where, 'by verdict of a jury, it shall be proved or specially found, that any person who shall have obtained letters-patent for any invention, or supposed invention, was not the first inventor thereof, or of some part thereof, by reason of some other person having invented or used the same, or some part thereof, before the date of such letters-patent; or if such patentee shall discover that some other person had, unknown to him, invented or used the same, or some part thereof, before the date of such letters-patent, it shall be lawful for such patentee, or his assignees, to petition his Majesty in Council to confirm the said letters-patent, or to grant new letters-patent.'

"Now the first issue, as drawn by the pursuers, is framed in literal accordance with this provision of the Statute.

"It is also said, that the form of issue proposed by them is agreeable to the condition of the patent, which (in the language of the warrant) contains this limitation and provision:—'Provided always, likeas it is expressly provided and declared, that if, at any time during the said term hereby granted, it shall be made appear to his Majesty, his heirs or successors, or to any six or more of his or their Privy Council, that his grant is contrary to law, or prejudicial or inconvenient to his Majesty's subjects in general; or that the said invention is not a new invention, as to the public use and exercise thereof in that part of his Majesty's said united kingdom called Scotland, or not invented by the said James Beaumont Neilson as aforesaid, then, upon signification thereof, to be made by his Majesty, his heirs or successors, under his or their Signet or Privy Seal, or by the Lords and others of his or their Privy Council, or any six or more of them under their hands and seals, these letters-patent shall forthwith cease, determine, and be utterly void to all intents and purposes.'

"Although the Statute and the patent are framed in the terms before quoted, it is probable that either form of the issue, now under consideration, would, under a proper direction from the Judge, be sufficient to try the case. At the same time, the issue suggested by the words of the Statute seems preferable: as it is the more general, and comprehends the chief question to be solved by the jury, almost under any conceivable form of patent which can be granted by the Crown. It is notorious that some patents are granted for new or improved machinery,—some for the discovery of a new principle in arts and manufactures,—and many for new chemical combinations, and generally for inventions in every art that human ingenuity can devise. But whatever may be the nature or object of the patent, the primary condition on which the validity of all patents depends, seems to be sufficiently brought to issue by the question put in the words of the Statute.—Whether or not the patentee was 'the first inventor of the invention for which the letters-patent were granted.'

"If there were any usage or fixed style of issues relative to patents already adopted in our practice, it might be inconvenient to depart from them; but the Lord Ordinary doubts the supposed universality of the practice, and there certainly has been none since the Statute of 1835, sufficient to preclude the Court from reconsidering the proper style of issues applicable to questions of this sort. Prior thereto, the issues sustained by the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) in the case of Astley and Taylor (1 Shaw's App. Cases, p. 54), were perhaps the most authoritative that could be referred to in our practice. These were not precisely in the words of either of the drafts now proposed, though they were more nearly parallel with that of the pursuers than with the issues of the clerks; but it is rather thought that the later Statute supersedes former practice, and indicates the primary issue best adapted for the trial of the validity of patents in future cases.

"It is very material also to observe, that the issues suggested by the Statute are precisely those raised by the technical pleas, which seem to be now adopted in English practice, as the proper and relevant objections to the validity of patents. This is satisfactorily proved by the record of a question recently tried in the Court of Exchequer in England upon the very patent now libelled on. In the case referred to (Neilson v. Harford), the first plea put on record for the defendant was, 'that the said J. B. Neilson was not, at the time of the making of the said letters-patent, the true and first inventor of any invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces,' &c.

"Under a plea to that effect, it seems plain from the proceedings on the trial now referred to, that it will be open to the defenders to enter into the most extensive inquiry as to the nature and merits of the machinery or apparatus invented by the pursuer for supplying heated air to furnaces. For in the final opinion which the learned Judge (Mr Baron Parke) delivered as the judgment of the Court, he stated, that 'taking the construction of this specification on ourselves, as we are bound to do, it becomes necessary to examine what the nature of the invention is which the plaintiff has disclosed by this instrument. It is very difficult to distinguish it from the specification of a patent for a principle, and this at first created in the minds of some of the Court much difficulty; but after full consideration, we think that the plaintiff does not merely claim a principle, but a machine embodying a principle, and a very valuable one. We think the case must be considered as if, the principle being well known, the plaintiff had first invented a mode of applying it by mechanical apparatus to furnaces, and his invention then consists in this,—by interposing a receptacle for heating air between the blowing apparatus and the furnace. In this receptacle he directs the air to be heated by the application of heat externally to the receptacle, and thus he accomplishes the object of applying the blast, which before was of cold air, in a heated state, to the furnace.—See octavo edition of the trial, p. 374.

“While these are the views of the Lord Ordinary on the first and leading issue proposed in the present case, he is inclined to think that the questions stated in the alternative issues of the clerks are not liable to the same objections as have been urged against the first issue. The Statute does not contain any specific reference to these points, and the pursuers’ argument, in support of their own style, is founded chiefly on the conditions of the letters-patent, which are expressed in terms similar to those used in the pursuers’ issues. But it is rather thought that the issues framed by the clerks bring out more precisely the points to which the inquiry of the jury must be directed under these heads, although it is probable that either form of issue would be sufficient to try the case.”

The following were the issues as adjusted by the Court :

“It being admitted, that on the 1st day of October 1828, the pursuer, James Beaumont Neilson, obtained letters-patent under the Great Seal used in Scotland, in place of the Great Seal thereof, and duly enrolled a specification in terms of the proviso contained in said letters-patent, being Nos. 21 and 22 of process :

“It being also admitted that the pursuers, other than the said James Beaumont Neilson, have acquired, by assignment from him, a joint interest with him in the said patent :

“Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, in or at their iron-works at Househill, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use machinery or apparatus substantially the same with the machinery or apparatus described in said specification, and to the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Or,

“1. Whether the invention, as described in the said letters-patent and specification, is not the original invention of the pursuer, the said James Beaumont Neilson?

“2. Whether the description contained in the said specification, is not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make machinery or apparatus capable of producing the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification?

3. Whether machinery or apparatus constructed according to the description in the said letters-patent and specification, is not practically useful for the purposes set forth in the said letters-patent?

“The damages are laid as under,— “Profits claimed, as at the date of the action, £10,000

 “Other damages, as at the same date, - 2,000

Process.—Summons, Amendment of.—It being set forth in a summons that the pursuer had granted an acceptance, for which he was to receive value in hides and skins; that by a letter of guarantee, a cautioner had become bound to see him so paid; and that the principal had failed to complete his agreement—Held, in an action for the balance, that the libel assumed payment of the bill by the acceptor when due, and that an averment of it on the record was sufficient.

The pursuer set forth in his summons, that he had granted a promissory-note to the defender, George Tait, for which he was to give value in hides and skins, and that Ann Tait, whom the other defenders represented, became bound, by a letter of guarantee, to see the pursuer paid in hides and skins to the value of his acceptance. The defender failed to complete his agreement, and action was brought against him and the representatives of the cautioner for the balance. It was averred on the record that the pursuer had retired the bill when it fell due, but it not having been so libelled, he tendered an amended summons containing that addition. The Lord Ordinary simply refused to admit the proposed amendment; and a reclaiming petition having been presented, was refused on the ground that the amendment was unnecessary.

Burgh—Disfranchisement—Managers, Appointment of.

A royal burgh, not comprehended under the Reform Act, having become disfranchised by the wilful absence of a majority of the councillors from the meeting called for the election of the new councillors, and in consequence of which no election took place,—on the application of the minority, the Court remitted to the Sheriff to report the names of persons qualified to act as managers of the burgh, from whom they selected three—two who were not of the number of absentees, and one who was, but to whom the objection was waived. These they appointed to the office of managers of the affairs of the burgh, any two of whom to be a quorum.

No. 89.—THE EARL OF EGLINTON, Pursuer and Charger, v. LORD MONTGOMERIE and OTHERS, Defenders, and JAMES DUNLOP and OTHERS (Paterson’s Trustees), Suspenders.

Entail, Unrecorded, Powers of Heir possessing under.—A party possessing under an entail of lands situated in two different counties, obtained an Act of Parliament authorising a sale of those in the one county for the purchase of lands in the other, to be settled on the heirs of entail “in the same order and course of succession," and subject to the same "restrictions and limitations, clauses irritant and resolute." Under the authority of this Act the lands were sold, and others purchased and entailed, and the entail recorded. Thereafter, the party who had obtained the Act, on the marriage of her son executed a deed, in which, reserving her own liferent, she disposed to him, her "heir of tailzie," and the other substitutes, as before, the whole of the lands of the original entail not sold, and those purchased under the Act, under the same fetters, but providing that he, his heirs and successors, should be bound to possess "by virtue of these presents." On this deed infestment was taken, and possession followed for more than forty years—Held, 1. That this deed must be considered as an original substantive entail, and not having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, was ineffectual against creditors or purchasers; and 2. That the heir in possession had full power to sell and use the price at pleasure, free from all claims whatever at the instance of the substitute heirs of entail.

In 1728, Hugh Montgomerie of Hartfield executed an entail of certain lands in the counties of Renfrew and Ayr—those in Renfrew being described as "the eight-pound land of old extent of Lochliboside and Hartfield," and those in Ayr as "the ten-pound land of old extent of Skelmorlie" and others. The destination, failing issue of the entailer's own body, was, to and in favour of

"Sir Robert Montgomerie of Skelmurely, Baronet, my nephew, in liferent, for his liferent use alienably, and to the heirs-male of his body; whilk failzieing, to the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the body of the said eldest heir-female; whilk failzieing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the body of the said next heir-female successive; whilk failzieing, to Alexander Clark, son to the deceased Mr James Clark, minister of the gospel at Glasgow, procreant betwixt him and Christine Montgomerie, his spouse and my sister, and the heirs-male of his body; whilk failzieing, to the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Alexander Clark, and the heirs-male of the body of the said eldest heir-female; whilk failzieing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said Alexander Clark, and the heirs-male of the body of the said next heir-female successive; whilk failzieing, to any other heirs of tailzie to be nominat and appointed by me by wryte under my hand at any time in my life in my liege pousie; whilk also failzieing, to my own nearest lawful heirs and assignees whatsoever, the eldest heir-female always excluding all other heirs-portioners, and succeeding without division in fee heritably."

Sir Robert Montgomerie predeceased the entailer without issue-male, but leaving three daughters, Lillias, Isabella and Agnes. On the death of the entailer, become Sir Hugh by his nephew's death, Lillias Montgomerie completed her title under the entail. She was afterwards married to Alexander Montgomerie of Coilsfield, and in 1757 an Act of Parliament was obtained, entitled "An Act to enable Lillias Montgomerie of Skelmorlie to sell lands in the county of Renfrew, and to lay out the monies arising thereby in the purchase of lands contiguous to other lands of the said Lillias Montgomerie in the county of Ayr, and for other purposes therein mentioned." This Act, after narrating the entail of 1728, the succession of Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, and the prohibition against selling, proceeds as follows:

"And whereas the lands of Skelmorlie was the ancient inheritance of the family, where they had and still have their seat, and from whence they drew their designation; and these lands make part of the entailed estate, and are situated within the sheriffdom of Air: And whereas the lands of Ormesheugh, another part of the said entailed estate, lie also within the sheriffdom of Air: And whereas the lands of Lochliboside and Hartfield, which are also part of the entailed estate, lie within the sheriffdom of Renfrew, remote from the other parts of the estate, in a barren and hilly country, little capable of improvement: And whereas it would be highly beneficial to the said Lillias Montgomerie, and the other heirs of entail, and to the entailed estate, if the lands of Lochliboside and Hartfield could be sold, and the price thereof applied to the purchase of other lands more improveable, and lying in the shire of Air, where the lands of Skelmorlie, the ancient seat of the family, is situated: But these advantages cannot be obtained without the authority of Parliament:"

Be it therefore enacted,

"That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Lillias Montgomerie, at any time during her life, and to and for the respective tenants in tail for the time being, who shall be in possession of the premises by virtue of the said deed of entail, and of the age of twenty-one years, by and with the approbation and consent of Robert Dundas of Arniston, Esq., his Majesty's Advocate for Scotland" (and others), "to sell the foresaid eight-pound land of Lochliboside and Hartfield, with the teinds," &c., "and that without importing a contravention of the entail."

It is further enacted, that the price arising from the sales shall be vested in the said Robert Dundas (and others),

"in trust, and to the end that the said trustees, or any three of them, shall, with the privity, consent, and approbation of the said Lillias Montgomerie, or of such respective tenant in tail, in possession, and of the age aforesaid, immediately after such sale or sales shall be made, or as soon after as conveniently may be, apply and dispose of the moneys arising by such sale or sales in the purchase of other lands, lying in the shire of Air, more commodious and contiguous to the said lands of Skelmorlie and Ormesheugh; which said lands so to be purchased shall, immediately after the purchase thereof, be settled, disposed, and provided to and for the use, benefit, and behoof of the said Lillias Montgomerie, and the said other heirs of entail, according to the different rights and interests, and in the same order and course of succession as the same premises are secured to and for them and their benefit respectively, in and by the said deed of entail, and subject to the restrictions and limitations, clauses irritant and resolute therein contained, and shall immediately after record the said settlements and dispositions so to be made, in the Register of Tailzies, pursuant to an Act passed in the Parliament of Scotland in the year 1685, intituled Act concerning Tailzies; and in the meantime, till such purchases can be made, to place out such moneys arising by the said sale or sales, with such consent and approbation as aforesaid, upon real security, at interest, for the uses aforesaid, and upliftable only with the like consent and approbation."

Under the authority of this Act the lands of Lochliboside and Hartfield were sold, and the price applied in the purchase of certain parts of the estate of Coilsfield belonging in fee-simple to Alexander Montgomerie, Mrs Lillias Montgomerie's husband. Accordingly, Mr Alexander Montgomerie, with the consent of Mrs Lillias Montgomerie and a quorum of the parliamentary trustees, executed a disposition and deed of tailzie of those parts of Coilsfield which had been purchased. The deed proceeds upon a recital of the Act of Parliament; and the destination is,

"to and in favours of the said Lillias Montgomerie, my wife, who is the eldest heir-female of the body of the said deceased Sir Robert Montgomerie of Skelmorlie, Baronet, and grand-niece of the said deceased Sir Hugh Montgomerie of Skelmorlie, Baronet, and to the heirs-male procreant or to be procreant of her marriage with me, the said Alexander Montgomerie; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the said Lillias Montgomerie's body in any subsequent marriage; whom failing, to the next heir-female successively of the body of the said deceased Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the body of the next heir-female successively; whom failing, to any other heirs of tailzie (if any be,) nominated and appointed by the said deceased Sir Hugh Montgomerie by a writing under his hand at any time of his life in liege poustie; whom also failing, to the said deceased Sir Hugh Montgomerie, his own nearest lawful heirs and assignees whatsoever, the eldest heir-female always excluding all other heirs-portioners, and succeeding without division."

At the date of the deed, the descendants of Christian Montgomerie and Alexander Clark, included in the original entail, had failed.

The estates of Skelmorlie and Coilsfield, though in the same county, are at some distance from each other, and were possessed under separate titles till 1774, when Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, on the occasion of the marriage of her eldest son, Captain Hugh Montgomerie, afterwards Earl of Eglinton, and with the consent of her husband,

"for certain good and weighty causes and considerations," "with and under the reservations after written, conceived in favours of me the said Lillias Montgomerie and my said husband; and also with and under the express reservations, provisions, conditions, declarations, restrictions, limitations, and clauses irritant and resolute after specified, allenarly, and no otherwise, which are hereby appointed to be inserted and contained in the instruments of resignation, retours, charters, infeftments, precepts, and sasines, and others to follow hereupon, give, grant, annulzie and dispoine, to and in favours of Hugh Montgomerie, Esquire, my eldest son and heir of tailzie, captain in the 1st regiment of foot, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the other heirs-male of my body; whom failing, to the next heir-female successive of the body of the said deceased Sir Robert Montgomerie, my father, and the heirs-male of the body of the said next heir-female successive; whom failing, to any other heirs of tailzie (if any be,) nominated and appointed by the deceased Sir Hugh Montgomerie of Skelmurelie, Baronet, by a write under his hand at any time in his life, in liege poustie; whom also failing, to the said Sir Hugh Montgomerie's own nearest lawful heirs and assignees whomsoever, the eldest heir-female always excluding all other heirs-portioners, and succeeding without division, in fee heritably.—All and sundry, the lands and others under written; viz., all and whole" the lands of Skelmorlie and others, "as also all and whole these parts and portions after mentioned of the lands and estate of Coilsfield, which were sold and disposed by the said Alexander Montgomerie, my husband, to me and my heirs of tailzie before mentioned, conform to disposition by him, with consent therein mentioned, dated the 1st, 2d, and 4th days of November 1757, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies the 4th day of January 1758, and that in lieu and place of the lands of Lochliboside and Hartfield, part of the said entailed estate of Skelmurelie, which were sold and disposed by me, with consent of my said husband, in virtue of an Act of Parliament obtained by me for that purpose in the 30th year of his late Majesty's reign; viz. the forty-shilling land of old extent of Coilsfield," &c.

The conditions of the entail of 1728 are as follows:

"Declaring, likewise it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, my nephew, and his heirs and successors, shall be obliged to brook and possess the lands and others before mentioned, and establish the rights thereof in their persons, by virtue of these presents, and to take the rights, securities, and infeftments of the same, with the burden of the reservations and irritancies and provisions herein contained, to and in favours of such heirs of tailzie as I have hereby nominated, or as I shall hereafter nominate and appoint in manner foresaid; as also providing, likewise it is hereby expressly provided and declared, and appointed to be inserted in and provided and declared by the instruments of resignation, charters, infeftments, sasines, services, retours, precepts, and others to follow hereupon, that the hail heirs of tailzie before mentioned, als well male as female, and the descendants of their bodies who shall succeed according to the foresaid destination, shall be obliged to assume, use, and bear the surname, arms, and designation of Montgomerie of Skelmurelie as their proper arms, surname, and designation in all time thereafter; and if any of the saids heirs of tailzie before mentioned, or the descendants of their bodies who shall happen at any time hereafter to succeed to the saids lands and others foresaid, shall do in the contrary hereof, then and in that case the heirs of tailzie before mentioned, male or female, and the descendants of his or her body so contravening, shall ipso facto amit, lose, and tyne their right, title, and succession above specified to the saids lands and others before mentioned, and the same shall in the case foresaid ipso facto fall, accresce, and pertain to the next heir of tailzie, who would succeed if the contraveener and the descendants of his or her body were naturally dead; and it shall be leisum to the next heir of tailzie to establish the right thereof in his or her persone, either by adjudicatione, declarator, or serving heir to the person who died last vest and seized therein preceding the contraveener, and that without being liable to the said contraveener, his or her debts or deeds, or by any other manner of way, consisting with the laws of this kingdom; and the person so succeeding upon the contravention, and the descendants of their bodies, shall be obliged to assume, bear, and wear the said surname, arms, and designation, under the like irritancy to which the hail heirs of tailzie before mentioned, and the descendants of their bodies that shall happen to succeed to the saids lands and others foresaid, are to be subject and lyable through all the succession in time coming; and also providing, likewise it is hereby specially provided and declared and appointed, to be contained in and specially provided and declared by the instruments of resignation, charters, infeftments, sasines, services, precepts, retours, and others to follow hereupon, that it shall not be leisum nor lawfull to the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, who has only a right of liferent, nor to the heirs-male of his body, nor to any others the members of tailzie before mentioned, to alter, innovat, or change the foresaid tailzie and order of succession before express, or to do any other deed, directly or indirectly, in any sort, whereby the same may be any wayes altered, innovated, or changed, or to possess by any other title than this present right; and also that it shall not be leisum nor lawfull to the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, who is only provided to a liferent right, nor to the heirs-male of his body, nor to any others the members or heirs of tailzie before mentioned, to sell, dispoine, wadsett, or impignorate the saids lands and others foresaid, or any part or portion thereof, or to grant infeftments of annualrent out of the same, or any other right or security, either irredeemably or under reversion of the saids lands and others foresaid, or any part thereof, nor to contract any debts nor grant bonds, nor do any other deed of commission or omission, either civil or criminal, whereby the saids lands and others foresaid, or any part of the same, may be appressed, adjudged, evicted, or become caducary, escheat, or confiscated: Declaring always, that if the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, or the heirs-male of his body, or any other the members or heirs of tailzie before mentioned, shall do in the contrair hereof, then and in that case, all and every one of such acts and deeds, with all that shall happen to follow or may follow thereupon, shall be ipso facto void and null, and of no force, strength or effect, sicklike and in the same manner as if the said acts and deeds had not been done, acted, committed, or granted; and also declaring, that the person so contravening, and the descendants of his or her body, shall immediately upon the said contravention amit, lose, and tyne all right and title they have or can pretend to the said lands and others foresaid, with the pertinents; and the same shall, in the case foresaid, ipso facto fall, accresce, and pertain to the next heir and member of tailzie hereby appointed to succeed thereto, sicklike and in the same manner as if the persone so contravening, and the descendants of his or her body, were naturally dead."

These conditions were embodied in the entail of 1757, but were made applicable only to the lands of Coilsfield purchased under the Act of Parliament, and they were also embodied in the deed of 1774, in which they were of course made applicable to the whole lands entailed, including both Skelmorlie and Coilsfield. The deeds of 1728 and 1757 were duly registered in the Register of Tailzies, but the deed of 1774 was never so registered, and it was alleged that the sasine on the deed of 1728 was never recorded.

The deed of 1774 contained an obligation to infeft by a double manner of holding, a me vel de me; and on the precept of this deed Captain Hugh Montgomerie was infeft. Mrs Lillias Montgomerie died in 1783, leaving five sons and three daughters; and in 1784, Hugh Montgomerie, now Earl of Eglinton, in order to complete his titles to the entailed parts of Coilsfield which was held of a subject-superior, obtained a charter of confirmation. This charter confirmed the disposition and deed of entail of 1757, and sasine thereon in favour of Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, and also the disposition and sasine on the deed of 1774. It narrated the former deed fully, and contained verbatim the whole fetters and restrictions of the entails 1728 and 1757, but it narrated more briefly the deed of 1774—not inserting the irritant and resolute clauses expressly contained in that deed, but only referring to them as “particularly above specified” (that is, in the deed 1757), “allanarly and no other ways.” Hugh Earl of Eglinton possessed the estates of Skelmorlie and Coilsfield on these titles till his death in 1819. His eldest son, Archibald Lord Montgomerie, had predeceased him leaving issue, the present Earl of Eglinton, who having accordingly succeeded to the estates on his grandfather’s death, expedie a special service as nearest and lawful heir-male of the body, and of tailzie and provision to his grandfather, and completed his titles to Skelmorlie and Coilsfield by a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat from the trustees of the late Earl, who had become the superiors. The pursuer took infeftment on this charter in 1836, and in 1838 sold the whole estate of Coilsfield, including, of course, the parts which had been entailed, to the trustees of the late William Paterson of Jamaica. About the same period he also sold the estate of Skelmorlie to Mr Stewart Hay. To remove doubts as to Lord Eglinton’s powers to sell, Mr Paterson’s trustees raised a suspension as of a threatened charge for the payment of the price, and Lord Eglinton brought a declarator against the substitute heirs of entail—Mr Hay, the purchaser of Skelmorlie, agreeing to rest satisfied with the decision to be pronounced in these conjoined actions. The summons of declarator, after narrating the state of the titles and the two transactions of sale, subsumes,

“ That the aforesaid disposition and deed of entail of 1774, as well as certain earlier deeds of entail executed in 1728 and 1757, which may be alleged by the defenders to affect the foresaid lands, are defective in the clauses required by statutory law and practice for the constitution of valid and complete entails, and that the aforesaid disposition and deed of entail of 1774 has never been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, and that, in consequence thereof, in so far as regards the acts and deeds of the pursuer, and in so far as regards dispositions, conveyances, or other deeds of alienation, the said deeds of entail are inept and inoperative, and do not fall under the declarations and provisions contained in the Statute 1685, c. 22, and the pursuer, notwithstanding the said disposition and deed of entail, is entitled effectually to sell the said several lands and others, as freely in all respects as if he were proprietor thereof in fee-simple, and to grant dispositions, procuratories of resignation, precepts of sasine, or other deeds of alienation of the said several lands and others, in favour of the purchaser or purchasers thereof;”

and concludes to have it found and declared,

“ that the pursuer has full and undoubted right and power to sell, analzie and dispoine, in whole or in part, the several lands and estates specially above described, in any way he may think proper, for a price or other onerous consideration, and to grant and execute all dispositions, conveyances, deeds and writings whatsoever, which may be requisite or necessary for effectually conveying the whole or any part or parts of the said lands and others, which may be sold and alienated; and that upon selling or alienating the whole or any part or parts of the said several lands and others, the pursuer has the sole and exclusive right to the price or prices, or other consideration as his absolute property, and that he has full power to use and dispose of the same at pleasure, and that the pursuer does not lie under any obligation to invest, employ, or lay out the same or any part thereof, in the purchase or on the security of any other land or estate, or otherwise, for the benefit of the defenders or any of them, and that they have no right or title to interfere with or control the pursuer in the use or disposal of the said price or prices, or other consideration, in any manner of way; and also that the defenders, or any of them, have no claim or demand of any description against the pursuer, or against his heirs and representatives, in the event of his death, for or in respect of the sales or alienations which may be made, or dispositions or other writings which may be granted or executed by the pursuer, for or in respect of the pursuer using or disposing at his pleasure of the said price or prices, or other considerations: And farther, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the pursuer has full and undoubted right and power, gratuitously to alienate and dispose of the foresaid several lands and others, contained in the aforesaid deeds of entail, in any manner of way he may think proper, and to grant and execute all dispositions, conveyances, deeds and writings whatsoever, which may be requisite and necessary for effectually conveying the whole or any part or parts of the said lands and others, to any person or persons whatsoever, and in any manner that he may think proper, and that the defenders, or any of them, have no claim or demand of any description against the pursuer, or against his heirs and representatives in the event of his death, for or in respect of such alienation or disposal of the said lands and others, or dispositions or other writings which may be granted or executed by the pursuer.”

Defences were given in by William Montgomerie of Annick Lodge and others, the substitute heirs of entail, and the Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the record and cases to the First Division of the Court. His Lordship issued the following note:

“ The Lord Ordinary takes these cases to report, as it appears that the completion of a transaction of considerable magnitude depends on the judgment of the Court, which it is therefore desirable to obtain as speedily as possible.

“ The Earl of Eglinton has sold the estate of Coilsfield to the trustees of the deceased Mr Paterson. The purchasers, on examining the title, entertain great doubts as to the seller’s power to alienate the estate, and they present a suspension, on the ground that he holds it under a strict entail. Whereupon the noble Earl raises this declarator to have the extent of his powers judicially ascertained.

“ The pursuer maintains that he has power to sell, 1st, because he holds the estate solely upon a new entail, said to have been executed in 1774, which is still unrecorded; and 2d, because the resolutive clauses in all the deeds of tailzie, to which his possession can in any view be ascribed, are inapplicable to sales. These pleas are contested, both by the substitute heirs and by the trustees of Mr Paterson, as purchasers; as the case appears to the Lord Ordinary to present questions of considerable importance and difficulty for the judgment of the Court, he shall briefly state the views which have occurred to him, on a consideration of the revised cases.

“ I. It appears from the narrative of both parties, and from the titles produced, that the pursuer’s predecessors, prior to 1757, held the estates of Skelmorlie and Loehliboside under one deed of entail, executed in 1728, and duly recorded in the Register of Tailzies. Thereafter, in 1757, Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, then the heiress of entail, got an Act of Parliament for selling Lochliboside, and Coilsfield was purchased with the price. A deed of entail was executed as to that estate, intended to be in strict conformity with the original entail, the destination being only varied to adapt it, as was supposed, to the altered state of the family, by the failure of certain of the substitutes without children. That entail also was recorded in the Register of Tailzies.

"Thereafter, in 1774, Mrs Lillias Montgomerie being still alive, and in possession of both estates as heiress of entail, she, on occasion of the marriage of her eldest son, Colonel Hugh Montgomerie (last Earl of Eglinton), conveyed them to him by disposition under the very same prohibitory, irritant and resolutive clauses, and under a destination manifestly intended and understood both by grantor and grantees, to carry the estates to the same series of heirs as the original tailzie. That deed was not recorded in the Register of Tailzies; and the first point to be determined is, if it required to be so recorded?

"It is notoriously a competent and not an unusual practice in conveyancing, for one heir of tailzie to dispose the estate to his successor; particularly for a father to settle the estate on his son and apparent heir on the occasion of his marriage, restricting himself to a liferent, and conveying the fee to his son by procuratory of resignation or disposition, under all the limitations and fetters of the tailzie. When the whole clauses of the tailzie are fairly engrossed in the disposition, no second registration in the Record of Tailzies has ever been considered requisite,—it is viewed as the ordinary vesting title of an heir; but when essential variations have been unintentionally inserted in the last disposition, it is held as a new entail, extinguishing the prior titles, and of course requires registration. On this point reference may be made to the late case of Mr Hay Newton, 29th June 1836 (14 Shaw, p. 1031), in which the Second Division of the Court found that the disposition of an entailed estate by a father to his eldest son, on occasion of his marriage, though different in one important point (apparently by mistake) from the original entail (by not making the fetters applicable to the donee), was nevertheless not to be considered as a new entail requiring registration in the Record of Tailzies. In that case also, Lord Jeffrey gave a very clear and useful analysis of the prior case of Broomfield in 1786, in which a similar question was discussed twice, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, when a second disposition, executed by the maker of a previous entail, which was registered, was found to be a new tailzie, ineffectual against creditors for want of registration. A much better analysis of that case will be found in Lord Jeffrey's note than in any other report, and it deserves particular attention in the present discussion.

"The noble pursuer seems to maintain that the deed of 1774 constituted a new tailzie, chiefly on two grounds.

"1st, It is alleged that Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, by that disposition, changed the destination, by substituting, on the failure of her own heirs-male, 'the next heir-female successive of the body of the said deceased Sir Robert Montgomerie.' The pursuer argues, that if his own heirs-male failed, and if he left an only daughter, she would be deprived of the succession under the deed of 1774, which she would have enjoyed under the tailzie of 1728. But the Lord Ordinary is humbly of opinion, that the destinations in all the tailzies lead to the same result. The argument of the substitute heirs on this point appears to be quite unanswerable: See revised case for William Montgomerie, Esq., pp. 15, 20.

"2d, The deed of 1774 is maintained to be a new entail, because it is alleged that the irritant clauses as to Coilsfield were increased to a severer extent, by its being thereby provided that any contravention should infer a forfeiture, not merely of Coilsfield but of Skelmorlie; while it is assumed that, according to the entail of 1757, Coilsfield alone would have been forfeited in case of any contravention of that entail. On this point, the main authority appealed to by the defenders, is the decision of the whole Court in the late case of Graham and Bontine, 12th June 1835 (13 Shaw, p. 905), in which it was found that a conveyance of two estates previously held under separate tailzies, did not require registration in the Record of Tailzies. The pursuer contends that the case of Graham is inapplicable, because in that instance there was the most express reference in the new deed to the two prior entails, so that the clauses in each tailzie, applicando singula singulis, might be held as fairly set forth in the last disposition, while no such construction is admissible here.

"The Lord Ordinary, however, doubts, on several grounds, if the pursuer's objection be well founded in the present instance. In the first place, upon examining the disposition of 1774, it will be found (see appendix, p. 32, C), not only that it was granted by Mrs Montgomerie specially as heir of tailzie, but the most express reference was made in the disposition to the deed of entail of Coilsfield, as executed in 1757, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies in 1758. And also to the Act of Parliament obtained for the sale of Lochliboside, and the purchase of equivalent land, 'in the 30th year of his late Majesty's reign.' Farther, it is set forth in the disposition, that the lands of Coilsfield were purchased 'in lieu and place of the lands of Lochliboside and Hartfield, part of the said entailed estate of Skelmorlie.' Thus both the original tailzie and the second or substitute tailzie were brought into view in that disposition.

"In the second place, it deserves consideration, if there really was any erroneous aggravation or addition to the irritancies imposed on the heirs of the two estates by the deed of 1774, supposing the forfeitures were thereby extended to both estates. The Lord Ordinary has very great doubt if the conveyance of 1774 could have been framed in any other terms than it was. No doubt, if the entail of Coilsfield in 1757 were taken per se, it would appear that while the prohibitions were verbatim the same as those in the entail of 1728, the irritancies thereby imposed were applied only to the lands 'hereby disposed,' and not to Skelmorlie; but though the lands of Coilsfield only might have been forfeited under the deed of 1757, taken per se, it by no means followed that the substitute heirs might not have also pursued for a forfeiture and resolution of the contravener's right under the Skelmorlie entail. That deed was not done away with or altered, but specially confirmed by all the titles made up both in 1757 and 1774, and afterwards. Thence, if an heir had attempted to violate the prohibitions as to Coilsfield, it would have been competent to the substitute heirs to maintain, that as Coilsfield came by Statute in lieu and place of Lochliboside, therefore a contravention as to Coilsfield would necessarily infer a contravention of Skelmorlie, which might be pursued under that entail without the aid of the Coilsfield entail.

"Still farther, even if these strong specialties had not occurred to support the disposition of 1774, the Lord Ordinary, with deference, would have submitted it as a point on title deserving very mature consideration, if any mistake on the part of an heir of entail executing a conveyance or settlement of the estate ultra vires in any point, as, for example, by providing that the forfeiture, in case of contravention, shall be somewhat greater than the original tailzie allowed, could have any other effect than to entitle the heirs to reduce or disregard it quoad excessum. It seems hardly consistent to hold a deed as a new entail, or as an extinction of the prior tailzied investiture, when the grantor sets forth the most anxious desire to respect and give effect to the tailzie. It is assumed, in the present argument, that the majority of the Judges held an opposite doctrine in the late case of Graham and Bontine. But the Lord Ordinary apprehends that the Court hardly found it necessary to enter into the point now suggested; and at all events, he must submit his own impression, that as the deed of 1774 was in no respect broader or more stringent against the heirs of entail than a fair and just view of the previous entails duly recorded required, it cannot be viewed as a new and separate tailzie requiring registration.

"Finally, under this head, if the want of registration were the only objection that lay to the disposition of 1774, it is questionable if the noble pursuer would be entitled to decree on that ground, in terms of the declarator here brought. This is to have it found and declared that the pursuer has right to sell the estate of Coilsfield. But though an heir may have power to sell the estate in consequence of the non-registration of an entail, the Court has never found that he has a legitimate right to do so. On the contrary, it is his duty to record the entail if it requires registration; and though the sale to an onerous third party may be good, the seller is bound to invest the price.

This was found in the case of Queensberry in 1825, in conformity with a series of prior decisions (4 Shaw, p. 320), and more recently in the case of Tod, 1833 (11 Shaw, p. 933). No doubt, in this last view, the sale to the suspenders would be effectual; but if the case were decided solely on the non-registration of the deed of 1774, the judgment in the declarator would require to be carefully guarded, so as not to allow it to be inferred that the heir had any legal right which has not been recognised in prior cases as belonging to heirs possessing on similar titles.

"II. The next plea of the noble pursuer appears to be attended with more difficulty; but if well founded, it would supersede all question as to the non-registration of the deed of 1774. It depends on an objection to the efficacy of the resolutive clause in both of the original tailzies as recorded. The clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolutive, being the same, or meant to be the same in all the tailzies, it is contended by the noble pursuer, that the resolutive clause contained in them does not apply to sales made by an heir of entail in possession. That clause appears to be expressed in the same words in all the deeds (see 1st entail, appendix, p. 8, D E, 2d entail, p. 22, F G, and conveyance of 1774, p. 36, F G), from which it will be observed, that the general clause resolving the right of contraveners is followed by this addition or explanation, that the next heir, upon the forfeiture of the contravener, shall succeed, 'without respect to any innovation, alteration or change foreshaid, to be made by the person so contravening, and without the burden of any debts contracted by the said contravener, or of any acts or deeds of commission or omission, or any other act or deed whatsoever, which, according to the law, may be interpreted to import any contravention of the before-written clause irritant.'

"In considering the legal effect of this clause, it will be observed that there precedes it in each deed a complete prohibitory clause, applicable to the three forms of alienation struck at by the Act 1685, of altering the order of succession, contracting debt and selling, and there is a general irritant clause, and a general resolutive clause, which per se would be incontestably sufficient to fence the prohibitions. The question which arises here then is, whether the words last quoted, specifying the effect of the resolutive clause, and the manner or effect in which the next heirs, after contraveners, shall be entitled to take up the estate, amount to a restriction or qualification of the resolutive clause.

"The precedent most nearly applicable to the present is the late case of the Ballilisk entail (Horne v. Rennie), decided in this Court in 1837 (15 Shaw, p. 372), and reversed in the House of Lords in 1838 (Shaw and McLean, Vol. III. p. 142). In that case the branches of the resolutive clause were certainly collocated with each other in a manner different from the present, but so far they agree, that there was in the Ballilisk case the most express resolution of the contravener's right, 'in case of failure in any part of the premises,'—and there was subsequently an enumeration of particulars, among which selling was omitted, but there was also at the end of the enumeration, as well as at the commencement, a repetition of the general resolutive provision in these words, 'or shall fail or contravene in any part of the premises';—Yet the House of Lords (reversing the judgment of this Court) held the resolutive clause in Rennie's case to be ineffectual.

"It would be difficult to express the argument competent to the substitute heirs in favour of the present entail, more clearly or concisely than in the words of Lord Glenlee in the Ballilisk case. His Lordship, referring to the Tillicoultry case, said, that in that case 'a great part of the argument was, that the general clause applied to the prohibition omitted in the special enumeration; on that point the Court had differed. But here the case is perfectly different, as there is a general clause irritating the right by doing this or that. A general declaration in the resolutive clause annexed to particulars will not apply to others of a different kind; but when it precedes them, then it bears, in case the heirs of tailzie shall contravene in any part of the premises, and without prejudice to the generality, certain things are afterwards specified. So here, according to the strict meaning of the words, I cannot doubt that the entailment meant to irritate and resolve the heir's right, if any one thing before prohibited was done. I incline, therefore, to alter the interlocutor; but in so doing, I think I confirm the case of Tillicoultry.'

"That doctrine, however, was not sanctioned by the House of Lords; and if not successful in a case so lately discussed, it can hardly prevail here. Indeed, the fundamental principle on which the decision in the case of Tillicoultry, Bonnington and others proceeded, was, that general words, which, if standing alone, would have been amply sufficient to fence the entail, were held qualified, or restricted by an enumeration of particulars, omitting some of those first expressed.

"At the same time, it is obvious that the resolutive clause in the present tailzie is somewhat more comprehensive and absolute than even in the Ballilisk case. But still, as the entail's true meaning, in the one case, was as clear in that case as in the present, and as general words, when followed by particulars, were disregarded in the last case which occurred in the Court of last resort, it is for the Court to determine if a different construction can be given to the resolutive clause in the present instance. The Lord Ordinary thinks this a question well worthy of the deliberate consideration of the Court."

After parties had been fully heard, the Court ordered new cases on the whole cause, "in order to have the opinion of the whole Court."

The pursuer pleaded—

I. The pursuer, Lord Eglinton, and his predecessors, having possessed the estates for upwards of forty years under the entail of 1774, which was not recorded in the Register of Tailzies, and was essentially different from the previous entails, it became the basis of a new prescriptive investiture, under which he is entitled to sell and dispose of the lands, without being bound by the conditions and provisions in the previous entails. (1.) An entail not registered is, in the words of Lord Mackenzie in the case of Munro v. Drummond, "equal to an entail not yet existent in reference to any third party contracting with any heir who is in possession of the entailed estate." If, therefore, Lord Eglinton's possession is not founded on the original entails of 1728 and 1757, but on the subsequent entail of 1774, there can be no doubt that the estates may be effectually sold or attached by the diligence of creditors. (2.) Where an heir of entail completes his titles under an investiture differing in any of its important clauses or provisions from the original entail, such an investiture must be dealt with as a new deed of entail, and is not effectual until recorded in the Register of Tailzies. This was fixed by the case of Broomfield. Now, the deed 1774 was not intended merely to propel the fee of the estates to the next substitute. Its sole or leading object was to combine the separate properties of Coilsfield and Skelmorlie into one estate, and unite them under the fetters of one entail. Such, accordingly, is the result. They are included in one dispositive clause, with one destination—one set of prohibitory, irritant and resolutive clauses,—and one set of provisions as to widows and children. An irritancy, with regard to any single portion of the combined estate, is declared to draw after it a forfeiture of the whole, and all the clauses seem framed—not as if to preserve, but to obliterate the distinction previously existing between the two estates. Accordingly, the deed of 1774 makes no distinct allusion to the deed of 1728; and though there is a reference to the entail of 1757, it occurs only in a part of the deed descriptive of the lands, where the object was merely to distinguish the entailed portions of Coilsfield from the unentailed. It is argued that the mere fact of the deed of 1774 being granted by Lillias Montgomerie in favour of her eldest son, is in itself a conclusive proof that nothing more was meant than to propel the fee. On the contrary, the pursuer maintains, that if this had been the intention, it ought to have been expressly narrated—a distinct reference ought to have been made to the original entail, accompanied with a recital of all its fettering clauses and other provisions. This is fully illustrated by the case of Hay Newton. Had Mrs Lillias Montgomerie intended nothing more than to propel the fee, the proper mode would have been to propel both estates under their separate investitures. At all events, a distinct and separate set of fencing clauses should have been applied to each.

Apart from this argument, founded on the general scope and structure of the deed, there are two distinct grounds on which the pursuer maintains that the deed of 1774 constituted a new entail: First, There is a most important discrepancy in the destination. Under the destination of 1774—to Hugh Earl of Eglinton, “and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the other heirs-male of my body; whom failing, to the next heir-female successive of the body of Sir Robert Montgomerie,” &c.—the parties called are, 1st, the heirs-male of the body of Hugh Earl of Eglinton; 2d, the heirs-male of the body of Mrs Lillias Montgomerie; and, 3d, the heirs-female of Sir Robert Montgomerie. The practical effect of this destination is, that if the pursuer were to leave only daughters, these daughters, with their descendants, would be postponed to the whole heirs-male of the body of Mrs Lillias Montgomerie; whereas, under the destination of 1728—failing the heirs-male or female of the body of the entailor, and the heirs-male of the body of Sir Robert Montgomerie, “to the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the body of the eldest heir-female;” whilks failing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie,” &c.—the pursuer’s heir of line, whether male or female, would always be preferred. Had this destination stopped, after giving the estates “to the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie,” without adding, “and the heirs-male of the body of the eldest heir-female,” there could have been no question that this was the true construction. The pursuer apprehends that the addition is immaterial, and makes no real change upon the destination—being merely a kind of surplusage introduced by the conveyancer in his anxiety to make clear what was perfectly clear without it. The “heirs-male of the body of an heir-female” are, in strict legal language, just “heirs-female.” The omission of the family of the Clarks in the deed of 1774, is a second important discrepancy in the clauses of destination. It has been argued that the deed of 1774 is not different from, or inconsistent with the entail of 1728, because Coilsfield came in place of Lochliboside and Hartfield, in virtue of an Act of Parliament, against which a prescriptive right cannot be acquired. But, first, the Act, while it authorises the sale of Lochliboside, and directs the sums to be invested in other lands, makes no mention whatever of Coilsfield, and therefore a prescriptive right to Coilsfield is not, strictly speaking, contrary to the Statute; and, secondly, even if the Act had referred to Coilsfield, and expressly directed it to be strictly entailed, it would not have been effectual to bar prescription. It has been repeatedly decided, that if an estate has been possessed for upwards of forty years, a mere reference in the title to a Statute which shows a defect in the original right, will not deprive the possessor of the benefit of prescription. II. All the entails are ineffectual and defective in the fencing clauses, and more particularly in the resolute clause; because, while it purports to resolve the right of the contravening heir, and declares that the next heir shall be entitled to complete his right to the estate without respect to the acts of the contravener, it omits, in an especial enumeration of such acts, all reference to deeds of sale and alienation. The irritant clause is expressed in very unusual terms. Its whole efficacy is made to depend on the words, “shall do in the contrair hereof,”—a phrase very far from being definite and precise, and leaving it very doubtful what extent of meaning is to be given to the word “hereof.” Again, the words “such acts and deeds,” in the irritant clause, may be held to have a limited signification so as to apply only to the antecedent clause against feudal and criminal delinquencies. For the word “deeds” is used in this sense in the immediately preceding prohibition, and the words “acts or deeds” are used in the same sense in the subsequent resolute clause, where it is declared that the next heir shall take up the estate free from the burden of any debts contracted, “or of any acts or deeds of commission or omission, or any other act or deed whatsoever, which, according to the law, may be interpreted to whatsover contravention of the before-written clause irritant.” In this respect the case bears a very strong resemblance to the case of Lang. But the main defect in all the entails lies in the general resolute clause. It commences with resolving the contravener’s right in general terms; but in empowering the next heir to make up titles, it enumerates the particular acts of the contravener which he was to disregard. In this enumeration, sales or alienations of the property are omitted. The effect of this is, that if an heir in possession were to sell a portion of the lands, and the next substitute were thereupon to bring a declarator, concluding for forfeiture against the seller, and irritancy against the purchaser, it might be maintained that the sale could not be irritated; because, by the very terms of the deed founded on, the substitute heir was entitled to disregard debts and deeds of alteration, but was not entitled to disregard sales or alienations. In this view, the omission is fatal to the entail. III. In any question inter hæredes, the pursuer is not bound to reinvest the price of the subjects for the benefit of the substitute heirs of entail. The general point involved in this plea was settled in the case of Ascog, and has been repeated in many subsequent decisions.

The deed of 1774 did not constitute a new and different entail, but was merely the instrument by which the union of the two estates, sanctioned and contemplated by the Act of Parliament, was effected, and by which the united fee was propelled to the next substitute, in conformity with the principles of entail law. The destination in the two entails is perfectly identical. Under that of 1757 and 1774, the whole heirs-male of the body of Lillias Montgomerie are called to the succession in preference to any female descendants of her body, or males descended from such female; and hence a daughter of an eldest son of Lillias would be postponed to a second son. But this is exactly what would take place under the destination of 1728. This destination called “the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the body of the said eldest heir-female;” whilks failing, the next heir-female successive of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of the said next heir-female successive.” In the event which occurred, it cannot be disputed that the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie was Lillias Montgomerie, his eldest daughter. She then, and the heirs-male of her body, were called by the destination of 1728 in preference to any other heirs-female of Sir Robert’s body, or of her own body—in preference, for instance, to her daughter, or the daughter of her eldest son. In fact, the heirs-female generally of Lillias Montgomerie are not called by the destination at all. The pursuer holds, that “the eldest heir-female of the body of the said Sir Robert Montgomerie” designates not only Lillias Montgomerie, who was his eldest daughter, but all the heirs of the body of the said Sir Robert, and consequently all the heirs of the body of Lillias Montgomerie, whether male or female; and he follows out this view by holding that the words, “and the heirs-male of the body of the said heir-female” are mere surplusage. Nor can he stop here; for according to the same view, the next branch of the destination is equally useless; for if all Sir Robert’s heirs-female were included under the terms “the eldest heir-female,” there could be no room for afterwards calling his heirs-female successive. It is plain, that failing Sir Robert Montgomerie and the heirs-male of his body, it was the intention of the entailor to bring in several successive classes of heirs-male, while several classes were to be descended successively of the eldest heir-female of Sir Robert’s body, the next heir-female of Sir Robert’s body, &c. The ruling character of the destination is, that there was to be as little departure as possible from the line of heirs-male. One female was to be admitted as introducing each new class of male descendants. The defenders do not maintain that the eldest heir-female of the body of Sir Robert Montgomerie must have been his daughter. On the contrary, the eldest heir-female might have been a granddaughter, or a grandson by a daughter. But in the event which actually happened, Lillias Montgomerie proved to be the eldest heir-female of her father; and these words in the destination designated her, and no one else. Having taken as the individual specifically called, the next in succession were the heirs-male of her body. Under this destination, her second son must have taken in preference to the daughter of her eldest son, just as he would have done under the deed of 1774; and therefore, the alleged discrepancy in the destination of the entails does not exist. As to the discrepancy said to be caused by the omission of Alexander Clark and his descendants, it is altogether immaterial. The Act of Parliament, 1757, distinctly sets forth that Alexander Clark had died without issue. If so, it is impossible to doubt that he and his heirs were properly omitted. But then the pursuer pleads, that the deed of 1774 constituted a new entail, because one set of fetters was made applicable to both estates, whereas, previously, there was a separate set for each. In considering this plea, it is necessary to attend to the object and intention of the Act under which Lochliboside and Hartfield were sold, and Coilsfield purchased. It is clear, that by the express provisions of the Act, the lands purchased were to be substituted in all respects in place of the lands to be sold, and were to bear the same relation to the remainder of the entailed estate. They were to give rise to the same forfeitures, on the one hand, and they were to be subject to the same forfeitures, on the other. Nothing short of this could fulfil the Statute. Till this was fully effected, the Statute itself was not carried into full execution. Nothing is more common than the exchange of a part of an entailed estate, under an Act of Parliament, for other lands more convenient. In this way, though there come to be two deeds of tailzie (the one properly supplementary to the other), they are inseparably bound together by the intentions, provisions and enactments of the Statute, and constitute one joint entail, the fetters and restrictions of which extend over the whole conjoined entailed estate. If it could be supposed that the trustees under the Statute of 1757 had failed to give full effect to it, the result would be, that the statutory trust is still unfulfilled, and the title of the lands depending on it, void and null. This however is not the case. After infeftment was taken on the statutory entail, and the entail itself registered, the object of the Statute was fulfilled. The estate of Coilsfield was annexed to the entailed estate of Skelmorlie, and effectually brought within the same fetters. The two estates were inseparably connected, and nothing short of the statutory authority by which they had been united, could disunite them. In this view, the conveyance of 1774 constituted merely a continuance of the joint entail already established, and cannot, with or without prescription, be the basis of an investiture hostile to it. According to the pursuer's view, the deed of 1774 was a contravention of the entails of 1728 and 1757. To see how untenable this view is, it is necessary only to look at the charter of confirmation of 1784. That charter, so far from treating the deed of 1774 as a new entail in contravention of the former, grants confirmation to the heirs of the deed 1757, under the fetters contained in that deed, and no otherwise. The fetters contained in that deed are specially set forth; whereas those of the deed 1774, when alluded to at all, are merely mentioned generally, as being the same with those of the previous deed. The only intention of the deed 1774 obviously was, to carry the purposes of the Act of Parliament into full effect, and at the same time propel the fee by conveying it to the heir alioqui successurus in the subsisting entails. But the pursuer pleads, that even assuming the deed of 1774 is to be dealt with as a mere propelling of the fee, a common defect attaches to the fetters of all the entails, as regards deeds of sale and alienation. He admits that there is a good and effectual prohibitory clause. The irritant clause also is perfectly sufficient and effectual. Nay more, the resolute clause, in so far as it is stated in general terms, is allowed to be unexceptionable; but because there is an addition to the resolute clause—an addition confessedly not essential—in which, while the deeds which an heir taking under a contravention is entitled to disregard are mentioned, there is no express mention of sales, it is argued that this additional clause must be held to vitiate the resolute clause, though in itself perfectly sufficient. The defenders demur to this doctrine. As the general resolute clause is in itself complete, the appendage to it, which is a separate provision, can have no effect in destroying its integrity. The Statute 1685 expressly requires “a resolute clause to be insert in the tailzie.” But no appendage of the nature in question is required to be inserted. It might safely be dispensed with altogether, and is a mere piece of surplusage. Lastly, even if the pursuer's view, in regard to the investiture of 1774, were correct, the conclusions of the summons are unfounded, in so far as they assume that an unregistered entail is not only ineffectual against third parties, but is equally unavailing inter hæredes.

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges:

Lords Moncreiff, Meadowbank, Medwyn, Jeffrey, Cockburn, Murray and Ivory:

“In the summons of declarator it is stated, ‘that the pursuer has lately entered into two several transactions, whereby he has sold to the trustees of the deceased William Paterson, Esq. of Kingston, in the island of Jamaica, the aforesaid portions of the lands and estate of Coilsfield, and to John Stewart Hay, Esq., the aforesaid lands of Skelmorlie.’

“The purchasers under these concluded contracts of sale, entertaining doubts concerning the validity of the title proposed to be given to them by Lord Eglinton, brought a suspension of the demand for payment of the prices, in order that it might be determined whether he had power, under the titles by which he held the estates, to make a sale to be effectual to the purchaser or not. And on the other hand, Lord Eglinton, in order to meet this suspension, and bring the question more formally to trial, has raised this declarator against all the substitute heirs supposed to have an eventual right of succession under the entails referred to, with conclusions for ascertaining the extent of his powers, as the fiar in possession of the estates.

“Although, therefore, the conclusions of the summons go beyond what is necessary for determining the validity or invalidity of the sales, and thereby exhausting the merits of the suspension, the material question for the judgment of the Court is, whether, in the actual state of the pursuer's titles, his powers were so effectually limited by the force of an entail, correctly framed in all its clauses, and completed in terms of the Statute 1685, that the sales made by him for onerous considerations constitute no valid rights to the purchasers. It is a question raised in the same form, and to the same effect, as the question tried and determined in the case of Tillicoultry, and many other cases of the same kind. Although, therefore, it will be necessary in this opinion to advert to some other things embraced by the words of the summons, we think it proper to direct our attention mainly to the essential point involved in the conjoined processes.

“The summons represents the title of the pursuer in the two separate estates of Skelmorlie and others, and Coilsfield and others, as standing on a deed of entail, dated 27th June 1774, with the investiture upon that title, and the subsequent progress, till they came into the person of the pursuer, and his titles were completed thereon by seisin duly recorded in the year 1836. And the pursuer, alleging that this title, by regular investitures standing far beyond the years of prescription, is the title by which the nature and extent of his powers must be determined, maintains substantially two points for establishing that he had power to make the sales in question effectually: 1. That that entail of 1774 must be considered as a substantive and independent entail, for the settlement of both the estates as one estate in fee, subject to the conditions therein expressed, and the effect of the statutory law applicable to it; and that that deed never having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, cannot militate against purchasers or creditors transacting onerously with him as the heir in the fee: and, 2. That the irritant and resolute clauses of this entail, as well as those in the entails founded on by the defenders, are not so expressed as to render the act of sale ineffectual, even though the original entail constituting the proper title had been duly entered in the Register of Tailzies.

“The defenders, on the other hand, state, that the lands of Skelmorlie and others were effectually entailed by a deed executed in 1728, which deed was duly recorded in the Register of Tailzies; and that the lands of Coilsfield and others were also effectually entailed by a deed executed in 1757, and duly entered in the register. And then they maintain, that the deed of 1774, having been only intended to put forward the succession, according to a well-established principle, and being substantially the same, both in the destination and in the restricting clauses, with those entails of 1728 and 1757, cannot be held to have superseded those entails, or to constitute in itself a substantive and independent title by entail requiring registration. They farther say, that the irritant and resolute clauses in all the deeds are sufficient.

" I. If the powers of the pursuer, and the validity of the sales are to be determined exclusively under the deed 1774 as the substantive regulating title, there cannot, we comprehend, be any doubt, that as that entail had not been recorded in the Register of Tailzies at the dates of the contract of sale in question, no matter from what cause, it cannot, however complete otherwise, be effectual to annul the rights of the purchasers. The Statute 1685 must be conclusive on this point. The rule held in the case of Smollet and many other cases is, that an entail not recorded is, in all questions with creditors and purchasers, to be regarded as no entail at all.

" The material question, therefore is, whether the entail 1774, on which the subsequent investitures were completed, is to be regarded as a substantive original entail, which it was necessary to enter in the Register of Tailzies, in order to secure its efficacy against creditors and purchasers.

" In arguing this question, the pursuer endeavours to make out, that there is a change in the destination expressed in that entail from the destinations contained in the entails 1728 and 1757. We are not at present in a situation to hold that there is any such change. There is a difference in the form of words employed in that destination; and it is perhaps conceivable that circumstances might have occurred to raise a question on the form of expression. But, in the actual state of the case, the destinations in all the deeds are the same in substance and effect. The omission of the descendants of Alexander Clark is altogether immaterial, seeing that it is ascertained by the Act of Parliament of 1757, that he and his wife had died without issue before that time; and it is a well-established rule, that it is quite competent, in renewing the investitures, to omit those branches of the destination which have previously failed. We cannot think, therefore, that there is in the deed 1774 any change in the destination of the previous entails, which would be sufficient to supersede them, if the question depended on this point.

" But, in a more direct view of the nature and effect of that deed 1774, there seems to be much more solid ground for the pursuer's plea. The defenders say that that deed of 1774 was evidently intended to give effect to the previous entails; and that the only object of it was to put forward the fee to the immediate heir of entail, Mrs Montgomerie's son,—a thing which has often been done without its being held that the deed executed for the purpose constituted a new entail. But it is to be remembered that we are not here in a question of intention only. This deed of 1774 was carried forward into an actual investiture by seisin, which was afterwards confirmed by charter of confirmation, and on that title, independent of any other, the investitures have been formed ever since. It is a prescriptive title, which must be effectual according to its terms, and cannot be controlled by anything else, unless it shall appear that, by its nature and terms, it does in fact sustain and incorporate some other entailed title more legally stringent. We do not doubt that one purpose of the parties, in executing that deed, was to put forward the succession to Mrs Montgomerie's son. But we are not satisfied that that was the only purpose of it. For it seems scarcely to be a matter of doubt, that it was also contemplated, that such a settlement would form a much clearer and simpler title by uniting both the estates in one entail, whereby the forfeitures could be distinctly applied to the whole, in the case of contravention as to a part of either (always a matter of difficulty in separate entails), than the separate titles as they previously stood. And if it had been duly recorded, we presume that it never could have been doubted, at least after the years of prescription, that it constituted the only and the ruling title in these estates. In fact, it was probably intended to obviate a difficulty occasioned by the form of the Act of Parliament 1757, in appointing a separate entail for Coilsfield to be executed; and it was perfectly well conceived for that end, if care had been taken to complete it by registration.

" The important question, however, is, what this deed 1774 is in itself as matter of fact, whatever may have been intended by it? It appears to us, that de facto it is made distinctly in the form of an independent original entail. There is no mention in it, from beginning to end, of the entail 1728, or of the investitures upon that entail. There is an incidental reference to the disposition of entail 1757 with regard to the lands of Coilsfield. But that is only in the description of the lands as acquired by that title. That that entail only is mentioned, shows that the reference was merely descriptive, and was not framed to affect the nature of the title given by the deed 1774 itself; for the lands of Skelmorlie and others stood altogether on different titles, and there is no reference whatever to the entail 1728, which alone applied to those lands. Then this deed 1774 goes on to lay down regular clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolute, applied indiscriminately to all or any part of both estates, in which there is no reference of any kind to any previous entails. They are substantive provisions made in an original form as conditions of the disposition itself, without relation to any thing else, and are made to depend exclusively on the force of the deed itself. And while the essential clauses are thus completed, it is expressly provided that the disponee and the heirs of entail shall possess the estates by that title and by no other, under pain of an irritancy applied specifically to this provision.

" On that title seisin followed; and the possession has been on the investiture so constituted ever since. The restrictive clauses in the Register of Seisins are those of the disposition 1774 itself, including the provision that the possession shall be held by it alone. There is not in the registered seisin upon that title the least allusion to the entail 1728. It is indeed a separate and very singular peculiarity, if the statement on page 45 of the pursuer's case be correct, that the seisin said to have been taken on the entail 1728 never was recorded in the Register of Seisins at all; a fact which, as to the lands of Skelmorlie at least, would, if the matter were not relieved by subsequent investitures (which might be doubtful), form a separate insuperable objection to the case of the defenders, in a question with third parties purchasers. But, independent of this, the whole title was completed on the deed 1774 as an independent entail, with clauses distinctly resting upon its own force; and on that title prescription has long ago run. And it is indeed apparent, that any contravention under the entails of 1728 and 1757, separately, would not at all infer the same forfeitures of both estates, which would in principle follow on a contravention of the entail 1774.

" It is impossible that the charter of confirmation afterwards obtained could in any manner control or alter the effect of this; for, besides that that was a private title, it expressly confirmed the deed 1774 itself, and the seisin upon it. And as it is an established rule of law (Ersk. II. 7, 15; McDowal, 19th January 1793), that confirmation draws back to the date of the seisin, the real effect of it was to render the right public from that date. Thus the prescriptive title was perfect from 1774 downwards. In itself, it contains nothing which can by possibility qualify or control it, by reference to any entail of the lands of Skelmorlie other than this title itself; and the only reference to the disposition 1757 as to the lands of Coilsfield, is not, in our opinion, of such a nature that it can be held to qualify the nature and character of the entail 1774 as a substantive entail of both estates together.

" Reference has been made to the case of Turnbull v. Hay Newton, 29th June 1836. It does not appear to us that there is anything in that case which ought to lead to a decision different from that implied in the opinion which we have now expressed. In that case the disposition by William Hay Newton, the heir in possession, in favour of himself in life, and his son in fee, was in express terms made under all the limitations, conditions and irritancies specified in an entail 1724, 'and hereinafter expressed'; and it provided that the heirs should all possess by the title of that entail 1724, and by no other right or title whatsoever.' It was impossible to hold that such a deed could have the effect of superseding an entail which it in express words confirmed; or that it could be considered as an original entail, when it merely put forward the fee expressly as it was held by the title of the only original entail. The only question which was agitated arose out of two variations in expression in repeating the clauses; upon which there was an attempt to liken the case to that of Broomfield v. Paterson. But the Lord Ordinary and the Court, looking to the manner in which the entail of 1724 was in express terms referred to and confirmed, sustained the defences and assoilzied from the action; thus holding the heir to be effectually restrained from contracting debts. There can be no doubt that that decision was right. But it does not appear to us that it has any application to a case like the present.

"We are, therefore, on the whole, of opinion, that the deed of entail 1774 being the ruling title, must be considered as an original substantive entail, and that, not having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, it is not effectual against creditors or purchasers, and therefore cannot affect the validity of the contracts of sale concluded between the Earl of Eglinton and the purchasers suspenders.

"II. If the deed of 1774 had been duly recorded, or if the objection that it was not recorded could be in any way overcome, we do not think that there is any defect either in the irritant clause or in the resolutive clause sufficient to prevent their efficacy to annul acts of sale.

"We certainly hold, that, in the question whether there is such a defect or not, the pursuer, or rather the purchasers, are entitled to a strict construction. But, on any construction, the clause appears to us to be sufficient.

"With regard to the irritant clause, it is entirely of a sweeping general nature, not professing to make any enumeration of the particular acts prohibited; and it is impossible to maintain that an irritant clause in this form may not be effectual, if the words used are in themselves sufficient to cover the act of contravention attempted. The defect in the case of Tillicoultry lay altogether in this, that in the resolutive clause there was a particular enumeration in which the case of selling was omitted; and it was therefore held, that in such a case the omission could not be supplied by mere general words added to the enumeration, which might be applied to many other things, and equally to those which were specially enumerated. The same thing substantially occurred in the late case of Rennie. There was a special enumeration of particulars in the irritant clause; and the act of sale was omitted. A majority of the Court here held the entail effectual, on the ground that the particularisation did not qualify or limit the effect of the general words which preceded it, and which by themselves would have been sufficient. The House of Lords would not adopt that distinction, and held the entail not good,—not because the general words used might not have been sufficient in other circumstances, but simply because the entailor, professing, in the irritant and resolutive clauses, to enumerate the particular matters comprehended in the substantive prohibitions to which the irritancy should apply, had omitted the case of sales. But in the case before the Court, there is not in the irritant clause any specification or attempt to specify the acts of contravention. It is quite general, and in reality in the safest and best form for that reason. After the prohibitions against altering, selling or contracting debt—with the usual general words of other deeds, civil or criminal, leading to eviction—the irritant clause declares, that if the said Hugh Montgomerie, &c., 'shall do in the contrair HEREOF, then and in that case, all and every one of such acts and deeds, with all that shall happen to follow, or may follow thereupon, shall be ipso facto void and null, and of no force, strength or effect, siclike and in the same manner as if the said acts and deeds had not been done, acted, committed or granted.' It is impossible to deny that an act of sale, or a deed of conveyance or alienation, is a thing done, and a deed granted 'in the contrary hereof;' and if this be clearly so on every construction, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that it must be effectual, without just saying that there can be no good irritant clause, unless it does specifically enumerate all the particular matters in the prohibitory clause. But this cannot be said; because there are many entails which have stood the closest scrutiny, in which the terms of the irritant clause are equally general. The words of the clause in the Roxburgh entail, after the prohibitions which were held to be effectual, were simply—'all which deeds so to be done by them are declared to be null, and of none avail, strength nor effect.' Cases have occurred where, from the particular collocation of the words, an ambiguity has seemed to be left as to the application of the term 'which deeds,' as being by possible construction limited to the immediately preceding words of amplification concerning deeds other than deeds of alteration, sale, or contraction of debts. But every such ambiguity is excluded here by the precise form of the clause; the case is, 'if the heir shall do in the contrair hereof,' all such acts and deeds shall be null and void. No construction can so limit the effect of these words as to exclude deeds of sale from its operation. Neither can it affect this conclusion, that in the case of Rennie there were also general words which might seem to comprehend sales. The difference is, that there the entailor specified the cases of the heirs failing to assume the name and arms—failing to engross the clauses in the infeftments—altering the order of succession—or contracting debts—and had not specified the case of selling or alienating, whereby, consistently with the case of Tillicoultry, there was left a fair possibility that it was left out ex proposito, or at least ground for holding that there was an actual omission of that special case.

"The separate objection to the resolutive clause is very special, but it does not appear to be well founded. The material part of the clause, by which the right of the contravener is resolved or forfeited, is admitted to be clear and sufficient. But in declaring the mode in which the next heir is to make up his title, the maker resumes the special cases of supposed contravention, and in doing so has omitted to specify particularly the case of sales. We do not know that it ever was held or decided, that such an omission in this part of the clause would render an entail ineffectual, which was otherwise complete in the essential clauses. It might occasion practical inconvenience in the formation of the title, on such a contravention, if there were no words which would be held sufficient to comprehend the case to such an effect. But it never could prevent the actual forfeiture or irritancy, otherwise clearly declared; and the contravening heir being once forfeited, and having ceased to have any right in the estate, could not be heard to object to any proceeding whereby the right of the next heir might be legally established in his person. The words of the clause, however, as they stand, though probably they would not reach the act of sale, if the declaration of forfeiture had been made in the same form, might possibly be held sufficient for merely laying down the nature of the title to be made up by the next heir.

"The summons contains some other propositions, to which it may be proper to advert.

"1. Though we are of opinion, that in consequence of the non-registration of the entail 1774, the pursuer was not effectually debarred from making a sale which would give a good right to the purchaser, we do not think that it can be declared by this Court that he has a right to sell the estate which he holds in virtue of that title. Being in the fee, he has power to do such an act; and by the force of the Statute, the purchaser will get a good title which cannot be set aside as in contravention of the entail. But the Court cannot be called on to declare that he had a right to do so.

"2. The summons concludes to have it found, that the pursuer has 'full right and power gratuitously to alienate and dispose of the said several lands,' &c. We do not know on what ground a judgment to this effect could be contemplated. But as we consider it to be clear law, that the prohibitory clause alone, standing in the body of the pursuer's title, would be sufficient to prevent all gratuitous alienations, and that it would be effectual to this purpose in all questions inter heredes, notwithstanding that the entail had not been recorded, we are of opinion that such a declaratory judgment cannot be granted.

"3. The summons asks the Court to declare, that upon the sales taking effect, the price or consideration which the pursuer may receive will be at his absolute disposal, and that he is under no obligation to employ or lay out the same in the purchase of other land, or otherwise, for the benefit of the heirs of entail. We understand this to mean, that the Court should find that this case will fall within the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Ascog. But though we may not at present see any ground for supposing that a different result should take place in this case, it rather appears to us to be premature to pronounce any specific judgment on such a question, until a claim of that kind shall have been actually made."

Lord Cuninghame:

"Upon reconsidering the state of the titles in the present case, with the views of Lord Moncreiff upon them, explained in his opinion, I have come to be satisfied that the settlement and conveyance by Mrs Lillias Montgomerie in 1774, of the estates of Skelmorlie and Coilsfield, must be viewed as a new entail, which required registration in the Record of Tailzies to bar onerous creditors and purchasers from attaching them; and as no such registration took place, I am of opinion that onerous purchasers of these estates are entitled to acquire them. This now appears to me to follow from the peculiar structure and provision of the Act of Parliament, which allowed the sale of Lochliboside and the other lands in Renfrewshire belonging to the heirs of entail in 1757, but did not provide in apt and sufficient terms for such a title to be thereafter made up to the two estates in a combined entail, composed in part of the old estate of Skelmorlie, and in part of the new or substituted estate of Coilsfield, as was necessary to settle the whole of these lands in one effectual tailzie. At least this appears to be a legitimate inference upon a strict construction of the titles expedite under the Act of Parliament in 1757, which were neither reduced, nor in any respect explained or qualified by declarator subsequent to their completion.

"When the Act of Parliament in 1757 allowed Lochliboside to be sold, it left Skelmorlie only under the fetters of the old entail; and consequently, if a contravention had been committed as to these lands, those interested in the tailzie could only pursue a forfeiture under that tailzie, of such parts of the old estate as were left unsold. In like manner, when the Statute provided with respect to the new lands to be purchased (Coilsfield), that these should 'be settled, disposed, and provided to and for the use, benefit and behoof of the said Lillias Montgomerie, and the said other heirs of entail, according to the different rights and interests, and in the same order and course of succession as the same premises are secured to and for them, and their benefit respectively, in and by the same deed of entail, and subject to the restrictions and limitations, clauses irritant and resolute therein contained, and shall immediately after record the said settlements and dispositions so to be made in the Register of Tailzies,' &c.; and when the learned and eminent persons who executed the new tailzie under that Statute as to Coilsfield, made the fetters and forfeitures to apply to that estate only, without any provision as to the forfeiture of Skelmorlie, I apprehend that, upon the strict rules of construction adopted in other cases of tailzie, a contravention as to Coilsfield could not, under such a title, have inferred a forfeiture of Skelmorlie.

"It should have been provided by the Statute, either that a new entail of both estates should be made and recorded,—or that the entail of the new lands should be so expressed as to make the irritant and resolute clauses take effect in case of any breach either of the old or of the new entail. But the deed was not so framed, and therefore, between 1757 and 1774, the estates of Coilsfield and Skelmorlie stood on separate entails, which were completed and registered, each containing its own prohibitions, restrictions, and forfeitures, which, in strict law, could not be extended and applied to both estates indiscriminately.

"It is quite possible that the Court, on an action at the instance of the substitute heirs, might have directed the titles, as expedite in 1757, to be corrected, and a new entail of both estates to be executed and recorded conformable to the original rights of parties, and to the probable meaning of the Legislature in authorising a part of the old estate to be sold. But that course was not taken. Mrs Lillias Montgomerie, after a possession of seventeen years on the separate entails, attempted at her own hand, and of her own authority, to combine them by a new settlement essentially different from the separate tailzies on record; and the last deed has never yet been recorded in the proper register.

"On mature consideration of the change which that deed made upon the titles on record, and under which Mrs Montgomerie was possessing, I am now satisfied that the settlement of 1774 must be considered as a new entail, which was ineffectual against onerous third parties without registration in the Record of Tailzies; and therefore I concur with Lord Moncreiff in his opinion, that the sales to Mr Paterson's trustees must be sustained.

"Farther, I am of opinion that his Lordship's exposition of the resolute clause is well founded, and that the plea of the heir on that point is not maintainable."

The Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle) declined judging in the case.

At advising on 16th July 1841,

Lord President.—In this case the opinions of the consulted Judges are in favour of the action brought by Lord Eglinton, maintaining that he has power to sell, and I am of the same opinion.

Lord Gillies.—I also concur with the consulted Judges, and for the same reasons, which it is therefore unnecessary for me to recapitulate.

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree in opinion with the consulted Judges; but I think it right to say, that in regard to Skelmorlie I do so on the view that the new entail uniting the estates was not sanctioned by the Statute. For if I thought it was authorised by the Statute, I should have much difficulty in thinking that the estate of Skelmorlie could be disentailed, i. e. taken out of the old entail, or that the making of a new entail, authorised by the Statute, could supersede the old one, until that new entail was fully completed by registration in terms of the Statute. In this view the new entail was no contravention. It was not reducible at all. It was equally valid without as with prescription. If it could have the effect of taking the estate of Skelmorlie out of the old entail at all, before it was itself registered, it must have done so instantly on infestment being taken upon it: Nor should I think it very hazardous to hold, that infestment on a new entail authorised by a Statute of this kind, could supersede the old entail before it was recorded. It is said it produced the effect by prescription. But if it was valid without prescription, what better could prescription make it? Prescription may make an invalid deed, made in contravention, valid, and so extinguish an entail. But when a deed is valid in itself, I don't see how prescription can make it better. I rather conceive, therefore, that if the Statute authorised the making of the new entail of Skelmorlie, it must either have the effect, that as soon as this new entail was constituted by infestment, the old one was gone, or that, by the Statute, the old one stood valid until the new one was completed by registration.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur in the opinion of the consulted Judges, and on the ground there stated, that the deed 1774 must be considered as an original substantive entail, and that that deed, which was never entered in the Register of Tailzies, "is not effectual against creditors or purchasers, and therefore cannot affect the validity of the contracts of sale between the Earl of Eglinton and the purchasers and suspenders." According to this view, it is a matter of indifference whether the union of the new and old estates in one entail was authorised by the Statute or not. For even if it had, still, if the effect of such union, with the appropriate clauses, was to create a new entail, the registration of that deed must have been necessary to give it effect against creditors, unless the Statute had contained an express dispensation from that form, which it certainly does not.

The consulted Judges not having decided the declaratory conclusions of the summons, to the effect that the pursuer "has the sole and exclusive right to the price or prices, or other consideration, as his absolute property, and that he has full power to use and dispose of the same at pleasure," the Court ordered additional cases on this "reserved question," to be boxed to the whole Judges for their opinions.

Pleaded by the pursuer.—

An heir of entail, so far as he remains unfettered, is entitled to exercise all the rights of a fee-simple proprietor. In the present instance, it has been found that he is entitled to sell, while there is no express clause in the entail declaring that he shall be bound to reinvest the price in other lands. The conclusion seems inevitable, that he is under no obligation so to reinvest it. A prohibition against selling does not create a full and perfect obligation inter hæredes. If it did, the substitutes would be entitled to enforce it by interdict or inhibition. It was once thought that this could be done; but the contrary has been long settled. This shows that the law does not consider a prohibition as equivalent to a full obligation, but regards the substitutes as creditors, only to the limited effect of preventing gratuitous alienations to their prejudice. The rights of all parties interested in an entail, and the remedies competent in case of contravention, can only be ascertained by the provisions of the entail itself. There is no room for implication; and therefore, without an express provision for reinvestment, it is incompetent to insist for it. Besides, it is impossible to say what the intention of the entailor would have been in the event which has happened. His intention undoubtedly was, that the estate should not be sold; but now that it has been sold, it is impossible to say what he would have wished to have been done with the price. For any thing that appears to the contrary, he might have wished the heir in possession to keep it to himself. It is argued, that it was the duty of the pursuer to have completed the entail of 1774 by recording it. A similar argument proved unsuccessful in the Queensberry case; and it is sufficient to observe, that there is nothing in the deed imposing it as a duty on the heir in possession to record it. He is merely enjoined to make up his title under the entail, and possess on no other. This injunction he has strictly complied with. A distinction has been attempted to be drawn between the right and the power of the pursuer to sell, but this appears to be a mere verbal subtlety arising from the double meaning of the word right. In the strict legal sense in which it is used in the present summons, it means nothing more than the jus disponendi. To adjudicate upon moral rights as distinguished from legal, is not the province of a civil court. Besides, the point now under discussion is no longer open, having been settled in the pursuer's favour by a series of decisions, particularly those of Ascog and the Marquis of Queensberry's Executors.

Pleaded by the defenders—

The question here is, whether, when an entail is perfect in all its clauses, but is unrecorded, the heir in possession not only has the power to make an effectual sale, but is freed from all obligations whatever to the substitute heirs in regard to the price. Should this question be determined affirmatively, it will be in strong opposition to what has hitherto been considered the law, and to many former decisions. There is this very important distinction between the present case and that of Ascog—that the latter entail laboured under a defect which there was no means of curing. The entail necessarily remained such as the entailor had made it; and the consequence was, that any reinvestment of the price must have been nugatory, as the lands purchased with it must have been entailed in the same defective form as before. This legal inconvenience or absurdity plainly modified the whole argument. Here, however, there is no defective entail which cannot be rendered perfectly efficacious. The omission to register may be supplied at any time, and the entailed estate thus secured from further alienation. It is true the case of the Queensberry Executors related to an unrecorded entail; but there were specialties in it sufficient to restrict the decision, and deprive it of a general character. It seems impossible to deny that the fetters of an unrecorded entail are sufficient to constitute a personal obligation upon the heir in possession. 1. An unrecorded entail, though ineffectual against onerous third parties, will operate so as to irritate the right of an heir who has contravened. 2. An unrecorded entail is effectual to set aside gratuitous deeds granted in contravention. These principles, when fairly followed out, lead to consequences inconsistent with the pursuer's conclusion to have it declared that he has not only power to sell, but is absolute master of the price.

The following opinions were returned:

Lord Moncreiff, concurred in by Lords Meadowbank, Medwyn, Cockburn, Cuninghame and Ivory:

"Observing that the summons of declarator contains an express conclusion to have it found, in case it shall be held that the pursuer has power to make an effectual sale of the estate, that he is at full liberty to dispose of the price, and that the heirs of entail have no good legal claim against him to reinvest it; and further observing, that both in the case of Ascog and in the case of Thomson, referred to in the joint minute, judgment was given on such a conclusion—I am satisfied that the parties are entitled now to ask a judgment of the Court on that question.

"And I am of opinion, that, on the basis of the opinion already delivered, holding the entail 1774 to be the regulating title, and that that entail never having been recorded, the contract of sale concluded by the pursuer is effectual to the purchasers suspenders, the heirs of entail have no legal claim to compel the pursuer to reinvest the price in other lands, and that he cannot be prevented from freely disposing of it. The case in this point appears to me to be ruled by the principle on which the House of Lords decided the three cases of Ascog, Bruce and the Marquis of Queensberry.

"It is true that the case is not identical in its facts with the case of Ascog. In that case the failure of the entail, and the power to sell effectually, notwithstanding the most express prohibition, arose from a defect in the irritant and resolute clauses. And the case of Bruce was the same. But the principle of judgment was, that the object of the entailor having been solely to make an effectual entail of the specific estate under the Act 1685, if that object failed, the Court could not interpose to give the heirs a remedy not provided by the deed, or to constitute entails of other estates to which the entailor's deed had no reference. The difference in the present case is, that the entail has become ineffectual to prevent sales, in consequence of the express provision of the Statute 1685 for the registration of all such tailies not having been observed. But though there is a difference in this point, it appears to me that the principle which decided those cases distinctly applies to this case. The Court cannot give to the heirs of entail a remedy by personal action which the entail has not provided; and, according to the doctrine held in the House of Lords, the Court have no authority to order the investment of the money in any other estate to be entailed.

"But it farther appears to me, that the identity of these cases in principle has also been decided by the House of Lords. The three cases of Stewart v. Fullerton, Bruce v. Bruce, and the Marquis of Queensberry v. the Queensberry Executors, were all before the House of Lords at the same time, and are reported as decided on the same day, 16th July 1830; (4 W. and S., 196). And it is impossible for me to read the very careful opinions of Lord Eldon upon those cases, confirmed by the opinions of Lord Wynford and the Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, without thinking that they were all held to depend on the same principles: They are accordingly so understood in the note of a very accurate person, Mr James Chalmer, annexed to that volume of the reports. But in the case of Queensberry there was no failure in the clauses of the entail. The thing objected to was a lease, so granted, that according to the previous judgments, it was in contravention of the entail. But the entail had not been recorded; and it was held, that on that account the lease was effectual to the third party, and could not be reduced. From the nature of the case, there could not be any claim for reinvestment specifically; but the heir of entail brought an action of damages against the Duke of Queensberry's Executors, on the ground of his personal obligation to observe the conditions of the entail; and a majority of this Court, on principles similar to those on which they had decided the case of Ascog, sustained the action. But the House of Lords, at the very same moment when they reversed the judgment in Ascog, reversed also that in the case of Queensberry. The summons in the case of Ascog contained a conclusion for damages as well as for reinvestment. But the important matter is, that Lord Eldon, in delivering his judgment on the case of Queensberry, distinctly resumes what had been done in Ascog, and draws from it the principle on which the case of Queensberry should be also determined. That principle I apprehend to be, that the entail having failed of its purpose from any particular cause, the Court cannot give a remedy which the entailor has not provided. The claim for reinvestment of the price upon a sale truly resolves into a claim of damages, to be satisfied in a specific form. And now, in the present case, the fact which occurs is, that the estate is sold, and the object of the entail at an end. The entail not recorded is no entail against third parties. And the question is just the same with that which arose in Ascog and Bruce, whether the Court can give a remedy which is not provided by the deed of entail, and whether they have any authority to constitute an entail of a different estate. I am of opinion that the same judgment necessarily follows."

Lord Murray :

"The summons of declarator at the instance of the Earl of Eglington sets forth, that he is entitled to sell the said lands and others 'as freely in all respects as if he were proprietor thereof in fee-simple,' and that it ought to be declared 'that he has full and undoubted power to dispose of these lands,' and 'that the defenders, or any of them, have no claim or demand against the pursuer.'

"I concurred in the opinion which I signed along with the other consulted Judges, that in consequence of the non-registration of the entail 1774, the pursuer was not effectually debarred from making a sale which would give a good right to a purchaser—but that it could not be declared by this Court that he had a right to sell the estate which he held by that title, or that he had power gratuitously to alienate or dispose of the lands.

"The question has since been argued, whether the heirs of entail can insist on his reinvesting the price in the purchase of lands. It appears to be fixed by the judgments in the House of Lords, in the cases of Ascog, Bruce, and Queensberry, according to the principles laid down in the case of Duntreath, that the rights of the parties interested in the deed, and the remedies in the case of contravention, can only be ascertained by what the deed itself contains, and that Judges are not at liberty to go out of it. The heirs are not therefore entitled, in this case, to insist that the price shall be laid out in land.

"There is a question, however, which may arise under other unrecorded entails, if not under this, what is the effect of an irritancy or act of contravention under a deed of entail which is complete in other respects, but not recorded? The Court, upwards of a century ago, decided, in the cases of Dorrater and Hall and Cassie (Fol. Dict. Vol. II. p. 436, M. 15,370), which have always been considered as fixing the law on that point, that an unrecorded deed of entail was effectual inter hæredes, though not against creditors and third parties who may make their claims good against the estate. In a subsequent judgment with regard to the estate of Dorrater (February 13, 1725, M. 15,554), the Court found that the heir of entail could not challenge rational provisions made to a wife and children before the decret or irritancy was pronounced; and in a judgment pronounced in the House of Lords (Shaw's Appeals, Vol. I., Agnew v. Stewart and Drew), where the question was very fully and repeatedly considered, the House of Lords decided that the estate was not affected by debts, unless in so far as they had been made real burdens prior to the infestment under the entail. It may be safely found in this case that there is no authority for vesting the price in other lands, or for entailing them, but it appears to me that the Court should abstain from using any terms in their judgment which might any way prejudice questions which might arise after a declaration of irritancy, or after this or any other similar entail was recorded."

Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.

The Lord Justice-Clerk not having been on the bench at the time of the original consultation, requested leave not to give an opinion on this subsidiary point.

At the final advising, 17th December 1841,

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree with Lord Moncreiff and the other consulted Judges. The case of Queensberry seems in point. In the case of Willison, it was found that a tailzie was good against heirs without registration. But after the case of Queensberry, we must hold, either that the decision is overruled altogether, or that, under that decision, an unregistered entail can operate against heirs only in terms of its own provisions directly; that is, by forfeiture, where there is room for forfeiture. In this way it may work, when the contravention is by contracting debt, or by partial alienation, leaving in the contravener the whole or a part of the estate to be forfeited. But when the alienation is total, the entail is gone. There is nothing left in the heir to forfeit, and there is nothing which can be sued for in terms of the entail. Damages or reinvestment of price under a similar entail cannot be sued for, because the entail says nothing of these. Such are the principles adopted by the House of Lords in the case of Queensberry; and to these I bow. Now, in this case, there is no conclusion not supported by these principles.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree in opinion with the consulted Judges, and with your Lordship. The Ascog case, and that of Bruce, differed from the present in one important particular. There were defects in the entail. The Ascog entail had neither resolute nor irritant clauses against sales, and the Balchristie entail had no resolute clause. And in the judgment delivered in those cases in the House of Lords, considerable weight is laid on the incongruity of reinvesting money on land to be entailed, when, by the very conditions of the argument, the lands so entailed might be sold the very day after. That observation does not apply to a case like the present, in which, as the entail is complete, the consequence may be prevented by registration. But, looking at the whole tenor of the judgments in those cases, it would appear that the circumstance was alluded to rather as an illustration of the principle, than as forming a condition or essential element of the principle itself. That, as clearly expressed in other parts of the judgment, was the necessary limitation of the rights or remedies sought by the heirs to the deed of entail itself, and the incompetency of raising up either the one or the other by implication, from the assumed consequences of the violation of the restrictions, on which consequences the deed was perfectly silent. Now, on this principle, I am unable to discover any essential difference between those cases and the present. In one view, it is more favourable to the application of the principle. In the cases like those of Ascog, the entail not containing in itself the means of securing the effect of the prohibition, there might be room for contending that the entailor contemplated the possibility of the ordinary common-law remedies being resorted to. But here the entail is complete,—the substitutes had the means of securing the observance of it by registration. Having failed to do so, the objection, that the remedy now sought is beyond the terms of the entail, is more clearly brought out. Accordingly, I observe that distinction was taken by some of the consulted Judges in the case of the Queensberry Executors. But the authority does not rest merely on the cases of Ascog and Balchristie. We have the case of the Queensberry Executors, decided, I believe, on the same day. That was the case of an unrecorded entail, in which damages were sought for the granting of a lease contrary to the prohibitions. There were some difficulties connected with the particular point of the damages. But that difficulty clearly formed no ground of the judgment. The report is very imperfect, and not very intelligible. But it is clear, both from the terms of it, and from the summary given by Mr Chalmer—a very competent authority on such a point—that the judgment truly went on the general principle recognised in the case of Ascog, and that the remedies available to heirs for the breach of restrictions, were confined to those provided by the deed and the Statute—a principle just as applicable to the case of a perfect entail unrecorded, as to an entail in itself imperfect.

Lord Gillies.—I concur entirely with the consulted Judges.

Lord President declined from relationship.

In consequence of the birth of the pursuer's son, Lord Montgomerie, before judgment was pronounced, it became necessary to make him a party. Mr Walter Cook, W.S., was accordingly appointed his curator ad litem, and having taken out the process to see, lodged a minute, stating, inter alia,

"That looking to the important interests which Lord Montgomerie has in the questions at issue, he had felt it proper, in the discharge of his duty, to take the advice of the Dean of Faculty (who had not previously been engaged as counsel in these conjoined processes), what course he ought to pursue as curator ad litem. That the opinion of counsel having concurred with that which he had himself formed, viz., that the case on the part of the heirs of entail had been most fully and ably argued in the papers already before the Court, and every plea urged which could be stated on their behalf, he considered it to be unnecessary to add to these papers any second pleading on the part of Lord Montgomerie;" "and that, adhering to the record as made up on the part of the heirs of entail, and to the pleadings lodged for them, he was willing that the cause should be disposed of whenever the Court may think proper."

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the deed of entail in 1774, must be considered as an original subetantive entail, and that not having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, it is not effectual against creditors or purchasers: Find that the sale concluded between the Earl of Eglinton and the suspenders, Paterson's trustees, was valid and unchallengeable: Therefore, repel the reasons of suspension, and find the letters orderly proceeded in the process of suspension at their instance, and decern; and in the action of declarator, find that the pursuer, the Earl of Eglinton, has full power to sell the whole lands in the said deed of entail, for onerous prices or considerations, and to grant valid dispositions to the several purchasers; and farther, find and declare, that upon the sales taking effect, the purchaser is under no obligation to employ or lay out the prices or sums arising from the said sales, or any part thereof, in the purchase of other lands, or otherwise to invest the same for the benefit of the defenders, or the other heirs of entail, and that the prices or considerations which the pursuer may receive, will become his absolute and exclusive property, and that he has full power to use and dispose of the same at pleasure, free from all claims whatever at the instance of the defenders, or the heirs of entail,—all in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons in the said action of declarator; and decern and declare accordingly."

NO. 90.—JOHN CAIRNS, Pursuer, v. JAMES MERRY and OTHERS, Defenders.

Process—Pursuer—Bankrupt—Cessio—Caution for Expenses—Circumstances in which a bankrupt pursuer was found not entitled to insist in an action without finding caution for the expenses of process; but in respect of caution being offered, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was recalled of consent.

In this action the following interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary:

"14th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, holds the trustees of the defender, James Merry, sisted as parties to this process, in terms of the minute given in for them; and in respect the original defender was dead at the date of the interlocutor of 9th November last, whereby the same was of non effect, and having formerly heard parties' procurators upon the second preliminary defence, and made avizandum,—In respect it is admitted by the pursuer, that, in the year 1835, he was rendered notour bankrupt, and was incarcerated by virtue of letters of caption; as also that, having thereafter instituted a process of cessio, he prosecuted the same, at all events, up to the point of obtaining therein a deliverance finding him entitled to the benefit of the cessio, and did accordingly execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of a trustee for behoof of his creditors; while, on the other hand, although it is alleged that the said disposition was never delivered to the said trustee, nor the said process of cessio followed out to the effect of obtaining decree of cessio, yet no evidence has been produced, either that the pursuer has been restored to a state of solvency, or that the said process of cessio has been abandoned or taken out of Court to the effect of reponing him in the full management of his affairs, or that the creditors called in said process have renounced their claims, or consented to his discharge, or in any respect departed from their right to insist that the disposition omnium bonorum should still be delivered for their behoof, and the process brought to a close in common form: Before further answer, and in hoc statu, Finds that the pursuer is not entitled to insist in the present action without finding caution for the expenses of process: Allows him fourteen days for that purpose; and, in the mean while, supersedes farther consideration of the cause.

"Note.—The pursuer, it is thought, has not placed himself in the same position relatively to his former creditors, which obtained a favourable deliverance on the question of caution in Young, 19th May 1836, and Johnston 4th June of the same year. He may still, no doubt, be able to show that the creditors have been settled with, or have otherwise departed from their debts, or at least from all purpose of proceeding thereon against him. He has not, however, done so hitherto; and, in the absence of all evidence to that effect, and with, to say the least, a process of cessio, in which these creditors were regularly convened, still in dependence, even if the presumption be not that he has been actually divested by the disposition omnium bonorum executed by him, it is thought the present is just one of those cases (See Hay 31st May 1834) in which it has been the practice of the Court to enforce the demand of caution where insisted in on the part of the defender.

"Taylor's case has no bearing on the question. It is in favour of a defender, not a pursuer, that the principle laid down in the House of Lords chiefly applies. Accordingly, since that decision, there have been many cases where bankrupt pursuers have been made to find caution.

"If it shall turn out that the pursuer's creditors are still entitled to insist in the process of cessio for delivery of the disposition omnium bonorum, whether to the original donee or to another substituted as their trustee in his stead—the objection will strike even deeper than the necessity of finding caution, as it will affect the title to pursue. See the different reports of Geddes, 11th June 1822, 18th July 1823, and 14th November 1829. This, however, is not at present insisted in, and has, accordingly, been saved for farther discussion by the terms of the interlocutor. But, to entitle the pursuer even to be heard in that question, it is thought that, in the circumstances in which he at present stands, he must, at all events, find caution in the first instance for the expense of process."

At advising a reclaiming petition, the Court, in respect that the party then offered to find caution, of consent recalled the interlocutor, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, reserving the question of expenses.

No. 91.—MRS ISABELLA WATSON DUNN, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM MATTHEWS, Defender.

Parent and Child—Aliment—Circumstances in which a party against whom a decree of divorce had been pronounced, was found liable to aliment each of two children of the marriage at the rate of £20 per annum.

The pursuer was married to the defender in March 1836, and continued to live with him in family until August 1838. At that time she was compelled to withdraw from his house, and to institute an action of divorce against him on the ground of adultery. On the 2d of July 1839, after a proof had been led in the usual way, decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer.

Two daughters were born of the marriage, and the present is an action at the instance of their mother, concluding for aliment at the rate of £20 per annum for the clothing, education, and subsistence of each of the children, from the date of the decree of divorce, until they shall respectively attain the age of ten years complete, and thereafter at the rate of £25, until they shall be able to maintain themselves.

The income of the defender was not very accurately ascertained, but it was averred by the pursuer to exceed £200, while he himself estimated it at about £100, besides his house.

It was observed by the Court, that in a case of divorce, the party was not in a situation to ask his children to live in family with him; and that, in awarding aliment, they must be regulated by his income at the time, leaving it to either party to apply for an alteration of the rate on the occurrence of any material change. In the meantime, the Court awarded £20 for each of the children; quoad ultra superseded, and found expenses.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 92.—JOHN COWDEN, Charger and Defender, v. JOHN LACHLISON, Suspender and Pursuer.

Trust, Latent—Reference to Oath—Construction—Process—Expenses—Circumstances in which an assignation, alleged to have been granted in trust, was found to be onerous and valid by the deposition of the assignee, to whose oath it had been referred; but no expenses found due.

In 1826, the suspender became bound, along with another party now deceased, in a bond of annuity for £20 to the late Andrew Bell and his wife. In 1831, Bell made over this bond to his grandson, by a deed of assignation ex facie, for the consideration of £100. Diligence was immediately thereafter raised upon the bond, but was not at that time proceeded in. Subsequently the cedent granted a discharge of the bond, on the ground that the assignation had been made without any consideration, and had been impetrated from him by fraud. The cedent died in 1837, and had been predeceased by his wife; whereupon the charger renewed his claim, and demanded payment of the annuity from Martinmas 1826 to Whitsunday 1837, with periodical interest thereon half yearly, amounting together to about £300. The present is a suspension of the charge given in 1831.

Pleaded for the suspender—1. The assignment in question having been obtained under false pretences, and on the understanding of a latent trust for the cedent, could not authorise the present charge. It is at all events, as having been fraudulently impetrated, reducible on the head of fraud. 2. Supposing the assignation valid in itself, yet as having the beneficial interest in it, Andrew Bell was entitled to discharge the bond of annuity, and did so effectually.

Pleaded for the charger—1. Andrew Bell having, by the assignation of the bond of annuity in favour of the charger, duly intimated to the debtors, been divested of all claim to the said annuity, had no right or title to execute a subsequent assignation or discharge of the said bond in favour of the suspender and William Bell. 2. No relevant statement of facts having been set forth by the respondent, and the facts which have been alleged as to the assignation having been improperly obtained, being untrue, and denied, that deed must be sustained as valid and effectual. 3. The said assignation being conceived in favour of the charger in absolute terms, and not as trustee for behoof of any party, it is not competent to establish the existence of any alleged trust, except by the writ or oath of the charger himself.

A relative action of reduction of the assignation having been brought, was conjoined with the suspension, and the following minute of reference to the oath of the charger and defender was sustained:

"It being admitted, that in the year 1826, the pursuer (and suspender) and the late William Bell, turner in Dumfries, granted a bond of annuity to the late Andrew Bell at Blackacre, Whether the writing, of which No. 29 of process is an extract, bearing to be an assignation to the defender (and charger) of the said bond of annuity, is not the deed of the said Andrew Bell?"

"The pursuer offers to prove by the oath of the defender, that the writing described in the issue, is not the deed of the said Andrew Bell. And the pursuer accordingly craves your Lordship to sustain the reference, and to ordain the defender to appear and depone thereon, and to answer all pertinent interrogatories."

The charger and defender accordingly compared before the Sheriff of Edinburgh on the 6th of December 1841, and deposed, That he was thirty-eight years of age; that he was a mason, and that, after the expiry of his apprenticeship in 1823, he had wrought as a journeyman, and occasionally on his own account: That in 1831 he had saved more than £40, but could not say whether he had £50: That he had gone on saving money, but could not say how much he had at the time of the assignation in 1831: That his grandfather did not mean to make him a present of the bond of annuity, but that he paid a price for it: That the deed of assignation was written by his instructions alone, and that on the day on which it was signed, he carried with him to his grandfather's the sum of £100: That the best part of that sum was his own: That he had more than £30 of his own, but could not say how much more: That he had more than £50, but could not say how much "for a few pounds." That he got the rest of the £100 from a friend, but did not grant any bill or voucher of any kind for the money advanced to him, and he repaid it a few months afterwards out of his earnings: That during these months he was working as a journeyman, and his wages were 18s. a-week: That he cannot say within what time he repaid the money—whether it was two years, twelve months, six months, three months, or one month: That his grandfather never told him he had granted a discharge of the bond; and that the reason why the diligence was not proceeded with in 1831 was, that he did not require the money at the time, and had left the place.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find the oath negative of the reference; and in the suspension find the letters orderly proceeded; and in the reduction assaizie the defender from the conclusions of the libel, and find no expenses due to either party."

Inhibition, Recal of—Expenses—Circumstances in which an inhibition was recalled, with expenses, except those applicable to a correspondence on the subject, which was deemed unnecessary.

The respondent brought an action against the petitioner, and used inhibition on the dependence. The action was dismissed on the ground of informality; and while the respondent was preparing to raise a new action, the petitioner called upon him to discharge the inhibition, and in about a week after, presented the present petition, praying the Court to recal the inhibition, and find the respondent liable in expenses.

The respondent admitted that he could not keep up the inhibition, since the action on the dependence of which it was raised had fallen; but he maintained that the present application was altogether uncalled for, as the petitioner's object might have easily been obtained in a different manner, unless, indeed, it were his object merely to accumulate expenses. He might have extracted the decree dismissing the action, and this would just have been a judicial discharge of the inhibition; or he might simply have enrolled the cause before the Lord Ordinary, and obtained his authority to have the inhibition scored in the register. This had accordingly been done by the respondent himself a few days after the petition had been served upon him, and the Lord Ordinary had actually pronounced an interlocutor, of consent of parties, holding the inhibition as discharged, and authorising the Keeper of the Register to mark it accordingly. In these circumstances, the respondent contended that the petition was unnecessary, and that he was entitled to his expenses.

The Court recalled the inhibition, and allowed the expenses of the application, with the exception of the expenses of a correspondence, which appeared unnecessary.

No. 95.—JAMES W. MACKENZIE, Petitioner.

Entail—Factor loco tutoris—Lease—Authority granted to the factor loco tutoris of a minor in possession of an entailed estate, to grant leases to endure for nineteen years—the next heir being abroad, and his agents declining in any way to interfere.

The petitioner, as factor loco tutoris to a minor who was the proprietor of an entailed estate, prayed for authority to let certain farms upon the estate for a period of nineteen years, instead of limiting the duration of the leases to the existence of the minority, on the ground that a full rent could not otherwise be obtained. Alongst with the petition was produced the report of a land-surveyor, who stated, that expensive improvements would require to be made by draining and otherwise, and that tenants possessed of the requisite capital would not undertake these under the risk of possessing for a shorter period than nineteen years. The next heir of entail was abroad, and his agents declined to interfere in any way as to the duration of the leases to be granted. In these circumstances the case was reported by Lord Ivory.

Lord Gillies.—I know a little of these matters, and am convinced that the surveyor's report is fair and accurate. If so, the interest of the next heir, and the minor now in possession, are perfectly identified. What is good for the one, is good for the other, and vice versa. If it is for the interest of the pupil that the leases be granted for nineteen years, it would be a very hard case if the next substitute, by merely declining to interfere, should have it in his power to prevent it. Before he could do so, I should think he would be bound to give reasons, and show that he was not declining from mere whim or caprice. It is true the pupil may die the next year, but what then? If the lands have been well let for nineteen years (and it appears they cannot be well let for a shorter period), the transaction will just prove as beneficial to him as it would have done to the pupil if he had survived. Still, if the next heir will give reasons, we will listen to them, and if good, give effect to them; but I think we cannot listen to mere opposition or declinature unaccompanied with reasons.

Lord Mackenzie.—There are here two distinct points. The one is, that the proprietor being a minor, the factor cannot let the lands on a lease to endure beyond the minority. The law unfortunately is, that the factor's powers do not authorise him to let such leases; but there can be no doubt whatever that we can give him the necessary authority. The other point is the heir's right to interfere. I don't think that the fact of his being an heir of entail makes any difference, unless, indeed, there were some clause in the entail itself preventing such leases from being granted. In that case, we would be obliged to give effect to it; but there does not appear to be any thing of the kind; and I am therefore clear that we ought to grant the prayer of the petition.

The Lord President and Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court granted the petition.

No. 96.—JOHN GRAHAM CAMPBELL, Petitioner, v. The PARLIAMENTARY TRUSTEES for the HEIRS of ENTAIL of SHIRVAN, Respondents.

Entail—Act of Parliament, Sale of Entailed Lands, and Application of the Price, under—Clauses in a private Act of Parliament held to import, that the heir of entail in possession was not entitled to receive the interest of the money arising from the sale of certain parts of the entailed estate as a surrogatum for the rents, until the prices of the lands purchased equalled those of the lands sold, exclusive of the expenses.

In 1813, the late Archibald Graham Campbell, the petitioner's father, obtained an Act of Parliament, entitled, "An Act for vesting certain parts of the lands and hereditaments comprised in a deed of entail made by Archibald Campbell, late of Shirvan, deceased, in trustees, to sell the same, and invest the money arising by such sale in the purchase of other lands or hereditaments, to be settled and secured to the same series of heirs, and under the same conditions and limitations as are contained in the said deed of entail." The preamble states, that "it would be greatly for the benefit and advantage of the said Archibald Graham Campbell, the heir of entail in possession, as well as the other heirs of entail who may hereafter become entitled to the possession," that certain parts of the estate should be sold for the best prices that can be gotten for them, and "that the money arising from such sale or sales should be laid out and invested in the purchase of other lands and estates, as near to the other parts of the estate of Shirvan," and settled under the same fetters; and in the body of the Act, power is given to trustees to complete the sales, and execute the necessary dispositions, on the prices being paid by the purchasers at the Bank of Scotland, under the direction, and by the authority of the Court of Session, and in names of the trustees,

"to yield and carry the highest rate of interest that can be obtained for the same; and the interest arising from the money so paid in, shall be laid out in the names of the said trustees, and shall annually accumulate and be added to the principal sum itself, to carry interest together, until a proper purchase or purchases can be found and approved of, wherein to reinvest the same in manner hereinafter mentioned."

It is also enacted, that the Court of Session shall, on the summary application of the trustees, order the treasurer of the bank,

"in the first place, out of the monies so paid," "to pay all the costs, charges and expenses which have been or shall be incurred in and about the applying for, obtaining and passing this Act, and in making the sales hereby authorised, and in all proceedings and management in order or relative thereto, and in making and completing the purchases hereinafter directed and authorised to be made, and in the execution of all and every the trusts and purposes of this Act;" and that the trustees "may and shall, as occasion may arise, contract for the purchase of other lands, tenements and hereditaments, as near to the bulk of the said estate of Shirvan as can be procured to the extent of the free fund arising from the prices received upon the aforesaid sales, or as near the same as may be; and after the purchase or purchases thereof, the same shall be, with the approbation of the said Court of Session, disposed and conveyed to the same series of heirs of entail, and under the same conditions," &c.

The price of the purchases so made and approved are to be paid

SCOTTISH JURIST.

"out of the monies to be invested as aforesaid;" "and if the money arising by the principal and accumulated interest of the monies so invested shall then exceed the amount of the original money so invested as aforesaid, then and in that case only the said surplus which shall remain after discharging the expense of the application to the Court shall be paid to the person or persons respectively, who would have been entitled to receive the rents and profits of the lands so directed to be purchased in case the same had been purchased pursuant to this Act, or to the representatives of such person or persons."

It is farther enacted, that in the meantime, until the sales of the lands vested in the trustees in fee-simple for that purpose are completed, these lands shall "be held, possessed and enjoyed with all and sundry the same powers, liberties, privileges and faculties which, by the deed of entail before recited, are permitted and allowed, and the rents, duties, issues and profits thereof, to be received and taken by and for the use and benefit of the said Archibald Graham Campbell, and the person who is heir of entail in possession for the time, and who would have been entitled to the said rents, duties, issues and profits, in case this Act had not been passed."

The trustees under the Act, in 1815, sold lands to the amount of £31,400, and in 1819, feu-duties to the amount of £1700,—thus realising for the whole subjects authorised to be sold the sum of £33,100. In 1815 they made two purchases—one for £10,821. 8s. 4d., and another for £12,962. 4. 9. In 1818, they made a purchase for £6448. 2. 8., and in 1829, another for £626. 3. 9.,—making the total amount of purchases £30,857. 18. 6. The price of the lands sold thus exceeded that of the lands purchased by £2242. 1. 6. The expenses of obtaining the Act, and of subsequent management, amounted to £2020. 10s. 1d., which, if deducted from the lands sold, reduced the surplus to £221. 10. 5. But in addition to this surplus, there had been an accumulation of interest on the prices obtained for the lands sold to the amount of £2358. 17. 6. This sum, together with the above surplus, still remained in bank in the names of the trustees. In these circumstances, this petition was presented by John Graham Campbell, the heir of entail in possession, praying the Court

"to appoint the said trustees to pay over to the petitioner the balance in their hands, or at their credit in their account with the Bank of Scotland, consisting of the accumulated interest upon the prices of the lands and others sold under the authority of the Act of Parliament; and further, to ordain them to make payment of the expense of this application out of the balance of the capital of said prices still remaining undisposed of, and to decern accordingly."

In support of the petition he pleaded—That in the provisions above quoted, there was nothing contrary to its prayer, and that to apply the interest in question to the purchase of lands and payment of costs, would just be to carry off part of the profits properly belonging to him as the heir in possession, and of which the Act itself expressly declared that it was not its intention to deprive him. As an authority a fortiori in support of his claim, he referred to the case of the Earl of Stair, 19th June 1827; 2 Wilson and Shaw, and also to the case of Wilson v. Wilson, Paul and others, 11th July 1833.

Answers were lodged by the trustees, who stated, that though they had no wish to oppose the petition, they were unable to adopt the petitioner's interpretation of the Act. On the contrary, the meaning appeared to them to be, that the heir in possession was only to receive the difference between the money originally deposited in Bank, and the ultimate accumulation of principal and interest, as the same should be ascertained at the final winding up of the proceeding. If, after paying the prices of the lands purchased and all the expenses, "the money arising by the principal and accumulated interest of the monies so invested, shall exceed the amount of the original money so invested, then, and in that case only," the surplus should go to the heir; but, on the other hand, if the principal and accumulated interest, after deducting the expenses, did not exceed the price of the original sales, the heir in possession should have no claim. The case of the Earl of Stair was an authority adverse to the petitioner. The decision of that case turned upon the want of any provision for accumulation; whereas here the provision is full and explicit.

At advising,

Lord Gillies.—I think the matter is decided by the clause of the Act—"if the money arising by the principal and accumulated interest of the monies so invested shall exceed the original money so invested as aforesaid, then and in that case only" the surplus shall be paid to the heir in possession. I can't get over this clause; and unless the petitioner can show that the prayer of his petition falls under it (and this I think he cannot do), it must be refused.

Lord President.—I am afraid that is the only result which we can come to. It is clear that if the price of the lands purchased had just amounted to the definite sum obtained for the lands sold, with a deduction merely sufficient to cover the expenses, the purpose of the Act would have been accomplished, and the trust would have come to an end. But what happens? Certain purchases are made, and then in 1826 there is a payment of £1389. 5. 6. to account of expenses. At this time the trustees had not fulfilled their duty, for a sum of money still remained in their hands, which they were bound to lay out in farther purchases, and accordingly another purchase is made so late as 1829, to the amount of £626. The trust was thus going on—I don't say in violation of the Act, but in a manner which led to a considerable accumulation. Now there is a clause expressly providing for the mode in which this accumulation is to be dealt with. Certain lands are authorised to be sold, and others are to be purchased to the extent of the price obtained. These purchases are still short of that price, and I agree with Lord Gillies, that the section which he has quoted is fatal to the petitioner's claim. It is quite clear, both from that clause and from the whole scope of the Act, that the only case in which the heir can claim is, where there is a surplus remaining after lands have been purchased, at a price equal to that for which the other lands had been sold.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have the same opinion, though I would very willingly have a different one. It is hard for the heir in possession to lose the rents in this way. But the Act expressly provides that the price obtained for the lands should be lodged in the bank, and that the interest arising from it should "annually accumulate, and be added to the principal sum itself, to carry interest together," until a proper purchase could be found "wherein to reinvest the same." It is obvious that on the petitioner's assumption—that the heir in possession was to draw the interest as a surrogatum for the rents of the lands sold,—this provision would be without an object, since in that case there could be no accumulation. The clause relating to reinvestment may have two meanings, but it does not seem to admit of three. It may mean, either that the whole principal and interest were to be vested in new purchases, or it may mean that the principal only was to be so vested; but this last is certainly the very least that it can mean. Whatever should happen, the plain intention of the Act was, that the sum expended on new purchases should not be less than that obtained for the lands sold. Then what does the Act say with regard to the expenses? It does not say that they are to be paid out of the principal sum, but out of the "monies" (not money) paid in to the bank, i. e., both the principal and interest. Then another clause declares that the purchases to be made by the trustees were to be "to the extent of the free fund arising from the prices received;" and last of all, the clause quoted by Lord Gillies, expressly declares, that "if the money arising by the principal and accumulated interest shall exceed the amount of the original money," "then and in that case only," the surplus shall go to the heir in possession. If the Act supposed that the expenses of every kind were to be taken out of the principal, what meaning can be given to this word if. The meaning obviously is, that the accumulated fund was to be made liable, in the first instance, both for the original principal sum and the expenses; and it was only in the event of its leaving a surplus over both of these that the Act gives any claim to the heir. In the present case there is no such surplus, as the accumulated fund, under deduction of the expenses, does not exceed the price obtained for the lands sold. If there had been no provision in the Statute as to accumulation, the heir's claim to the interest, as a surrogatum for the rents, could not well have been disputed; but as the provision, though rather unusual, forms part of the Act, I do not see how it can receive any other interpretation than that which your Lordships have given to it.

The Court refused the petition.

No. 97.—THE GLASGOW and SHIP BANK and SIR WILLIAM FORBES and COMPANY, Raisers, v. ALEXANDER STRUTHERS (Craig's Trustee), and the COMMERCIAL BANK of SCOTLAND, Claimants.

Bankrupt—Sequestration—Competition—Bank—Mandate—Letter of Credit—In a competition between the trustee of a sequestrated bankrupt and a bank, for the proceeds of a letter of credit, "payable after the 7th" by another bank,—the bank having cashed the letter on the 2d, on the holder's indorsation, and the sequestration having been awarded on the 6th—Held that the bank was to be preferred.

On the 1st July 1839, William McGavin, agent in Dundee for John Craig, paid into the branch of the Glasgow Ship Bank at Kirkcaldy the sum of £1528. 2s. 4d., and obtained from George Anderson, the agent there, the following letter of credit on Sir William Forbes and Company:

"£1528. 2. 4.

Glasgow and Ship Bank, Kirkcaldy, 1st July 1839.

"GENTLEMEN,—After the 7th inst., please to honour the drafts of Mr John Craig to the extent of fifteen hundred and twenty-eight pounds 2s. 4d., on account of the Glasgow and Ship Bank Company. I am, Gentn., your most obedient Servant."

(Signed) "G. ANDERSON, Agent."

(Addressed) "SIR WM. FORBES and Co., Edinburgh."

On the 2d July, Robert M. Craig, son of John Craig, presented the letter of credit at the agency of the Commercial Bank at Leith, and obtained cash for it, minus the discount, amounting to £1. 0. 10., on indorsing it "pr. pron. of John Craig—Robt. M. Craig." The same day, R. M. Craig lodged in his own name, in the hands of Mr James Balfour, the agent for the Wine Company of Scotland, the sum of £2500, being the proceeds of the letter of credit and certain other sums. On the 6th of July (the 7th being Sunday) the letter was presented to Sir William Forbes and Company, who declined to make payment, on the ground of their not being in safety to do so in consequence of an application having been previously made for sequestration of John Craig's estates under the Bankrupt Act. On the same day (6th July) sequestration was awarded. At this date, the sum remaining in Mr Balfour's hands was £2250—R. M. Craig having two days before (4th) drawn £250. On the 17th July, Mr Paul, manager of the Commercial Bank, addressed the following letter to R. M. Craig:

"SIR,—Having reference to the statement made by you, that the £1528. 2. 4., being the proceeds of the letter of credit on Sir William Forbes and Company which you cashed with our agent at Leith, are still in your hands, we require of you to keep the money in your possession, as unless we are paid the money we advanced, we hold you liable for the transaction. I am," &c.

On the 19th, R. M. Craig paid over the sum of £2004. 19. 10. to Mr Alexander Struthers, then the interim factor, now trustee, on Mr John Craig's estate, on obtaining the following letter:

"As interim factor for Mr Craig's creditors, I am very anxious to have deposited in the bank all the money that is available; and as you have some hesitation to pay me the £2004. 19. 10. in your care, lest you should be put to trouble and expense by other parties for so doing, I hereby engage to free and relieve you from any law expenses that you may incur by paying over to me for the creditors the above sum, and also guarantee you for any risk you may incur of being called upon to pay the money a second time. I am," &c.

At a meeting of John Craig's creditors on 2d January 1840, the claim of the Commercial Bank to be preferred for the amount of the letter of credit was discussed, when the majority of those present recommended that the trustee should indorse the letter of credit to the bank, and enable them to obtain payment. The recommendation was not adopted, and in consequence the present multiplepounding was raised by the Glasgow and Ship Bank and by Sir William Forbes and Company, in which the trustee claimed to be preferred, and Pleaded—1. By virtue of the said sequestration, and decret of adjudication and confirmation, the claimant Alexander Struthers, as trustee foresaid, has acquired right to the said sum of £1528. 2. 4., and interest due thereon. 2. The letter of credit founded on not being transferable, no right was conveyed to the bank by the alleged blank indorsement by Robert M. Craig. 3. As the sum mentioned in the letter of credit did not become due to Mr Craig till the 7th July 1839, and as Mr Craig's estates were sequestrated on the 6th, the said sum being part of his estate, became the property of the general body of the creditors. 4. The alleged proceedings at the meeting of creditors of 2d January 1840, are no bar to the claimants' insisting in the present claim.

The Commercial Bank pleaded—1. The claimants having advanced the amount stated in the letter of credit in the circumstances set forth, are exclusively entitled to the fund in medio, in respect that from the date of such advances, they came to have the only real and substantial interest therein, and that the holders thenceforward were in possession of the funds for their sole behoof. 2. The claimants ought to have received payment of the fund in medio when payment of the amount was demanded from Sir William Forbes and Company on 6th July, and having been wrongfully refused payment, are now entitled to be preferred to the fund. 3. The resolution of the creditors, at their meeting of 2d January 1840, is binding on them as a body, and excludes the trustee under the sequestration from claiming the fund in medio, and neither he nor the parties whose names are associated with him in the opposing claim, have any right, title, or interest, in and to the fund. 4. Mr John Craig, or the trustee on his sequestrated estate, having already received payment of the amount contained in the said letter of credit, and entered the same to the credit of Mr MacGavin, by whom the amount was remitted, his creditors have no longer any right or claim to the said fund; and as Mr Craig himself could not have claimed the amount in competition with the claimants, his creditors are in no better situation. 5. The claimants having advanced the amount of the fund in medio to Mr Craig, any right or interest which remained in him after the date of such advance, was in the character of trustee for their behoof, and such right or interest could only be attached by his creditors, subject to the latent equity in the claimants. 6. The advances made by the claimants on 2d July, having been set apart by Mr Robert M. Craig, and being still in his hands at the date of the sequestration, and the interim factor and trustee, for behoof of the creditors, having thereafter received the same in the manner stated, is excluded from claiming the fund in medio in competition with the claimants. 7. At all events, the claimants are entitled to demand repayment of the amount of these advances from Mr R. M. Craig, supposing the legal right to the fund in medio not to be in them but in the creditors of Mr Craig, and in this situation the claimants ought to be preferred to the creditors, seeing that in that event they are bound in relief to Mr R. M. Craig.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the claims of the respective claimants, and thereafter considered the whole process and productions, sustains the claim of the Commercial Bank, and prefers them to the fund in medio; Repels the claim of the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Mr John Craig, and decerns: Farther, finds no expenses due to either party.

"Note.—The competitors in the present multiplepounding respectively claim a large sum, contained in a letter of credit, addressed by the agent for the Glasgow Bank at Kirkcaldy to Sir William Forbes and Company, as the agents for that bank in Edinburgh. That letter was transmitted to Mr John Craig, recently before his failure, by Mr M'Gavin of Dundee, who owed him a corresponding balance. It was dated at Kirkcaldy on 1st July 1839, and in the usual style of such letters, the Kirkcaldy Bank requested Sir William Forbes and Company to honour the drafts of Mr Craig to the amount specified, on or after the 7th of July. The agent for the Commercial Bank at Leith gave Mr Craig full value for the amount of this credit on the 2d of July, on delivery of the letter of credit, with a blank indorsement by Robert Mark Craig 'per procurator' of his father, Mr John Craig. As the 7th of July 1839 fell on a Sunday, the bank presented the letter to Sir William Forbes and Company for payment early on the forenoon of Saturday the 6th July, but payment was then refused, on the ground that, by that time, an application had been presented for sequestration of Mr Craig's estate. It appears that the sequestration was not actually issued at that moment, but it certainly was awarded soon after, and Sir William Forbes and Company have brought the present process to determine the claims of the bank and of the trustee for Mr Craig's creditors to the sum specified in the said letter. The Lord Ordinary has preferred the Commercial Bank on the following grounds:—

"1. If the letter of credit be subject to no objection on the stamp-laws, the claim of the Commercial Bank in that view was, it is apprehended, complete, by the delivery and indorsement to them of the letter of credit for full value received.

"The transaction here is somewhat different from that which would have occurred if Mr Craig had given an ordinary check on a banker holding his funds and payable on demand. On the day that he delivered and indorsed for value the letter of credit to the Commercial Bank, he had no money in Sir William Forbes and Company's hands. He held an order on them to pay him a certain sum on a future day, and when he gave up and indorsed that order to another party for value, it is apprehended that he was thus divested of all legal and equitable interest in the obligation.

"It is assumed by the trustee in his argument, that the letter of credit was not transferable, but the Lord Ordinary is not aware on what authority that proposition is maintained. The case is totally different from those in which letters of credit are given by parties to friends, to make discretionary advances to another on a personal introduction, as exemplified in the case of Philips and Melville, Fac. Coll., 21st February 1809. The document here was a mandate to receive money de futuro in payment of a debt, and there is no reason or principle to prevent the holder of such a voucher from raising money on it for full value in the ordinary course of the trade. Even in the case of money or debts presently exigible, it is laid down by Mr Bell (Vol. II. p. 20), 'that money due by open account may either be conveyed by assignation, or by draft, order, or bill of exchange;' and he adds, 'that book debts may be conveyed by indorsement, to the effect of authorising the assignee to bring an action—the indorsement in such case being held as a mandate or letter directing payment to any factor or servant, and it does not require a stamp.—Laurie v. Perry Ogilvie, Fac. Coll., 6th February 1810.

"In England, also, it appears to be quite settled, that such delivery to a creditor would give the party receiving it a special lien over the fund, preferably to the creditors and assignees on bankruptcy of the assigner. Thus, in the case of Yeats v. Grove, in 1791, 'the holder of a note gave it up, on receiving an order to be paid out of a certain purchase-money of the debtor's property. It was not accepted; but purchaser verbally agreed to give the holder notice to attend when the deeds and money were ready. He did attend accordingly, but before the business was over, drawer was arrested, and soon after a bankrupt. It was determined by Lord Thurlow, Chancellor, that the holder had a lien, the order not being in contemplation of bankruptcy, though he knew drawer to be insolvent at the time.'—1 Vesey, jun., 280. There was an earlier determination to the same effect by Lord Hardwick, in the case of Roe v. Dawson, in 1749 (1 Vesey, p. 331.)

"II. It is objected, however, that the obligation or mandate now in question, when indorsed and transferred by the original holder, required intimation, in order to complete the right of the assignee; and it is added, that a sequestration took place before there was any intimation here to Sir William Forbes and Company; but it is apprehended that this plea is neither well-founded in law or in fact in the circumstances of the present case. In the first place, the Lord Ordinary conceives, that this was not a case which required intimation to complete the right of an onerous assignee for value. The letter of credit here was a mandate by a bank on their agents in Edinburgh, to pay money to a party on a definite day afterwards. That mandate gave a complete right to Mr Craig to draw the money, without any further intimation to the agent in Edinburgh than the bank itself would give; and in like manner, if Mr Craig was not precluded from transferring the mandate, it is rather thought that the indorsee or assignee did not require to intimate it till the day the money was due, as payment could only be made to the party who presented the draft.

"In the next place, however, it is hardly disputable here, that sufficient intimation was actually made of the Commercial Bank's right to Sir William Forbes and Company, in time to secure the preference of the former, in a question with the trustee in the sequestration. For, it is conceived to be clear, upon the statement in the 5th article of the condensation for the bank, and from the trustee's answer thereto, that the letter of credit was presented to Sir William Forbes and Company by the Commercial Bank, at a period of the day, on the 6th of July, prior to any deliverance on the application for Mr Craig's sequestration. The distinct allegation of the bank on this point is not met with any explicit denial on the part of the trustee, which he should have given upon a matter of fact which he could have ascertained at any time, by due inquiry at the respectable house in this city to whom the letter of credit was addressed.

"But still farther, the formal protest taken by the Commercial Bank, at a subsequent period of the day of sequestration, would be sufficient to secure the preference of the bank, according to the Statute of Sequestration then in force. This was the Act of 1814, according to which an onerous assignee could secure his preference by intimation of his right, at any time before the trustee was vested by special conveyance in the moveable estate of the bankrupt. That point was settled in the case of Buchan v. Farquharson, 24th May 1797, Dict., p. 2905; and though a more comprehensive provision is made for vesting the personal rights of bankrupts in trustees under the last sequestration law, that of course cannot affect the present question.

"III. Even if the letter were held to be a document not transferable by indorsement, or if the document were viewed as objectionable on the want of stamp or otherwise, it is thought the preference of the Commercial Bank would be equally clear. In that case the money, after the bankruptcy of Mr Craig, would fall to be still held as deposited in the bank of Kirkaldy, at the credit of Mr M'Gavin, the original creditor. The extract from the books of the bank at Kirkaldy produced, show that Mr M'Gavin raised the necessary sum to purchase the letter of credit, by discounting a bill, and having thus got an adequate sum at his credit, he thereafter desired the bank agent to send the letter of credit to Mr Craig in payment of his debt. It is quite clear, from that mode of carrying through the transaction, that Mr M'Gavin's debt to Mr Craig is not discharged till this letter of credit is paid and retired. In an analogous case in England, it was found, that a debtor who sends a bank cheque in payment of an account is still liable in recourse, if the banker fail before payment of the cheque (Brown, 2 Bos. and Pal. 518.) Hence, if there was any invalidity in the letter of credit given by Mr M'Gavin to Mr Craig, the fund in medio must be held to be still vested in the person of Mr M'Gavin, —he would thus remain the debtor of Mr Craig till he could show that the money was paid.

"In this view, if there were any nullity in the letter of credit, the trustee would have to recur to Mr M'Gavin for payment of the sum which he now claims. But if the Commercial Bank can show that they have paid this very debt to Mr Craig, they would be entitled to interpell the trustee from demanding payment of this debt from the debtor. As the implied assignees of the original creditor, they would be entitled now to demand the money from Mr M'Gavin, and the trustee would be barred, both on the principles of law and common honesty, from demanding payment a second time of this, or any other old claim of the primary creditor. The whole principles of the bankrupt law are opposed to any such inequitable stretch of the trustee's rights.

"IV. Finally, the claim of the trustee in the present instance is thought to be less reasonable, as it appears that when R. M. Craig, junior, got cash on this letter of credit on 2d July, he did not mix it with his father's funds, but for some purpose (not explained) he placed it, and certain other sums which he received at the same time, in the hands of Mr Balfour, manager of the Wine Company, Edinburgh. This money remained deposited in Mr Balfour's hands till after the sequestration of Mr John Craig; and as R. M. Craig was bound, both in law and propriety, to warrant the validity of his transference by indorsement of the letter of credit, for which he had got full value, the Commercial Bank would have been entitled to recourse on him if the document was not negotiable, and the transference null. This seems to have been intimated to R. M. Craig, and he only consented to Mr Balfour giving up the money to the trustee on his guarantee to protect R. M. Craig against any claim from the bank. In this manner the trustee has truly got the contents of the letter of credit from R. M. Craig, while he seeks payment a second time from Mr M'Gavin's bankers. It is conceived to be clear that such a claim cannot be supported. For the present the Lord Ordinary has superseded the action brought against R. M. Craig till the issue of competition in this process."

Both parties reclaimed—the trustee on the merits, and the bank against the refusal of expenses.

At advising,

Lord Gillies.—After listening with all the attention in my power to the able and ingenious arguments of the bar, I am satisfied that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed. One of the trustee's pleas in law is, that by virtue of the sequestration, he acquired right to the sum in question. The answer to this is, that he got the money; and I think the answer is sufficient. It is clear, that in consequence of the letter of credit, he has received a sum of £2000, which is more than the claim in the multiplepoinding. Should the trustee, therefore, succeed in his claim, the effect will be a clear gain to the creditors of £1500. I am told this is an ordinary case. To me it seems a most extraordinary case of injustice. It is just a case of double payment. The trustee first gets the money, and he now claims to get it over again. This is the only view I can take of the matter, and the law must be clear indeed before I can give my consent to any thing so flagrantly unjust. The nature of a letter of credit is perfectly understood. Formerly, a party on going to a distance—to London for instance—got a bill; but now a letter of credit is universally adopted. It is precisely of the same nature as a draft or order. It always bears a term at which it is payable, and the number of days depends on the distance of the place. When drawn in London, the period is twenty days. A person leaves Edinburgh with such a letter in his pocket, and arrives in London in forty-eight hours after. The day of payment has not arrived, but still the letter of credit is just as good as cash. Perhaps he does not want the money till the day of payment expires, but if he does, he finds no difficulty in obtaining it, by putting his name upon the letter of credit, and so enabling the person who advances the money to fill it up, and make it an order payable to himself. That was exactly the case here; and the letter of Sir William Forbes and Company satisfies me that the custom of bankers is to pay in this way. The letter of credit was presented to them on Saturday; and it is clear, that if in practice it had not been held to be then due, the answer would have been, we cannot pay, for it is not due till Monday. Instead of this, they put their refusal entirely on the sequestration, which, they say, made it doubtful "if they could, or were in safety to pay."

Lord Mackenzie.—I have arrived at the same result, though perhaps not precisely on the same grounds. I am satisfied, in the first place, that a letter of credit is not transferable, and if made so, would be null for want of a stamp. It cannot be indorsed, so as to make it payable to the indorser himself as the proper party; but, on the other hand, I think that the indorsement, or putting of the name on the back, is a proper mode of explicating the draft so as to obtain payment. But I can't say I am so well satisfied, that when the draft is made payable on or after a certain date, it is in the power of the party previously to execute an order which shall be completely valid to confer a right to the holder to receive payment. Say a long period were to elapse before the day of payment,—a year, or a month,—and the party in right of the letter, the day after giving authority to a third party to draw the amount, to become bankrupt, would that be an effectual transfer in a question with his creditors? I doubt very much if it would. I suspect the authority is of no validity before the day of payment. There may, indeed, be no date expressed, but the earliest that can be supposed, is that on the face of the letter itself. But it is said, that by the practice of bankers, an order to pay on the 7th, if that proves to be a Sunday, is held to be an order to pay on the 6th. I am not in a condition to determine whether this is the practice or not. Were I disposed to go upon this ground, I would think it necessary to go into a proof; but I am rather inclined to go upon the other ground, that the letter was not paid to the bankrupt himself, but to his son. The son got the letter, and gave it to the Commercial Bank, from whom he received payment. Then he does not pay over the amount to the father, but keeps it as his own. The bank becoming doubtful if they could make the letter of credit available, call upon him to take it back, and refund to them. Was this incompetent? Undoubtedly not. He, however, instead of doing this, pays over the sum to the trustee on receiving a letter of indemnification. The effect of this is, that if he is liable to the bank, the trustee must refund. On that view, the trustee cannot in equity make a claim in the multiplepoinding.

Lord Fullerton.—I feel a considerable difficulty in this case, but after considering it as attentively as I can, I am inclined to concur in the view taken by the Lord Ordinary. I confess I am not much moved by the circumstance that the money was still in the hands of the son, as received from the Commercial Bank, and that the trustee, if successful, would be getting payment twice. That does not seem to be the legal ground on which the case is to be decided. For, if we are satisfied that the document was not available to transfer the right, the payment made by the bank would just be an advance; and in the circumstances, an advance on a bad security. The result is, not that the creditors receive payment twice, but receive payment once, and along with it other money that belonged to their debtor. Cases of this kind occur every day. Take the case of a debt which has been assigned for value, but before intimation is made, the creditor in the debt becomes bankrupt and is sequestrated. Could it be said, that because the money received for the assignment is still extant among their debtor's effects, the creditors, by claiming payment from the original debtor, are demanding double payment? They, in fact, get two sums, but the one which came through the assignee was just an advance on a bad security. But on looking at the document, I rather think that the claim of the Commercial Bank ought to be sustained. For what is the effect of the document? Both parties agree that it cannot operate as a bill. It is merely a mandate by the Glasgow Bank to Sir William Forbes and Company to honour drafts upon them to the amount contained in the letter. But from its very nature, the mandate can only be made effectual by the person who holds the document. When, therefore, the document was put into the hands of the Commercial Bank, it was just a mandate authorising them to draw the amount from Sir William Forbes. It was given for this very purpose. What, then, is the effect of such a mandate? Could it have been recalled at once by the creditors? It was not an ordinary gratuitous mandate, but a mandate for behoof,—the mandatory becoming procurator in rem suam. Such a mandate cannot be recalled. This mandate to draw money was not effectual without the document. The party in right of it wants money, and applies to the bank, who agree to advance on receiving the document. Is not this mandate irrevocable? Until the bank be made indemnitas, neither the bankrupt nor his creditors are entitled to recall the mandate, or maintain action for redelivery of the document. Then, if they can't get the document, how are they to get at the money? It is clear that Sir William Forbes will not pay without the document. The true question then is, could the trustee re-demand the letter of credit from the bank? On the ground stated, I am clear that he could not. The mandate which placed it in their hands is irrevocable, and in virtue of that mandate they are clearly entitled to keep it until their advance is fully repaid.

Lord President.—This is a question of considerable nicety, and I am not sure if it would not be desirable to take more time to consider it; but if I am to give my opinion now, I must say, that I concur in the view of the Lord Ordinary, though without meaning to adopt every thing contained in the four pages of his note. I am inclined to go on the grounds just stated by Lord Fullerton. In my view, there is nothing in the letter making it impossible to render it available before the date of payment. There is nothing in the stamp-laws to prevent the party in right of it to put it into the hands of another party, so as to constitute him the holder. Then the Commercial Bank were made the bona fide holders. They not only advanced the amount, but that very amount, after being deposited in the hands of the Wine Company, is afterwards paid over to the trustee. That identical sum is just the fund in medio in this multiplepoinding, and I cannot help thinking that the trustee, in again claiming it, is seeking something very like double payment. I go more, however, on the other ground taken by Lord Fullerton, that the bank now stand in the shoes of Craig, and hold a mandate which cannot be recalled, until made indemnitas for the advances made on the faith of it.

The Court adhered.

No. 98.—JOHN GRAHAM, Suspendor and Pursuer, v. HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF HAMILTON, Respondent and Defender.

Superior and Vassal—Investiture—Parts and Pertinents—Reservation—Precept of Clare—Coal and Limestone, Reservation of—In terms of the original rights and infeftments in certain lands, the dominium utile, together with the whole parts and pertinents thereof, including the coal and limestone, were acquired free of any reservation in favour of the superior. A reservation of the coal and limestone began to be inserted in the titles about sixty years back, for the first time, in a precept of clare constat, and subsequently in successive charters; but the minerals were never wrought—Held that the property of the coal and limestone was in the vassal, and that the reservation in favour of the superior was inserted without warrant.

The present question regards the right to the coal and limestone within the lands of Gilbertfield, Overton and Bellhouseside, of which the pursuer is proprietor, holding of and under the defender as his superior.

The dominium utile of the lands was separated from the superiority by a feu-disposition, dated 1657, and by the instrument of sasine following thereon, the vassal was infeft in the said lands, parts, pendicles, and haill pertinents thereof whatsoever, without any reservation of the coal in favour of the superior. In some of the subsequent infeftments the instruments state, that the lands were to be held by the vassal "cum domibus, edificiiis, hortis, toftis, croftis, pasturis, carbonibus, carbonariis, moris, maresiis, partibus, pendiculis et omnibus aliis suis pertinen. quibuscunq.;" and a charter of confirmation and novodamus was granted by Ann Duchess of Hamilton in 1701, the tenendas of which is in these terms:

"Holding and for to hold all and haill" the said lands of Gilbertfield and Overtown, "with houses, biggings, yards, pairts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof whatsoe. &c. in feu-forme and heritadge for ever. By all the rights, maiths, and marches of the same, old, new, and divydit, as the same lyes in length and breidth, with houses, biggings, yards, orchards, meadows, pastures, moss, muirs, woods, fischings, hunting, haulking, doves, dovecots, cunnings, cunningairs, coal, coalbeughs, lyme, lymestone, and all uther liberties, privileges and immunities thereof, alseweill not named as named, alseweill under the ground as above the same, far and neir, without any revocation or obstacle in the contrair."

It was not till the investiture came to be renewed in the person of John Hamilton, as son and heir of Gabriel Hamilton his father, in 1778, that, in a charter of confirmation and precept of clare in his favour, there was inserted, immediately preceding the warrant of infeftment, the following clause:

"Reserving always to the said Duke, his heirs and successors, the coal and limestone within the bounds of the haill lands above mentioned, so that the said Duke and his forebears may set down coal-pits, shanks, and sinks, and win coal and limestone within any part of the bounds of the said lands, and may have liberty to make all engines and easements necessary, with free ish and entry for the working, keeping, sale and away-taking thereof; they always giving satisfaction to the said John Hamilton and his forebears for any loss, skaith, or damage they shall sustain by the downsetting of any such coal-pits, sinks, or shanks, or by the winning of the said coal and limestone, or by the roads and passages for the away carrying of the same."

This charter and precept bears to have been granted by a quorum of commissioners specially constituted by Douglas Duke of Hamilton,

"for managing his affairs, and specially to enter and receive his Grace's vassals in all lands and others holding of him within Scotland, conform to the tenor of their old infeftments, and agreeable to the laws and practice of Scotland, and to grant all writs necessary for that purpose."

The lands were possessed by John Hamilton under his infeftment till his death in 1826, when he was succeeded by his son Gabriel Hamilton Dundas, who procured himself infeft therein under a precept of clare, obtained from the commissioners of the defender, dated 5th February 1827,—Mr Dundas having in the mean time disposed the subjects to certain trustees for behoof of his creditors, with powers of sale, and who were infeft therein in September 1826.

Thereafter the lands were purchased from the trustees of Mr Hamilton Dundas by the trustees of the deceased Adam Graham of Craigallian, conform to disposition in their favour, and infeftment following thereon in November 1827. These conveyances, viz., the conveyance by Mr Dundas to his trustees, and the conveyance by the latter to the trustees of Mr Graham, were of the whole subjects held by the vassal, in terms of their original feu-rights, without any reservation or qualification; and from Mr Graham's trustees the pursuer acquired right to the subjects in 1828. After he obtained his conveyance, he applied to the superior for an entry, which was granted, subject to the following qualified reservation inserted in the charter of confirmation:

"Reserving always to me and my heirs and successors, so far as we may have right thereto, the coal and limestone within the bounds of the whole of the said lands," &c.

No attempt was ever made, either by the defender or the pursuer, to work the coal in the lands, or any part of them. Recently, however, the defender intimated that he held himself entitled to work the coal, when the pursuer presented a note of suspension and interdict, which came to be advised upon answers, and the Lord Ordinary granted the interdict, upon the grounds stated in the following interlocutor:

"13th March 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having considered this note, with the answers and titles produced, in respect, 1^{mo}, That it is stated and admitted that the coal of the lands mentioned in the note are now proposed to be wrought for the first time by the noble respondent; 2^{do}, That the later charters, containing a reservation of coal from 1778 downwards, appear to be directly at variance with the older titles, which vested the complainer's predecessors, the vassals, with the coal, while it is proved by the deeds produced, that the charters of the same subjects, flowing from his Grace's authors, whom he represents, not only contained no reservation of any minerals, but confirmed the vassals' rights thereto; 3^{io}, That it appears reasonable, in this peculiar state of the titles, that the complainer should have an opportunity of trying his right to the minerals, either by declarator or reduction, as he may be advised, before any innovation takes place in the possession; passes the note, and continues the interdict."

An action of declarator was thereafter brought, with which the suspension and interdict was conjoined,—concluding,

"that the pursuer, and his predecessors and authors, had and have the sole right and property of the said lands and others, and whole parts and pertinents thereof, including the said coal and limestone therein, free and disencumbered of any right or reservation in favour of the said noble defender and his successors, superiors thereof, and as fully and freely as if the deeds herein before referred to had not contained any such reservation;" and "that the said noble Duke has no right thereto, and ought to be interdicted from interfering with the pursuer in his possession and enjoyment of the same."

A summons of reduction was also brought, by the conclusions of, which the clause of reservation in the precept of clare 1778, and its repetition in the subsequent precept in 1826, as also in the charter of confirmation in the pursuer's favour, is sought to be reduced and set aside.

A record having been made up, the Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to prepare and lodge revised cases.

Pleaded for the pursuer—

1. An unquestionable right to the coal and limestone of the lands in question, and within the bounds thereof, was vested in the proprietors of the dominium utile, in virtue of the titles referred to in the record, long anterior to the charter of confirmation and precept of clare 1778; and at the date of that deed the superior had no right or title to the said coal and limestone more than to any other part of the dominium utile. 2. According to the sound construction of the clause in the charter and precept 1778, founded on by the superior, and more especially, and inter alia, having regard to the circumstances in which it was introduced, the declared purpose for which the deed was granted, the existing state of the titles at its date, and the established rights of the vassal, the reservation therein of right to the coal and limestone cannot be held to import, or to have been intended to import, more than that; whatever right was at the time in the superior, under the existing investiture, should remain unaffected by the entry of the heir, and be as entire as if a renewal of the investiture had not been granted, and the words ought to be viewed as of no greater efficacy than the qualified reservation inserted in the later titles. 3. The reservation, if intended to do more than preserve entire whatever rights were at the time in the superior, was wholly inept and void. And more especially, and inter alia, was it so, first, Because of the want of power on the part of his Grace's commissioners to go beyond the terms of the old infeftments in the renewal of the vassal's rights in the person of his heir: Second, Because, although the precept of clare had been granted by the superior himself, a reservation therein was an inabillie and inept mode of his acquiring any part of the dominium utile, and the nature and extent of the right in the vassal could not be so altered and limited: Third, Because the right to the coal and limestone, having been once separated from the superiority, became liable to be dealt with according to the same principles in regard to its re-acquisition by the superior with the dominium utile itself, as an unum quid, or any part or portion thereof: Fourth, Because, in the whole circumstances, it is evident that such an extensive meaning as is now attempted to be fixed on the reservation, could not have been contemplated by the vassal, and that any clause having that effect must have been introduced wrongfully, and per ambages, and is consequently not entitled to receive effect. 4. Supposing it to be held that, because of the reservation, no feudal right passed to the vassal in the coal and limestone under his infeftment following on the deed 1778, the right thereto, although personal, must nevertheless be held to be exclusive in the vassal, and to belong now to the pursuer, under the successive transferences mentioned in the record. 5. The defender having confirmed the titles by which the lands, with their whole pertinents, were conveyed to the pursuer, subject only to be restricted by such right to the coal and limestone, qua superior, as he might be found to possess,—1st, This is expressive of what had been all along the understanding of parties in regard to their respective rights, and is conclusive of the limited and qualified construction of the charter 1778, contended for by the pursuer: 2d, and separatim, The defender is thereby barred from objecting to the right of the pursuer to the coal and limestone, in the event of its being held that the defender himself has no right thereto, and it is, moreover, jus tertii on the part of the defender to object, in that event, to a declarator of the pursuer's exclusive right.

Pleaded by the defender—

1. It is not competent, on the grounds libelled, merely to declare that the noble defender has no right or title to the coal and limestone in the lands in question, and that the pursuer has the sole right and property of the minerals, as well as of the lands themselves, inasmuch as the Court could not decern and declare in terms of the conclusions of this summons to that effect, by virtually reducing and setting aside an important quality and condition in the existing investiture, which has been acknowledged and acted upon, and renewed for upwards of forty years. And this, the more especially as the pursuer alleges (1st,) that the writs and evidents were obtained from, or granted by, commissioners who had no power to grant them. And (2d,) that the reservation was inserted wrongfully and per ambages, or otherwise contrary to the laws and practice of Scotland. 2. As the pursuer and his authors have possessed the lands in question, and been duly infeft therein for upwards of forty years, under titles which were accepted by them with, and which contain an express quality and reservation in favour of the superior of right to the whole coal and limestone in the said lands, the pursuer is now personally barred from asking, and is not now entitled to have his qualified right to the lands declared to be an absolute and unqualified right, or to have it declared that the noble defender has no right to the coal and limestone, and that he ought to be interdicted from working the same. 3. The right of the superior to work the coal and limestone, being res mare facultatis, is neither lost nor anyways impaired by its not having been exercised for forty years, the more especially as there has been no exercise of any adverse right of working coal and limestone, or any prescriptive right acquired by the vassal to work them. 4. It was competent, and perfectly legal for the superior, in renewing the investiture to the heir of the former vassal, to reserve the minerals in the lands, and the reservation in the progress of titles in question is not inept and void: Bell's Principles, § 1821. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Straton, 27th June 1777; Brown's Supplement, Vol. V. p. 612. 5. As the pursuer's authors, the vassals in the lands, accepted of the charters and precept under an express quality and reservation, upon which they have acted for upwards of forty years, the right so reserved by the superior is not now voidable, and cannot competently be declared to be of no legal effect on the grounds libelled, or any of them. 6. The commissioners of Douglas Duke of Hamilton had full power, by their commission, to reserve the minerals to his Grace and his successors. 7. And at all events, having accepted of the charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat, with the reservation, and having likewise accepted of renewals thereof, the pursuer is barred, personali exceptione, from maintaining that the insertion of the reservation was ultra fines mandati of the commissioners of Douglas Duke of Hamilton. 8. On a sound construction of the reservation in the charter and precept in 1778, and in the subsequent renewals of the investiture of the coal and limestone in favour of the superior, the reservation is not of the limited or qualified nature and import contended for by the pursuer; on the contrary, it legally and validly reserves right, without any limitation to the coal and limestone. 9. There is nothing in the circumstances of the case to indicate that the reservation was introduced wrongfully and per ambages, or otherwise, than by a paction between the superior and vassal, and consequently the right to validly reserve ought to receive full legal effect. 10. There is no ground in fact or in law for the pursuer's hypothetical plea, that if no feudal right passed to his author in the coal and limestone by virtue of his infeftment following upon the charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat in 1778, the right thereto, although personal, must nevertheless be held to be exclusively in the vassal, and now to belong to him under the successive transferences mentioned in the record.

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the cause to the Lords of the Second Division, and accompanied his interlocutor with the following note:

" This case is entitled to the deliberate consideration of the Court, from the importance of the question raised in it in the law of title, and from the probable value of the minerals involved in the issue.

" The question which occurs is, Whether the superior can found on certain reservations of minerals, inserted in his own favour in the later charters of renewal granted to the vassals, in order to support a complete and preferable right to these pertinents in opposition to the original grants by his ancestors, which not only were framed without any reservation, but contained a specification of coal and lime as included in the pertinents alienated to the vassal? The Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, considers the plea of the vassal to rest on the most solid grounds, and he will explain, as briefly as the nature of the case admits of, the grounds on which he has come to this conclusion.

" I. Upon the state of the titles detailed in the record, it seems impossible to doubt that the noble superior's predecessors alienated these lands to the predecessor of the pursuer, with all pertinents, including minerals. Certain criticisms are made on these titles which scarcely deserve any remark; as, for example, that the specification of coal, founded on by the vassal as one of the pertinents enumerated, occurs not in the dispositive clause but in the tenendas. As the minerals are included in the property, the conveyance of the one does, both in ordinary and in technical language, comprehend the other.

" In like manner it is objected, that while the earlier infeftments in the seventeenth century distinctly specify coal as forming part of the pertinents held by the vassal, the precepts or dispositions on which these sasines proceed are not produced. That objection is plainly obviated by the express terms of the Act 1617, which provides, that 'where there is no charter extant, they' (parties founding on a prescriptive title) 'show and produce instruments of sasine, one or more, confirmed and standing together for the said space of forty years, either proceeding upon retours or precepts of clare constat.'

" The present case, however, does not rest on these registered infeftments alone, though these are still unchallenged. The charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat, granted by Duchess Ann of Hamilton in 1701, is produced, and that of itself is conclusive—more especially following and confirming the prior infeftments. Among the subjects stated in that deed to be comprehended in the charter of novodamus which she granted in reference to Gilbertfield and Overton, there is a distinct and specific mention of 'coal and coal-heughs.' Moreover, in the prior part of that charter, her Grace confirmed the disposition granted by Robert Cuninghame (the first) to his son on 15th September 1677, and the instrument of sasine taken thereon 'in the bail heads, articles and clauses thereof, in all, and by all things, as is therein expressed.' The sasine thus confirmed applied to the whole lands of Gilbertfield, Overton and Bellhouseside, and it specially set forth infeftment as having been given (see condescendence, article VI.) 'cum carbonibus, carbonariis, calce,' &c. &c. These titles (on which alone the vassals held possession for more than a century) established irrefragably that the coal of the whole lands now libelled on was vested ab antiquo in the predecessors of the pursuer.

" II. The next inquiry is, If the vassal at any subsequent period renounced or reconveyed to the superior the minerals thus alienated by his predecessors?

" The noble superior hardly alleges this distinctly in point of fact, but his Grace's plea is founded on a certain reservation of the coal and lime inserted for the first time in a charter and precept of clare constat, granted by the commissioners of Douglas Duke of Hamilton to John Hamilton of Westburn in 1778 (first incorrectly expede in 1773), on which infeftment followed in the same year. But the Lord Ordinary entertains great doubt if that reservation can be construed as conferring any greater right on the superior, than a saving or reservation of such right as the superior could afterwards instruct to be competent to him over the said minerals anterior to the date of the charter. This inference seems to be justly deducible on the following grounds:—

" 1st, Assuming that the earlier titles produced, and the infeftments confirmed by the superior, vested a right to the whole properties feued a celo ad centrum in the vassal, the charter of 1778 professed to be, and was, both in form and substance, an entire confirmation of these rights. There was not only no recital that there had been any new transaction between superior and vassal, but the contrary is manifest on the face of the right itself. The ancient rights and holding of the said lands were ratified—it being specially set forth that the said lands, with the pertinents, were holden of Douglas Duke of Hamilton in feu-farm and heritage, for ever. They were held in feu, however, only by the deeds before recited,—the last of which, flowing from Duchess Ann, contained a grant of coals and coal-heughs among the pertinents held by the vassal.

" 2d, The charter and precept of 1778 contained a specification of the feu-duties payable by the vassals, which on comparison will be found to correspond precisely with the duties and casualties set forth in the previous charter granted by Duchess Ann of Hamilton in 1701. As that charter shows that these payments were exigible in part for the minerals as well as surface, the same right, if ever valid, must be continued to the vassal under the charter and precept of 1778.

" 3d, The form and clauses of the charter and precept of 1778 not only exclude the idea that there was any renunciation or conveyance by the vassal of any right previously vested in him or his predecessors; but if any such inference were deducible in law from the clause of reservation founded on by the superior, the right so claimed by the superior would be a right sine causa. The charter itself contains evidence that no new transaction took place, and no consideration was given by the superior to the vassal for the renunciation of any right vested in the latter; and it is proved by a marking on the face of the charter, and by other written evidence, that the vassal in 1778 paid £105. 5. 9., being the ordinary casualty exigible from singular successors in these feus for the charter then granted to him as an ordinary renewal of the investiture.

" 4th, In so far as any difficulty now occurs from the insertion of the clause of reservation in the charter and precept of 1778, it seems in part to be explained by the fact established by the titles themselves, that the same country agent (John Boyes) then acted both for superior and vassal, and he seems thus to have been led to overlook, or negligently omitted to check a claim or pretension on the part of the noble superior, which, possibly, a more impartial and better qualified adviser, acting for the vassal, would have at once rejected. Mr Davidson's letter in 1778 produced (see statement IV.), shows that Boyes had some charge or other for the Duke of Hamilton's commissioners at that period; while the infeftment produced, taken by Mr Boyes for Mr Hamilton of Westburn in 1778 proves that he also acted for the vassal. It may be doubted if a country writer at that period ought to be held as in any sense to be peritus juris, even if he had acted for Westburn alone; but when he was employed for both superior and vassal, it ought more particularly to bar the presumption, that any unusual clause, inserted in a deed to which it was not appropriate, was meant or understood to affect the rights of parties as constituted by the previous titles in the investiture then confirmed. The circumstance also mentioned by the pursuer, that the vassal, Mr Hamilton of Westburn, had occasion, when the charter under consideration was first drawn, to take out two other charters of lands from the same superior in which a similar reservation was properly and correctly inserted, goes far to explain the origin of the inapplicable and ineffectual reservation in the charter of the lands now in question.

" 5th, Although Mr Hamilton of Westburn's son, Mr Gabriel Hamilton Dundas, took a precept of clare constat from the noble defender, with a similar reservation in 1826, and though the pursuer, Mr Graham, also took a charter in 1828, with a reservation of the coal and lime, but containing this important qualification, 'in so far as he' (the superior) 'may have right thereto,' it seems to be undisputed that no possession has followed, from 1778 to the present time, on the reservation inserted by the noble superiors in these charters. In fact, neither party has yet wrought any coal or lime within these lands.

" III. Thus standing the facts; the question which arises in point of law here is, Whether the minerals within the lands libelled on belong to the superior, in virtue of the later reservations, or to the vassal under the original titles before detailed? The Lord Ordinary humbly conceives the plea of the vassal to be insuperable in every point of view in which the case can be considered.

"In the first place, it seems to be a point quite settled in the law of Scotland, that a charter by a superior confirming a vassal's investiture, and a precept of clare constat, must in general be held to comprehend every thing included in the original grant. A distinction is drawn between a charter of resignation and one of confirmation, which is immaterial in the present case, as the charter of 1778, in which the reservation now founded on was first inserted, was, in point of fact, a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat combined. But, even if it had been a charter of resignation only, it is apprehended that the superior could not validly retain or re-acquire any right by mere reservation, inconsistent with his predecessor's original grant. Cases may indeed be figured of new transactions between superiors and vassals, when investitures come to be renewed, just as well as at other periods; but when these very rare cases occur, the charter must contain some evidence that a change of the title, and a retention of part of the subject, was mutually intended and transacted between the parties. No such case is raised either upon the title or record in the present instance.

"The distinction between reservations in an original charter and those inserted in a charter of renewal, is too obvious and important to require illustration. In the former, the reservation is truly a restriction of, and exception from, the grant; in the latter it resolves, as the words in the strict sense import, into a protest and claim, valeat quantum, by the superior of his own preference for such right as he may be able to instruct to the subjects reserved. Accordingly, on this ground, a superior is entitled by law to reserve what he chooses in a charter of renewal. He cannot delay giving a charter to a vassal, so as to complete his title in respect of doubts or claims upon the vassalage, or any of its pertinents; but he may reserve what he pleases; and there is a whole chapter in the Dictionary, under the title of 'Superior and Vassal,' as to the 'obligation of superiors to enter vassals, reserving their own right.' (See Dictionary, p. 15,064.) Of course if it be found, on due discussion of the superior's claim, when he comes to act on it, that it was altogether groundless, and founded on error and delusion at the time it was reserved, it falls to the ground as a protestatio contra jus, which cannot be available to any effect.

"In the next place, assuming that this is the general effect of reservations in charters of renewal, the Lord Ordinary does not conceive that there is any ground on which the vassal is precluded in the present instance from contesting the effect and extent of the reservation founded on by the noble defender. It is true that the reservation now under consideration has been inserted in successive charters, taken by the vassals for a period now extending back for sixty years; and if these reservations had been acted on by the superiors raising coal for the years of prescription, an unchallengeable servitude would probably have been created. But when no coal has been wrought, the Lord Ordinary doubts if there be any room for prescription in favour of the superior adverse to the ancient title of the vassal. For if the parties found solely on the title-deeds, without any overt act of possession therein, then the vassal is entitled to meet the reservation founded on by the noble defender, by the prior grants in his (the vassal's) favour, confirmed or homologated by the same charters in which the reservations are inserted. These not only confirm the original grants, but stipulate for the same feu-duties agreed to be given for the lands, including the minerals and other pertinents attached to the lands feued.

"In that view, if the later charters of renewal are strictly analyzed, they would be found to be inconsistent and contradictory in their clauses; at least if the reservation of the minerals were taken as importing more than a saving provision of such a claim, if any, as the superior could afterwards, on due investigation, instruct. By one clause, the noble superior was made to confirm the whole of the ancient grants of his predecessors, which expressly included coal and lime as enumerated pertinents; and by another clause in the same deed, it is alleged that he reserved and excepted coal. A charter with such clauses could only have been so framed by fraud, or from ignorance, error, and inadvertency. As fraud is out of the question, it follows that the reservation was inserted by mistake, or possibly from superfluous and ill-directed precaution; but on either supposition, the claim of the superior under such a clause, now that it has been investigated and discussed, cannot be sustained.

"When the error or inefficacy of any clause in a charter of renewal is manifest on the face of the title, it is apprehended that it is never too late for a party interested to object to it so long as matters are entire; and so long as the parties have not, by some visible act and deed, admitted possession under the claim for the years of prescription. In all questions as to the rights of parties, the original grant must be the regulating title. Accordingly, this doctrine seems to have received effect in the late case of the Duke of Montrose and Bontine, where a feu-duty stipulated in an original feu-charter, but omitted in the later charters of renewal for a period exceeding the years of prescription, was nevertheless found due, because the vassal had in fact possessed no exemption, but had paid or accounted for the feu-duties to a comparatively recent period to the Duke of Montrose, as assignee of the Crown. On the same principle, as the noble superior here has had no possession adverse to the original grants in favour of the vassal's predecessors, it is apprehended that the right of the latter to the minerals, and all others pertinents included in their ancient feus, is still entire.

"Upon these views, the case in all its bearings is now submitted to the consideration of the Court."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—This is a charter by progress; and Craig and Erskine agree that such charters are, in dubious clauses, to be interpreted agreeably to the original one. The regular mode of making any change in the investiture is by resignation, when the superior is reinvested in the lands. There is here no change of the feu-duty in consequence of the reservation of the coal, and no indication of any intention in the parties to alter the investiture. I am therefore of opinion, that the reservation can have no effect.

Lord Murray.—I agree entirely with Lord Medwyn. The renewal of the investiture by precept of clare does not make any change in the titles, and the presumption is against any change unless the contrary appears. I don't go so far as the pursuer, and say that a change could not competently be made in a precept of clare, if an alteration was intended. That, however, is not the case here.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur; if there had been apparent from the charter an intention to make a new transaction, the case would have been very different; but there is no evidence of this on the face of the deed, and there is no acknowledgment of it on the part of the vassal. I am therefore of opinion, that we must hold that the reservation was inserted without warrant.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 99.—MALCOLM INGLIS (Robertson's Trustee), Pursuer, v. THE PORT- EGLINTON COMPANY, Defenders.

Bankrupt—Sale—Rejection on Insolvency—A party, considering himself insolvent, refused to receive a quantity of goods, and sent them back to the carrier's quarters. Thereafter he directed them to be taken to C and D, to be kept by them for behoof of the vendors; but on the ground that some of his creditors were complaining that he had refused to receive the goods, he ordered C and D to send them to his premises, from whence they were taken by the vendors—Held, in the circumstances, that this rejection was final, and could not be recalled.

This was an action at the instance of the trustee on a sequestrated estate for the value of certain goods taken from the wareroom of the bankrupt by the sellers. The parties agreed to submit the cause to William Clerk, Esq., for the purpose of taking the evidence, and making up from thence and the admissions a special case or verdict for the judgment of the Court. The following was accordingly submitted:

"On the 8th of May 1839, John Robertson, manufacturer at Stirling, since bankrupt, ordered woollen yarns, as per invoice, to the value of £170. 16s., from the Port-Eglington Company, carrying on business at Glasgow.

"The said goods were dispatched from Glasgow in four bales on the 13th of May 1839, by William Wordie, carrier, to be delivered to Robertson at Stirling. The said yarns were brought to Robertson's premises there, by Wordie, on the forenoon of the 14th of May. Robertson, considering himself then insolvent, refused to receive the goods, which were laid down at his door. After remaining there a short time, they were, by his orders, and on the same day, sent back to the carrier Wordie's quarters.

"On Friday the 17th of May, the aforesaid goods were, by Robertson's direction, carried to Campbell and Donaldson's at Cambusbarrow, to be kept by them for the behoof of the Port-Eglington Company.—Alexander Donaldson, the partner of Campbell and Donaldson, being the brother of Charles Donaldson, one of the partners of the Port-Eglington Company.

"No notice was ever sent to the Port-Eglington Company, either of Robertson's refusal to receive the goods, or of their having been returned to the carrier, or of their having been sent to Campbell and Donaldson.

"On Saturday the 18th of May, two bales and part of a third bale were sent to Robertson's premises, and on Tuesday the 21st, the remainder of the goods, with the exception of four hundred pounds weight, were sent to Robertson by Mr Campbell of Campbell and Donaldson, who were creditors of Robertson. This was done at Robertson's request, because, as he stated to Campbell, some of the creditors were complaining that he had refused to receive the goods.

"The aforesaid four hundred pounds of the said goods, valued at £46. 13. 4., remained in the possession of Campbell and Donaldson.

"A bill due by Robertson to Charles Inglis for £248. 15s.

11d. fell due, and was dishonoured by Robertson on the 16th of May. On the 21st May, Robertson issued circulars calling a meeting of his creditors, which meeting was held at Stirling on the 27th May. One of the circulars, addressed to the Port-Eglington Company, was put into the Post-office at Stirling.

"The state of affairs, debts and goods, Nos. 22, 23 and 24 of process, prepared by Robertson, were then laid before the meeting.

"On the 4th of June, Charles Donaldson, of the Port-Eglington Company, went to Robertson's, and demanded the three bales of goods then in his premises, which were delivered to him by Robertson's wife, under the belief that they were received by him for behoof of the creditors, though there is no evidence that he then represented himself to her as acting for them. The said three bales of goods were accordingly taken away by Charles Donaldson, and claimed for the Port-Eglington Company. The value of the three bales is £123. 16. 8.

"Robertson was made notour bankrupt on the 5th of June, and his estate sequestrated on the 22d June."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question in this case is, whether the goods were rejected by Robertson on the 14th, and if so, was the rejection final? The facts, in my view, make out the case. Now, it is said that Robertson, considering himself then insolvent, refused to receive the goods. No words can be stronger or more explicit. Then, after remaining for a short time at his door, the goods were, by his orders, sent back to the carrier's quarters. This also is sufficient to constitute rejection, and is the strongest point in the case. It is the legal duty of a carrier to bring back goods which are refused; and if he does not do so in time, he is liable in damages to the vendor. If they are taken off his hands, he has no more to do with them; but if refused, his duty, like the post-man, is to bring them back. On the 17th, goods were, by Robertson's direction, sent to Campbell and Donaldson's—Donaldson being the brother of one of the partners of the Port-Eglington Company. The case implies that Robertson was doing the best he could for the company; and, under the circumstances, it was not only his right, but his duty to reject the goods. I do not attach much importance to what followed—the rejection being complete. Campbell and Donaldson could not destroy the right of the company. They received the goods as special depositaries for the company, after rejection on the ground of insolvency. It is asked, by what authority they held the goods? By the authority of Robertson, the person who was entitled to demand delivery, and who, being master of the goods, deposited them in Campbell and Donaldson's hands for behoof of the company. After the goods were offered, the right of stoppage in transitu terminated, and Robertson was the only person who could give authority to Campbell and Donaldson to hold them for the company. Campbell and Donaldson are creditors of Robertson, and pursuers in this action. Now, having received the goods refused on the ground of insolvency, and aware of it, were they entitled to undo what Robertson himself had done? I do not impute to them any dishonest purpose; but they had an interest to return the goods. No notice was sent to the company; and at Robertson's request, because, as he stated to Campbell, some of the creditors were complaining that he had not received the goods, they were restored on the 18th and 21st. Now, if a bankrupt, in the knowledge of insolvency, rejects goods, his creditors cannot undo what he has done. Whether the company ought not to have applied to the Sheriff for a warrant to take back the goods, is not the true question at issue. This might have been more regular; but the true point is, whether the rejection by Robertson was final? In my opinion, judgment should be for the defenders.

Lord Medwyn.—I do not differ from the conclusion arrived at by your Lordship, although I doubt whether, under other circumstances, the rejection of the goods would have been considered final, or whether Campbell and Donaldson, having received the goods by the order of Robertson, would not have been bound to obey his order to return them. I think a party is not only morally, but legally bound to reject goods in the knowledge of his circumstances being insolvent; and he can recal that rejection only on some mistake as to his insolvency. But the reason here stated for taking back the goods is fatal to the case. It is not said that he was mistaken as to his circumstances, but merely that the creditors were complaining. Although, in other circumstances, such a rejection might be retracted, on the whole, I concur in thinking it cannot be so here.

Lord Murray.—I agree, although I had some difficulty at first as to what was the real point put. Now, however, I am satisfied it relates to the conclusiveness of the rejection of the goods by the bankrupt. I do not say it would be binding in all circumstances; but the fact that the creditors were complaining was no ground for recalling what had been done properly before.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 100.—MRS HARRIET RENNY STRACHAN and OTHERS (Renny Strachan's Trustees), Pursuers, v. The MAGISTRATES and HARBOUR TRUSTEES of ARBROATH, Defenders,—Et è contra.

Obligation.—Delectus Personæ.—Burgh.—Privilege.—At the request of the magistrates and town-council of a royal burgh, a neighbouring proprietor granted to them the liberty of certain quarries, not only for winning of stones to build a new pier, but also in all time coming for winning of stones to all the public works belonging to the said burgh. In consideration whereof the magistrates and town-council granted to him, his heirs and assignees, the liberty of exporting the victual of the growth of all his lands free from the payment of shore-dues imposed, or to be imposed at the harbour. The magistrates and town-council having sold the harbour and its dues to parliamentary trustees, for the purpose of being greatly enlarged and improved—Held that the privilege of quarrying stones was personal to the town-council, and did not admit of being conveyed by them to others; that the harbour trustees could not claim the benefit of the privilege; and that the magistrates themselves, having ceased to have any patrimonial interest in the harbour and its dues, could not exercise the privilege in regard to it.

The trustees of the late Mr Renny Strachan are infert in the estate of Tarrie, containing the quarries of Easter and Wester Seatons, which form the subject of the present actions. The point raised is, whether the Magistrates of Arbroath and the trustees of the harbour have a right to quarry stones from these quarries for the purpose of making the new harbour at Arbroath; and the question arises in the form of mutual actions of declarator.

The harbour of Arbroath, with the piers, port, and pertinents thereof, were, by royal charter, vested exclusively in the Magistrates and Town-council of Arbroath; and the harbour dues, tolls, and rates levied therefrom, formed part of the general revenues of the burgh, and were applied, along with the other portions of the common good, for the use of the burgh.

In the summons raised by the Harbour Trustees it is stated, that about the year 1726 an arrangement was entered into between the Provost and Council of Arbroath on the one hand, and the proprietor of the estate of Tarrie on the other, whereby the privilege of taking stones from the Seaton quarries was given to the town-council for certain specified purposes. The agreement is contained in a minute of the town-council, dated the 27th June 1726, and bears to be as follows:

“That forasmuch as Alexander Strachan of Tarrie bath, at the earnest request of the Magistrates and Town-council of Aberbrothwick, granted the liberty of both his ston quarries of Easter and Wester Seatouns, not only for winning of stons to build the new pier of the harbour of the said burgh of Aberbrothwick, but has also granted to them the liberty of both the said quarries in all time coming, for winning of stons to all the publick works belonging to the said burgh: therefore, and in consideration of the favour done to the said town by the said Laird of Tarrie, they give and grant to him, and his heirs and assignies whatsomever, an liberty of exporting the victual of the growth of all his lands of Easter and Wester Seatouns, Tarrie, and Dickmontlaw, for the crop 1726, and of all crops and years succeeding, and that free of payment of any shoar-dues or other dues whatsomever; and, furdur, the said Magistrats and Council binds and obliges them, and their successors in office, to make out an sufficient cart road from the quarry of Easter Seatoun, where they are presently winning stons, so as stons may be brought up from the said quarry by any cart.”

The Magistrates and Town-council exercised from time to time this right of quarrying, and the proprietors of the estate of Tarrie enjoyed the corresponding privilege of exporting grain free from shore-dues.

In 1756, Mr Strachan of Tarrie feued out a part of his estate called Dickmountlaw, and by the feu-contract he conveyed to the feuar all right and title which he himself had

“of exporting at the harbour of Aberbrothock the victual of the growth of the said lands of Dickmountlaw free of payment of any shoar-dues, or other dues whatsoever, imposed or to be imposed at the said harbour of Aberbrothock, and that conform to and in terms of an act for that effect made by the Magistrates and Town-Council of Aberbrothock in favours of the said Alexander Strachan, his heirs and assignies, proceeding on the onerous causes therein narrated, dated the 27th day of June 1726, surrogating and substituting,” &c.

In the leases of the quarries, on the one hand, and of the shore-dues of the burgh on the other, the mutual privileges of Mr Strachan, his assignees, and the Magistrates of Arbroath, are reserved respectively.

In 1839, application was made to Parliament to have the management of the harbour and its revenues transferred from the Magistrates and Town-council to a separate body of trustees; and an Act was accordingly passed (2 Vict. c. 16), intituled, “An Act for extending, improving, regulating, and managing the harbour of the royal burgh of Aberbrothwick, in the county of Forfar.” In pursuance of a provision of the Statute, a minute of sale and deed of agreement was, in September 1839, entered into between the Magistrates and Town-council on the one part, and the Harbour Trustees on the other, whereby the town-council, in consideration of the price of £10,000, “sell, alienate, convey, assign, and dispo, to and in favour of the trustees of the harbour of Aberbrothwick, and their successors in office, all and whole the piers, port, and harbour of Aberbrothwick, with the pertinents thereof, and rights, privileges, and immunities thereunto belonging; and likewise the whole harbour and other dues, tolls, and rates leviable at the said harbour, and the dues leviable at the said patent-slip; together with all right, title, interest, claim of right, property, and possession, petitory as well as possessory, which the said community, or the said Magistrates and Town-council, so representing the said community, had, have, or can any ways claim or pretend to the said harbour, patent-slips, and others."

Immediately thereafter the trustees determined on the execution of certain extensive works for the enlargement and improvement of the harbour, and entered into a contract with Spencer Sutherland and James Forbes, harbour contractors, who, in consideration of the sum of £38,909, agreed to complete and execute the works. These contractors proceeded to quarry on a very extensive scale at the Seaton quarries; and according to a statement rendered by themselves, it appears that they had quarried, previous to the 28th November last, 44,259 cubic feet of block stone, and 7936 tons of rubble stone.

On these operations coming to the knowledge of the pursuers, they caused a protest to be served both on the harbour trustees and on the contractors, complaining of the illegality of their proceedings, and protesting that they should be held liable for the loss and damage thereby sustained. They subsequently presented a note of suspension and interdict, directed exclusively against the contractors; and on advising this bill, an interim interdict was granted. But immediately thereafter, the pursuers agreed to allow the quarrying operations to proceed, under a reservation of their claim for the value of all the stone that might be quarried, and of damages for the injury which had been, or might thereafter be, occasioned.

Mutual actions of declarator were raised and conjoined, for the purpose of determining the rights of parties. The one at the instance of Strachan's trustees is directed against the Harbour Trustees, and the contractors under them for building the harbour, concluding to have it found and declared that they have no right by themselves, or others employed by them, to quarry and carry away stones from the Seaton or Ness quarries, or otherwise to encroach or trespass upon the property of the pursuers. And it contains the other subsidiary conclusions for interdict and damages.

A counter action of declarator was raised at the joint instance of the Harbour Trustees and of the Magistrates and Town-council of Arbroath, concluding, 1st, that the Magistrates have undoubted right and liberty of quarrying stones from the said quarries, for the purpose of erecting, building, and repairing all public works belonging to the community, without payment of any price or quarry-mail; 2d, that this right and privilege has been effectually conveyed by them to the Harbour Trustees, for constructing and repairing the harbour and its works, and that the said trustees have an undoubted right and privilege to use these quarries for these purposes, without paying any price or compensation therefor; or, 3dly, in the event of its being found that this right has not been validly conveyed to the Harbour Trustees, that the Magistrates and Town-council are themselves entitled to use the quarries for the purposes of the harbour, and other works therewith connected.

In the first of these actions the Magistrates and Town-council craved leave to sist themselves as defenders; and against the action it was pleaded—The right of quarrying stones being vested in the defenders by a binding contract, under which the obligations stipulated in favour of the pursuers and their predecessors have been, and are in the course of being fulfilled, and agreeably to use and wont, there is no ground for demanding the immunity from that right of quarrying which is sought by the present declarator.

In the counter action it was pleaded in defence—1. The privilege of quarrying stones, alleged to have been granted by the proprietor of Tarrie, was a privilege personal to the town-council, and did not admit of being conveyed by them to other parties. It was not competent for them to increase the burden by increasing the number of parties entitled to use it. 2. As the privilege was only to be used for public works belonging to the town-council, and as the revenues of the harbour are to be appropriated to purposes different from the proper revenues of the burgh, the Harbour Trustees cannot claim the benefit of this privilege. 3. The Magistrates, by selling and disposing to the trustees the harbour and its dues, have ceased to have any patrimonial interest in it, and cannot now claim the privilege of quarrying stones for the new pier and other buildings in the course of erection. 4. At all events, the alleged minute of council proceeds on the supposition of its being a mutual contract; and as the town-council are no longer in a condition which entitles them to exempt the defenders from harbour-dues, they cannot enforce implement of the counter obligation.

The record having been closed upon the summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to state their argument in cases. This was done at their own request, with the view of obtaining an early decision. Having considered the cases, the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Lords of the Second Division, and accompanied his interlocutor with the following note:

"The opinion of the Lord Ordinary is with the Magistrates and Harbour Trustees. He thinks it clear that the privilege was granted to the community of the burgh, and not to the Magistrates in any other character than that of administrators or trustees. If there was any dominant tenement, it was the existing (and future) public works of the burgh, and in an especial manner the public harbour of the burgh, which was primarily in view when the servitude was constituted, and has ever since been the subject for whose use chiefly it has been exercised. If the grant was not that of a real servitude, but of a personal privilege, the persons in whose favour, and for whose advantage it was made, were very clearly not the individual Magistrates, but the individual inhabitants and traders of the burgh, who were interested in, and entitled to use the public works within it; and it is impossible to suppose that such a grant, even if entirely gratuitous, should ever cease or become inoperative by a mere change in the administrators or trustees who might at any time be more immediately charged with the duty of protecting and securing its enjoyment. If it was a real servitude, again, it would be at least as absurd to hold that it should ever become extinct by the mere transference of the dominant tenement to a new owner. The conveyance is of the harbour, 'with all the rights, privileges, and immunities thereunto belonging.'

"But the whole difficulty of the case vanishes, in another point of view, when it is considered that there was not an unilateral grant, either of privilege or servitude, but part of an onerous and mutual contract, of which, as long as implement is offered on the one side, it may clearly be demanded on the other, and of which in this case it is not denied that, in point of fact, the objecting party has had (and has practically taken) the benefit for upwards of a century; and for the continuance and preservation of which benefit, the magistrates and trustees are willing that he shall now have decree in such terms as he may dictate. By the terms of that contract, he was to have the use of the harbour in all time coming, without paying the usual dues, and in return, the harbour was to have the use of his quarries for all repairs and enlargements. This, beyond all doubt, was the true substance and purport of the contract of 1726, and, in truth, its letter as well as its spirit; and no administrators of the harbour could, without his consent, deprive him of this stipulated exemption; so he could refuse to no such administrators the benefit of the corresponding privilege. But his party, from first to last, was and is not the board of managers for the time being, but the community for whom they manage. He has a privilege and advantage accordingly, not over the managers, but over all the rest of that community, by virtue of the contract; and they, in return, are justly entitled to insist that they shall have the corresponding advantage of taking stones from his quarries for the improvement of a structure in which they alone, and not their administrators, have the whole substantial interest. All questions as to any abuse or improper exercise of this privilege are very properly reserved till the point of right is determined."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—The present actions are founded upon a special contract entered into in 1726, when the Magistrates of Arbroath, wishing to build a new pier, applied to the proprietor of Tarrie for liberty to win stones for that purpose from his quarries; and at the earnest request of the Magistrates and Town-council, as their minute bears, liberty was granted to take stones, not only for the new pier, but for all the public works belonging to the burgh, in all time coming. In consideration of this favour the proprietor of Tarrie was to have the liberty of exporting the victual of his lands free of payment of any shore-dues. The duties were then small, and the only public works contemplated were those of a poor and small burgh. In 1839 the harbour Act passed, and under its provisions the trustees have paid the Magistrates £10,000 for the acquisition of the harbour and the duties leviable therefrom. The trustees are also entitled to borrow £40,000 for the purposes of the Act; and they are empowered to raise the harbour dues. The object of the Act was to raise the dues and to enlarge and improve the harbour beyond what could have been done in either case by the Magistrates and Town-council. In the Act, there is no mention made of the contract with the proprietor of Tarrie. Do the trustees then come in place of the Magistrates; and have they acquired the privilege conferred by the contract? Viewing it as a mutual contract, the Magistrates, as one of the parties, have disposed the rights belonging to them, but the donee is different from them in every respect, and the privilege must be exercised to a far greater extent than they themselves could possibly have done. Originally, the new pier to be built and upheld out of these quarries was small, but the present harbour is to be greatly enlarged; and it is questionable if the trustees have the power to fulfil the counterpart obligation in the contract. The privilege of exemption from harbour-dues enjoyed by the proprietors of Tarrie is not noticed in the Act, and the trustees have no control over them. The creditors of the trust are entitled to insist that they should be exonerated without exemption. Perhaps the trustees might stipulate in their bonds for the exemption of the produce of these lands, but the transference seems to alter so considerably the extent of the burden, that I do not think it can be sustained.

Lord Moncreiff.—I differ from the opinion now delivered, and coincide with that expressed by the Lord Ordinary. The contract founded on is constituted by a written grant. It is a mutual contract, being the counterpart of a privilege conferred upon the proprietor of Tarrie, his heirs and assignees. It has been followed on both sides by possession, and the privilege has been exercised for one hundred and fourteen years. It does therefore seem serious, that one party taking full benefit from the contract, should now be allowed to refuse implement of it, because he may imagine it will not be of such advantage to him in future as it has been hitherto. I know of no instance of such a contract, and so founded on, which could be broken off at the instance of one of the parties. If the privilege is not a servitude, it is much more binding,—not depending on possession alone, nor on grant alone, but on an onerous contract followed by a possession of one hundred and fourteen years. If founded merely on prescription, a distinction might be taken on the ground of its not being a proper servitude, or in a question with a singular successor. It seems a conventional servitude sui generis, framed for perpetuity in regard to the subjects burdened; Ersk. II. 9, § 3 and 4. Now, in the case of a servitude constituted by grant, the extent of the right is regulated by the grant, and not by the degree of exercise; Earl of Aboyne, Dict. 14,517. Sinclair v. Town of Dysart; and Elchies voce Servitude. In Bruce of Kennet, the servitude of building a mill-dam was limited by possession to three feet in height; but he was found entitled to raise it three times higher. Whether the present be a servitude or contract of a different nature, it was a lawful contract which, after such possession, neither party can repudiate. Besides, the contract relates to other things than the harbour, and must subsist unless the counterpart be extinguished. The Magistrates transacted as a corporation for behoof of the burgh; and although they could not quarry stones for the building of private houses, the case is different when the stones are taken for the construction of a new pier, or other public works. The interest in the contract is in the community for public purposes. It is said the right cannot be transferred. Not for other purposes certainly, which was the nature of all the cases quoted; but if it be transferred for the definite purposes of the contract, the proposition is far from being so clear. The counterpart privilege is conferred not only upon Strachan, but upon his heirs and assignees. Here there is no such understanding of personality in the right; and, in point of fact, it was conveyed by him in part to his feuars. The term "assignees" could not be so properly applied to the Magistrates; but the grant was for all time coming, i. e., it could not be affected by any change of the Magistrates themselves, or in the corporation, or in the mode of administration of the public works. If the Magistrates had entered into an extensive contract for repairing the harbour, would this not have been legal. They might have got an Act of Parliament empowering them to raise the dues, and this would not have affected Strachan's right, but made it more valuable. If they had got also a power to borrow money, it would be just tertii for Strachan to interfere. If they were to rebuild the church, or the jail, or the harbour, could they not authorise their contractors to take the stones from the Seaton quarries? The preamble of the Statute shows the whole character of it, that the subject of it was the harbour of Arbroath, and that the improvement and enlargement of the harbour would be of great advantage to the trade of the burgh. No doubt powers are conferred upon the trustees which the Magistrates did not before possess, and they were allowed to assign their whole rights in the harbour, and the dues leviable therefrom, on receiving compensation; but this was all for the improvement and advantage of the burgh. It is no alienation of the ground or harbour; there is no change of the thing; the dues are to be applied for the improvement of the harbour; the assignment is for the benefit of the community, and could not have the effect of destroying a right held for behoof of the community. The harbour is made over, with all the rights of the corporation,—words sufficient to carry the privilege; but if not, it must remain with the burgh. The only question is, whether the trustees have not the power to give the counterpart. But the argument is sound, that the trustees could only get the harbour and dues, such as they were, and including an exemption fortified by possession. This right required no reservation, and could not be excluded but by the express consent of Strachan. It was fully constituted, and was followed by possession. This is not the case of a transference to third parties, but of a mutual contract for carrying the purpose of the original contract into effect. We have no idea of the value of the exemption from the shore-dues at the time of the contract, or of what it may hereafter become. But have the trustees no power to take up such a contract? It is said other traders or creditors may object; but the trustees are not granting any immunity. The exemption is founded on a prior and onerous contract. The contract is against the interest of Strachan, and in favour of the harbour, and of all traders and creditors. It is their interest, therefore, to maintain the exemption; and I have no idea of the interference of any one to the contrary; but if there were, the trustees would have a clear defence against it, in the fact of their acting upon an onerous contract.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The minute founded upon is that of one of the parties only, but the act of council being recognised in a feu-contract by a proprietor of Tarrie, makes it evidence for both parties. With Strachan's representatives, therefore, who are parties here, the contract is complete. But as to the extent of the privilege, it is to be observed that the act of council confers a privilege upon Strachan, and it is only from the narrative of the grant that it appears what had been received from him. There is no deed by Strachan conferring the privilege upon the town-council; and in my opinion it is not transferable. The counterpart is granted in favour of the assignees in the lands only. This is not a servitude, but a matter of right and special contract, and cannot be regulated by the general rules applicable to servitudes. It is a grant conferring a benefit and favour upon an ancient burgh, but it is not assignable. The object was to confer the privilege upon the corporation for the benefit of the community,—not for the building of private houses, but on the corporation, having a distinct legal character different from any other body known in law. Strachan's lands lay within the regality, and he might grant a favour to the corporation which he would not to trustees, who were not limited in their operations by the means of the corporation. Having been granted with a view to the limitation which the means and powers of the corporation imply, and having been bestowed at the earnest request of the Magistrates, it is an inherent condition of the privilege that it can only be exercised by the corporation. That this limitation is not unimportant, the present case affords an ample illustration. The ancient corporations have all failed in making large improvements, without being conjoined with others, and without having enlarged powers. Where corporations have a grant of free port or market-dues, the rates are fixed by the charters or immemorial possession, and they have not the means of increasing them. The works are thus restricted in extent; and consequently the exercise of a privilege, such as is here conferred, is restricted also. But, further, the privilege originates in a delectus persone in regard to the grantees. It is not divisible; and the corporation subsists, having still the charge of public works, which they may improve according to their means. The notion, that another and separate body can also exercise the privilege, because they have purchased part of the burgh property, appears to me not to be law. It is said that the subject to be enlarged is still the harbour of Arbroath; but the same would have been the case had the harbour been taken off the hands of the corporation by a joint-stock company. There is no analogy between a corporation and parliamentary trustees. A body, aided by parliamentary powers, might carry off the whole granite of the most valuable quarries, for accomplishing some of the gigantic undertakings of modern times. This is very different from a right limited by the ancient capacities or incapacities of royal burghs. The Magistrates have now no right in the harbour, and it is not one of the public works of the burgh.

"Sustain the first, second, and third pleas in law maintained by the defenders against the conclusions of the summons of declarator and damages at the instance of the Magistrates and Town-council of Aberbrothwick, and Harbour Trustees thereof; and to that effect assolvie the defenders from the said conclusions, and decern; and in the counter action at the instance of Strachan's trustees, repel the defences for the Harbour Trustees, and decern in terms of the conclusions of declarator and interdict in the summons in that action, and declare accordingly: Find no expenses due to either party; and, quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties' procurators on any remaining points in the cause, and to proceed thereanent as to his Lordship shall seem just."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 101.—JAMES SMITH, Pursuer, v. LORD DUFFUS, the HONOURABLE ROBERT DUNBAR and OTHERS, Defenders.

JAMES SINCLAIR and OTHERS (Lord Duffus's Trustees), Pursuers, v. The HONOURABLE ROBERT DUNBAR and OTHERS, Defenders.

Entail—Fetters—Clauses Prohibitory, Irritant and Resolutive.—By the prohibitory clauses in a deed of entail it was declared, that it shall not be lawful to "contract debts, nor give bond or obligation, nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said estate may be apprized." By the irritant and resolutive clauses it was declared, that if the heirs shall contravene by the "contracting of debts," then the said "bonds and obligations" shall be null and void—Held that the irritant and resolutive clauses were defective, and were not effectual against the contracting of personal debts, or the use of the diligence of adjudication proceeding thereon.

Entail—Fetters—Clauses Prohibitory, Irritant and Resolutive.—Title to Sue—The above-mentioned prohibitory and irritant clauses found to be an effectual bar against the trustees of the heir of entail pursuing a declarator, concluding to have it found that the estate was liable for the debts of the heir, and consequently to be adjudged; and that they were entitled to give bonds and obligations for the debts whereby the estate might be adjudged.

Entail—Clauses Prohibitory, Irritant and Resolutive.—Precept of Sasine—Statute 1685—The mandate in a precept of sasine being merely to give sasine "with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned"—Held that the words "irritant clauses," comprehend both the irritant and resolutive clauses.

The first of these actions was brought to have it declared that the estate of Hempriggs, belonging to the defender Lord Duffus, is not effectually entailed, and that the pursuer, who is a personal creditor of Lord Duffus, and has obtained a decree for his debt, is therefore entitled to adjudge it in satisfaction of his claims.

The action is defended by the Honourable Robert Dunbar, the second son of Lord Duffus, and a substitute heir of entail to the estate. He does not dispute that the pursuer is a creditor of Lord Duffus, but he maintains that the entail is valid, and that it excludes adjudication at the pursuer's instance.

The entail of Hempriggs was executed on the 11th October 1707, and was recorded in the Register of Taillies on the 13th of February 1708. It was conceived in favour of Miss Elizabeth Dunbar, the entailer's daughter, and certain heirs of tailzie. The following are the clauses which have reference to the question at issue:

"And in like manner, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, and shall be contained in all the subsequent infestments and rights of the said estate and lands, in all tyme coming, that it shall nowise be leisome nor lawful to the said Dame Elizabeth Dunbar, nor to the heirs of tailzie above designed, male or female, nor their heirs who shall happen to succeed to the said lands and dignitie, to alter, infringe, or break the said tailzie and destination, nor the order nor course of succession above written, nor yet to give, grant, sell, annalizie or dispone irredeemably, nor wadset nor dispone under reversion (excepting as is after excepted), any of the lands, baronies, fishings and others above named, nor any part thereof, nor to burden the samen with infestments of annualrents, or with any yearlie duties, more or less, to be uplifted forth of the samen, nor give tacks thereof for any longer tyme than the lifetime of the grantor, nor with diminution of the rental, unless tenants cannot be found to take it at the old rental, in which case that the samen may be set in public roup to the best advantage; nor to contract debts, nor give bond or obligation, nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part or portion thereof, may be appraised, adjudged, or any other way evicted from them or either of them, or the order or course of tailzy and succession any other way diverted, frustrat or interrupted; it being hereby understood, that although the forenamed persons be designed heirs of tailzy, and be to succeed to my said estate as such, they shall have no farther power to affect and burden the samen, nor if they were liferenters only: And if the said heirs shall contravene the premises, by breaking the tailzy, contracting of debts, selling or wadsetting the lands, burdening the same with infestments of annualrents, or setting the same in tack, in manner at length above sett down; then and in any of these cases the saids venditions, alienations, dispositions, infestments, alterations, infringements, bonds, tacks, obligations, made in the contrair, shall be null and void in themselves ipso facto, without the necessity of any action or sentence of declarator."

The Act of Parliament 1685 declares, "that such tailties shall only be allowed in which the aforesaid irritant and resolute clauses are insert in the procuratories of resignation, charters, precepts, and instruments of sasine."

In the present deed the precept of sasine enjoins sasine to be given "with and under the haill conditions and provisions, declarations, restrictions, limitations, reservations, clauses irritant, burden, power, and facultie above exprest." The grounds of objection to the entail are set forth in the summons under three heads:

"(1.) The prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses are directed against the institute and certain substitute heirs of entail therein designed, and 'their heirs who shall happen to succeed to the said lands and dignitie;' but the defender, Sir Benjamin Dunbar, Lord Duffus, does not fall within the description of heirs mentioned, inasmuch as he was not one of the heirs who happened to succeed to the said dignitie, as above set forth. (2.) The irritant clause before recited, while it contains an enumeration of specific acts, and declares them null and void, is not correctly applicable to the particulars enumerated in the prohibitory clause, nor sufficient to fence the same, and more particularly, it does not declare the debts contracted by the heir of entail in possession null and void; nor does it declare that any such debts shall not be made effectual against the estate by adjudication or otherwise; nor is it applicable to alienations, nor does it annul any other deeds by which the estate may be adjudged or evicted; neither does the resolute clause annul the right of such heir in respect of such debts or adjudications led thereon, or of any adjudications whatever. (3.) While the Act of Parliament provides that only such tailties shall be allowed in which the irritant and resolute clauses are insert in the procuratories of resignation, precepts and instruments of sasine, the said clauses are not contained in the precept of sasine in the said tailtie; and the said precept, while it refers by a special enumeration to the haill conditions, provisions, declarations, restrictions, limitations, reservations, clauses irritant, burden, power and faculty in the said entail expressed, omits all reference to the resolute clauses."

The record having been closed upon the summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary appointed parties to prepare and lodge mutual minutes of debate on the whole case, with the view of reporting the same to the Court. His Lordship stated in a note, that he acquiesced in the propriety of at once sending this case to the Court, from its near resemblance to several other entail cases, now before both Divisions, on consultation; and by a subsequent interlocutor, he made great avizandum with the process to the Lords of the Second Division.

Pleaded by the pursuer—

1. It has been settled, that regard cannot be paid to the intention of the maker of an entail, unless expressed in the most clear, explicit and unambiguous terms, and that such deeds are to be construed as strictissimi juris (Ardovie entail), Speid v. Speid, 21st February 1837, and subsequent decisions. 2. It has been held that, as each heir of entail takes a fee-simple in so far as he is not fettered, "the proof that he is fettered is thrown upon those who would fetter him; consequently, if there are two modes of construction of any given clause,—one which leaves him free and the other which fetters him,—the construction to be given to that clause is in favour of leaving him free, just as much as if there were only one construction, and that construction in his favour." (Overton entail) Lang v. Lang, 16th August 1839, M'Lean and Robison. 3. It has been decided, that although a good entail may be made where the irritant and resolute clauses contain a general reference to the acts and deeds prohibited; yet if either of these clauses contain a special but incomplete enumeration of prohibited acts and deeds, the general reference is thereby rendered unavailing, and such of the prohibited acts and deeds as have been omitted in the enumeration are to be regarded as not duly fenced. In the words of one of the noble Lords who presided in a late case (Ballileisk) in the House of Lords,—“Where a party undertakes to enumerate, in the irritant and resolute clauses, those acts which are to infer forfeiture, the prohibition is inoperative as regards any act which is not enumerated.”—(Tillicoultry entail) Bruce v. Bruce, 15th January 1799, M. 15,539; (Prestonfield entail) Dick v. Drysdale, 14th January 1812, F. C.; (Blairadam entail) Barclay v. Adam, 18th May 1821, Hume's Decisions, and 1 Shaw's Appeals, 24; (Ballileisk entail) Rennie v. Horne, 13th March 1838, 3 Shaw and M'Lean; (Banchory entail) Thomson v. Boswell, 27th February 1839, B. and M. 4. It has been decided, that where words of flexible signification are used in a fixed and limited sense in one part of an entail, they are not to be construed differently or in a more extended sense in other parts of the deed.—Dick v. Drysdale, Barclay v. Adam, Lang v. Lang, ut supra; (Ulbster entail) Sinclair v. Sinclair (Ulbster), 26th February 1841, B. and M. These general rules, it was maintained, were applicable to the objections set forth in the summons; and in regard to the second, in particular, it was submitted that the first branch of the irritant clause, which declares the conditions or events upon which the nullity of the acts and deeds enumerated in the second branch is dependent, omits to mention the prohibition against "giving bonds or obligations;" and that the second branch of the clause, which enumerates the particular prohibited acts or deeds which are to be null and void in the event of the conditions or events specified in the first branch happening, omits all mention of "debts contracted." Neither of the branches of the clause make any reference to the prohibition—"Nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part or portion thereof, may be appraised, adjudged, or any other way evicted," &c.

Pleaded by the defender—

1. That although the contraction of the debt is "the foundation of the bond or obligation, yet the nullity, not of the debt, but of the bond, is the proper result of the irritant clause; because the entailor could not extinguish the personal obligation imposed by the contraction of debt; all he could do was to protect the lands, which he has effectually done, by irritating bonds or obligations granted by the heirs. Denham, 15th December 1737; Brown's Supp. V. p. 200. 2. That although all the prohibited acts and deeds are not enumerated in each of the branches of the irritant clause, yet they are all mentioned in one or other of the branches, and consequently are all enumerated in the irritant clause,—a speciality distinguishes the present case from the Tillicoultry and other cases of defective enumeration, where the irritant clauses contained only one enumeration, altogether omitting to mention some of the prohibited acts or deeds.

A second action of declarator was also raised at the instance of the trustees of Lord Duffus, concluding to have it found, that the entailed lands and others are liable for the debts "due to the creditors of the said Lord Duffus, and that consequently the said lands and others are liable to be adjudged or otherwise affected by legal diligence, for all debts hitherto contracted by the said Lord Duffus, and that the said Lord Duffus, and the pursuers, as trustees aforesaid, are entitled to give bonds and obligations for the debts of the said Lord Duffus, whereby the said lands and estate, or any portion thereof, may be appraised, adjudged, or evicted from the heirs of entail, or either of them, for payment or satisfaction, or in security of said debts."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There are two actions here, which fall to be very differently disposed of. One is at the instance of the trustees of Lord Duffus, concluding to have it found that the entailed lands are liable for his debts, and that they are entitled to grant bonds and obligations in his room, whereby the estate may be adjudged from the heirs of entail. I cannot give effect to this action. Whatever may be the effect of the irritant clause against creditors, I cannot sustain an action against the prohibitions of the entail at the instance of an heir of entail, or of trustees in his room. There is an express prohibition against contracting debts. The trustees are in possession in the room of the heir of entail. They are not themselves creditors, or commissioners, or mandatories for creditors, and they are not entitled to insist in a declarator that the lands may be adjudged for debts. This action, therefore, I propose, should be dismissed with expenses.

The other action is of a very different nature, and is at the instance of a creditor holding a decree for his debt, and concluding to have it found that, according to the construction of the entail, debts contracted by the heir are not null; and that adjudication is not excluded. This is a competent action at the instance of an onerous creditor; and to dispose of it, we must consider the terms of the entail. Among the prohibitions we have enumerated the contracting of debts, which shows that the entail had in view that manner of breaking the entail, and he ought to have guarded against it. The question is, is the estate protected from debts not founded on bonds and obligations, but attempted to be made effectual by the diligence of law? In the irritant clause there are no terms such as facts or deeds whereby the lands may be adjudged, or that debts are to be null and void,—thus striking at the foundation of diligence: nor is there any exclusion per expressum of diligence. This is, therefore, precisely a case where the heirs call upon us to supply what is a defect in the entail. It protects the estate only against bonds and obligations. The prohibition against debts will not do, as the irritant clause must declare them void. If the irritancy therefore be special and limited, and if the creditor can proceed without founding on any thing included under the irritancy, then he is clear of it. I think that this case well illustrates the principles of strict construction.

Lord Medwyn.—I concur, and have no difficulty in doing so. As to the action at the instance of the trustees, I cannot see that they have any right to insist in it. They do not say that there is any debt in their persons against the estate. The other summons is very different, and proceeds upon a decree for a debt; but instead of proceeding to adjudge, the creditor cautiously comes here for a declarator, in the first instance. As to the entail itself, the prohibitory clause is most comprehensive; but the irritant clause, instead of referring generally to the prohibitions, makes an enumeration of them which is defective. The prohibitory clause is directed against the contracting of debts, the granting of bonds and obligations, or any other fact or deed by which the lands might be appraised; but the irritant clause only provides, that if the heir contract debts, then bonds and obligations shall be null and void.

Lord Munceiff.—I agree with your Lordships, that we cannot sustain the action at the instance of the trustees. If it had been stated that a definite debt had been contracted, as in Smith's action, and that the heirs of entail disputed the power to contract such a debt, it would be difficult to refuse to entertain it. In the Tillicoultry case there was first a sale, and then, being questioned, it was tried by a declarator. But this is very different. The summons narrates that a trust was executed by Lord Duffus, but says nothing of a particular debt. Neither do the trustees conclude to have it found that they have a power to sell, but that they are entitled to grant bonds whereby the estate may be adjudged. I cannot go into these propositions. But in the case of Smith he states, that large debts have been contracted to him by the heir of entail; further, he states the nature of the entail, and concludes that he is entitled to adjudge on a decree for his debt. On all the principles of construction, this entail is not effectual against personal debts. If the irritant and resolute clause, subjoined to the prohibitory clause, had been expressed in apt terms, it would have been sufficient. But the things declared to be null are not among the contraventions, and the contraventions are not among the things that are null. There is another omission, in so far as there is no nullity of adjudications or other real diligence. Robertson, 13th June 1820, is precisely in point. The third objection relating to the precept of sasine, was repelled recently in the case of Porterfield.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court decerned and declared in terms of the conclusions of the summons at the instance of Mr Smith, dismissed the action at the instance of the trustees, but found no expenses due in either action.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 102.—PETER M'MILLAN and GILBERT M'KELLAR, Pursuers v. DUNCAN M'CULLOCH, Defender.

Process.—Libel.—Citation.—Agent and Principal.—Company.—Objection to an action, that it was libelled against a party alone, as manager or agent of the Highland Distillery, and that it was so insisted in after the proprietor was named in the defences, without calling the proprietor—sustained, and the action dismissed.

This was an action at the instance of the pursuers, tacksmen of the harbour and shore-dues of the royal burgh of Campbeltown, against Duncan M'Culloch, "manager or agent for the Highland Distillery, residing at or near Dalintober." The action concluded for payment of £48. 7. 7½, being the amount of shore-dues payable by the defender for whisky, barley and coals, shipped off, imported and landed by him at the quays, and within the harbour of Campbeltown. In the defences it was stated, "that the pursuers are in error in making him (who is only manager) a party to this action, in place of Mr George M'Lennan, his employer, and proprietor of the Highland Distillery, and therefore that process falls to be sisted till he is called as a party for his interest." A voluminous record was notwithstanding made up, and a proof led, after which the Sheriff repelled the preliminary objection stated in the defences, and pronounced an interlocutor on the merits. The pursuers advocated the cause, when the Lord Ordinary adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff on the merits, but sustained the preliminary objection and dismissed the action as libelled. The Lord Ordinary annexed the following note to his interlocutor:

"The only point on which the Lord Ordinary differs from the Sheriff is in that part of his interlocutor which repelled the preliminary defences, while it is thought that the objection to the libel, as directed against a party designed as a mere manager or agent, should have been sustained. The objection to such a pursuit in general is considered insuperable, as demonstrated by the cases of King against Shirra, (5 Shaw, 231), and of Russell, 23d May 1837, quoted in the papers. In the latter of these cases the Judges expressed strong opinions as to the expediency, in a mercantile community, of holding this point as finally settled.

"It was indeed alleged here that the agent was a partner of the Highland Distillery; and further, that by the table of regulations, agents and servants are declared responsible for the cargoes of others, 'if the owners are not present.' But no proof of the alleged partnership was brought, and at any rate the summons was directed against the respondent solely as an agent, which was an incompetent ground on the face of the summons for claiming the dues libelled on from the defender. It is equally out of the question to refer to the table of burgh or port-dues, as entitling any burgh to levy dues from a party not liable at common law for such charges. No usage or possession could sanction such a claim at the instance of the magistrates of a burgh, without the authority of Parliament; and the claim was still more untenable when it appears from the record and proof that the company of distillers, for whom the respondent is said to be agent, carry on business, and must consequently have an office within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. Even if there had been no such office, the proprietor of the distillery might have been cited on a supplement.

"On the merits of the case, so far as these depend on the proof, the Lord Ordinary has nothing to add to the brief and accurate summary of the evidence given by the Sheriff-depute in the note annexed to his interlocutor of 21st February 1840. —Printed record, p. 164."

On a reclaiming note, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In respect of the objection stated by the defender, as not being the proper party to be called in the original process, recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find that the objection to this action, as libelled against Duncan M'Culloch alone, as manager or agent of the Highland Distillery, and as so insisted in after the proprietor was named in the defences by the said Duncan M'Culloch, without calling the said proprietor, is well founded, and ought to have been sustained: Therefore dismiss the action, and assoilzie the said Duncan M'Culloch, and decern: Of new find the respondent, the said Duncan M'Culloch, entitled to expenses, both in this Court and in the Inferior Court; allow the accounts," &c.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 103.—HUGH ALLAN, Pursuer, v. The Trustees of ROBERT GLASGOW, Defenders,—Et à contra, Raisers and Claimants.

Trust-Deed—Revocation—Intention—An heritable property having been found to be ineffectually conveyed by a trust-disposition and settlement, in a competition between the testator's heir-at-law and the residuary legatee under a previous settlement, revoked by the trust-disposition only "in so far as inconsistent with these presents"—Held that the heir-at-law was excluded, and that the residuary legatee was to be preferred.

In 1802, Robert Glasgow of Montgreenan executed a trust-disposition and settlement, conveying the whole property, of whatever kind and wherever situated, belonging to him at the time of his death, to trustees, for the purpose of paying debts, and certain sums of money and annuities therein specified, and thereafter destining the free residue of his estates, real and personal, failing lawful heirs of his body, to his natural daughter Mrs Ann Glasgow, now wife of Robert Robertson Glasgow of Montgreenan. This deed reserved the granter's liferent, with full power and liberty to him, at any time of his life, to alter, innovate or revoke the same, and to make such other settlements, deeds or codicils relative to his estate, real and personal, as he should think fit.

The present question is, whether, under the more recent deeds executed by Mr Glasgow, the disposition and settlement of 1802 has been revoked, and rendered of no force or efficacy?

In 1818, Mr Glasgow executed a deed of entail, settling his lands and estates of Montgreenan and others, failing lawful heirs of his own body, upon the husband of his daughter, Ann Glasgow, and their issue in their order. Thereafter, in 1821, Mr Glasgow executed a supplementary deed of entail, and the three following deeds: first, a trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estates and effects in Scotland; second, a will and testament in the English form; and, third, a deed of lease and release in regard to his estates in the West Indies. These several deeds were executed of equal date, 23d June 1821.

The fourth and fifth purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement are declared to be:

"That my said trustees or trustee shall, as soon as they shall have it in their power, from the state of the trust-funds, and as they shall think proper, appropriate and apply such produce or proceeds of my real and personal estate hereby conveyed, to the purchasing of lands or other heritages in Scotland, lying contiguous, or as near as may be to my said lands and estate of Montgreenan in Scotland, as such purchases can be met with, and most conveniently and advantageously made, and take the rights of the lands and other subjects so to be purchased by them, to and in favour of themselves and the survivor of them, as trustees, for the ends, uses, and purposes particularly before and after mentioned. Fifthly, To the end that my said trustees or trustee shall, immediately upon making the said purchases, and having their titles thereto completed, or as soon thereafter as can be, make and execute a deed of entail of the said lands and others so to be purchased by them, settling and disposing the same to and in favour of the said Robert Robertson, Esquire; whom failing, to the other heirs of entail and substitutes named and appointed by me in the said deeds of entail executed by me of my said lands and estate of Montgreenan and others in Scotland, of the 10th day of February 1818, and on the date hereof, which are here specially referred to."

Mr Glasgow died in 1827, and possessed of a property called Seafield, lying at a distance from Montgreenan, the entailed estate.

The trustees having accepted of the trust, completed titles by adjudication in implement to the property which had been conveyed to them generally by the trust-disposition and settlement. This deed contained no power of sale, and the trustees brought an action of declarator, in which they called as defenders Mr Glasgow's heirs of entail and heir-at-law. The summons concluded, that they should be found and declared entitled to sell and dispose of the villa of Seafield, and to give a valid title to the purchaser, and to purchase lands in the vicinity of Montgreenan with the price thereof, and to entail them on the series of heirs mentioned in the former deeds of entail—all in terms of the trust-deed. The Court found and declared in terms of the libel (vide ante, Vol. IV. p. 365), but the judgment was reversed on appeal (vide ante, Vol. VIII. p. 144). This had the effect of taking the unentailed heritage in Scotland out of the trust-deed of 1821. Thereupon the present actions were instituted,—the one a process of multiplepointing at the instance of the trustees, narrating that they had levied and received the rents and produce of the unentailed lands since the death of Mr Glasgow, and that they had already applied, and were willing to apply and distribute the same according to the various directions and appointments of the truster, contained in his trust-disposition and settlement, but had been interrupted therein by the questions which had arisen, and calling into the field the heirs-at-law,—the annuitants and legatees under the settlements,—Mrs Glasgow and her husband for his interest,—and the heirs of entail.

The other action is a process of declarator and count and reckoning at the instance of the heirs-at-law against the trustees, proceeding on the subsumption, that, in the circumstances narrated, the trustees "have no power to sell the lands of Seafield, or any other of the lands and others conveyed in the said trust-disposition, or to apply the price, prices, or produce thereof, for the purpose of entailing lands, in the terms mentioned in said trust-disposition, or for any other purpose therein mentioned;" "seeing that, according to the conception and terms of the said trust-deed, the said heirs-at-law have not been legally displaced, disappointed, or excluded from the said subjects in favour of the said trustees, or of the parties interested in, or favoured by the said trust-deed."

In the conjoined processes, claims, founded on a variety of pleas, were lodged by each of the parties called; but the following pleas stated by Mrs Glasgow were those on which the case was ultimately disposed of:—1. The trust-disposition and settlement of 1802 is sufficient to prevent the deceased from having died intestate, as regards any portion of his succession. 2. By that deed the heirs-at-law of the deceased were effectually exheredated. 3. The claimant, as residuary legatee under the deed, is entitled to the fund in medio, or, at least, as in competition with the heirs ab intestato, she is entitled to such part as shall be found not to belong to the heirs of entail or legatees of the deceased.

In the trust-disposition and settlement of 1821, there is contained a clause of revocation of former settlements in these terms:

"And I do hereby revoke all other former deeds of settlement executed by me in relation to my real and personal estate and effects herein before conveyed, in so far as the same may be inconsistent with these presents, excepting the said two deeds of entail, and a will, conveyance, and lease after the English form, made and executed by me relative to my personal estate in England, or the West Indies, and my property there, all of the date of these presents."

The English will revoked all former wills, codicils, and testamentary dispositions whatsoever, at any time heretofore made.

The Lord Ordinary ordered cases, and made avizandum to the Judges of the Second Division, who appointed the same, and additional cases, to be laid before the Judges of the First Division and permanent Lords Ordinary for their opinions. The following opinions were in consequence returned:

Lord Jeffrey, concurred in by Lords Cockburn and Murray:

"It having been finally settled by the judgment of the House of Lords, that the trustees of Mr Glasgow, though actually vested with a (fiduciary) fee of his unentailed Scotch heritage, had yet no power to sell that property, nor (as I understand the judgment) to apply its proceeds for the purposes of the trust, there are only two questions, as I conceive, that now remain for adjudication,—first, to whom these trustees ought now to make over this property? and, second, under what burdens, or with what rights of relief, it must be so taken or conveyed?

"When the judgment referred to was given, there were no other claimants, as against the trustees and heirs of entail, but the heirs-at-law of the testator; and it was no doubt chiefly with reference to their peculiar rights or privileges that the views and pretensions of these other parties were rejected. Since that time, however, a competing claim has been put forward by Mrs Ann Robertson or Glasgow (a daughter of the testator), on the ground, that as heirs-at-law can only take where there is no valid disposition by the ancestor, she is in this case entitled to exclude them, in virtue of an earlier settlement in her favour in 1802, which she contends must revive and take effect, quoad this property at least, if the later deeds of 1821 are truly inoperative, and incapable of conveying the fee. If she succeed in this claim, there is substantially an end of the present litigation: the whole right of the heirs-at-law being consequently barred, while the trustees, and all the other parties, in effect abet and concur in her pretensions. The first of the questions above stated is therefore a strictly prejudicial question, and must consequently take precedence of all others in the discussion.

"Now, upon this question, I have no hesitation in saying, that my opinion is entirely against this claim of the daughter, and that I think the original destination in her favour, in the deed of 1802, was effectually revoked, and superseded in toto, by the subsequent settlements of 1821. I do not go so much on the words of revocation in these latter deeds (though these are by no means to be disregarded), as on the total diversity in the whole scheme and policy of the two settlements; and the utter impossibility of supposing that the party who executed the latter could intend that, in any contingency, any part of the former should have effect. My view of the matter is shortly this: Both settlements are total or general settlements, and import a destination of the whole property of the testator. But they are fundamentally irreconcilable with each other, and obviously incapable of standing together, not only in their general import and effect, but in every one head and item of their smallest details. The whole trustees and executors are different—the whole legacies and legatees are different; and the destination of the residue is entirely to different persons, and under totally different conditions. The provisions for the daughter, in particular, are of so opposite and inconsistent a nature as to make it a matter, not of probable inference, but of absolute certainty, that it must have been meant to recall the former in toto, when the latter were substituted in their place.

"The first general settlement is contained in a single deed, executed in April 1802. It is in the form of a trust-conveyance to ten several persons—some of whom undoubtedly survived till after 1821—and conveys expressly his whole property and effects, heritable and moveable, in Scotland, the West Indies, or any other place: And after directing the payment of his debts, and certain specific legacies and annuities, appoints the whole free residue to be made over, in fee-simple, to the lawful issue of his own body, if he should have any; or, on failure of such issue, to his daughter, the present claimant, and to other persons in the event of her predecease. In the event of his having lawful issue, her provision is reduced to a legacy of £10,000, payable on her marriage or attaining majority:—And this is the whole of the original settlement, on which she now founds, as still subsisting, at least, as to the unentailed Scotch heritage. It reserved, of course, the fullest powers of revocation; and, without any such reservation, was indisputably liable, in its own nature, to be totally evacuated by any subsequent and inconsistent arrangement.

"The second and last general settlement was effected by four several deeds, which are all, however, to be taken together, and were, in fact, executed unico contextu, and with express reference to each other, in June 1821. Such, at least, I think, is now to be taken as the true date of this last or subsisting general settlement—for though one important part of it, the first entail of Montgreenan, was actually made in 1818, yet, as it was added to, and substantially completed by, a supplementary deed, of equal date with the others in June 1821, the whole entailed disposition may properly be held to have been deliberately confirmed and granted de novo as at that period, when it was for the first time adopted and incorporated into the general settlement, which was then undoubtedly completed, and left to govern the entire succession of the testator at his death. Now, the slightest sketch of the import and tenor of this last settlement will suffice, I think, to show how necessarily its execution implied (even if it had not expressed) the total and final revocation of the former.

"It consisted then, as I have said, of four main branches.—First, the entail and supplementary entail (the last being dated 23d June 1821) of the principal property of Montgreenan; in which it is very remarkable that his daughter is not called to the succession in any event, either as heir or institute; the destination being, first, to his own lawful issue, and on failure of such issue, to Robert Robertson, the husband of his daughter, and the issue of their marriage; whom failing, to other substitutes.

"Then comes, of the same date, June 1821, a last will and testament in the English form, making over the whole of his property, of every description, out of Scotland, to eight several executors or trustees,—no one of whom is the same with any of those in the deed of 1802,—for the purpose of paying all his lawful debts, and a great number of large legacies there specified; including an annuity of £3000 a-year to his daughter and her husband, and no less than £30,000 to their younger children. I do not see the least reason to doubt that this deed was intended to convey, and did effectually convey, to the trustees, the whole West India property of the testator; and indeed, as they are anxiously enjoined immediately to sell what is so conveyed, and out of the proceeds to pay these large legacies, and all the debts; and as the daughter now says, and the fact is not disputed, that he never had any heritable property whatever out of Scotland, except that in the West Indies, and very little personal,—it seems to me very plain, that it was mainly, if not entirely for the purpose of conveying his large West Indian estates, that this anxious and elaborate deed, containing full directions for the sale of all the 'lands, messuages, and real estate thereby conveyed,' was framed and executed.

"Nor does it appear to me that the slightest doubt is thrown upon this by the fact, that he also left behind him, in the third place, a supplementary or additional deed (of the same date of June 1821), having express relation to this West India property. This, too, is in the English form, and is entitled a lease and release, whereby the whole West India property is again made over, in a new technical form, to the very same trustees and executors as those in the general will—under burden of all debts affecting that property, and of all legacies which have been or may be left by any will or testamentary writing. The immediate object or use of this last deed I do not of course presume professionally to understand. But it appears to me to have been intended to give the executors more ready and advantageous access to the properties, and to vest them with a more authoritative title than they might have had under the general will alone, to which this deed is obviously relative and ancillary, and of which indeed, as being executed unico contextu, and in favour of the same parties, it can only be regarded as exegetic or complementary. I have omitted to mention, that the leading instruction in both these deeds is to invest the whole residue, after payment of debts and legacies, in the purchase of lands to be entailed along with those of Montgreenan.

"The fourth and last part of the general settlement of 1821 is the trust-deed more immediately in question, and of equal date with the three former, whereby the testator makes over to the same eight trustees and executors, as in the two last-mentioned deeds, the whole of his properties of every description in Scotland, except only his entailed estates, under burden of his debts and legacies generally, and of certain specific legacies mentioned in the body of it, including one to his daughter and her husband, of his whole plate, furniture, library, &c.,—with a concluding instruction, parallel to that in the two other deeds, to invest the whole free residue in lands to be entailed with Montgreenan. The general will contains, however needlessly, an express and absolute revocation of all former wills and testamentary dispositions; while this trust-deed, of equal date, also expressly revokes 'all former deeds and settlements in relation to the subjects herein conveyed, in so far as inconsistent with these presents—excepting only the said two deeds of entail, and a will, conveyance, and lease after the English form, relative to my estates in England or the West Indies.'

"Now, whether these clauses of revocation are looked to, or the general tenor of the settlements in which they occur, I think it equally clear, that, by their execution, the whole former settlement was funditus and totally recalled. I should hold this to be pretty clearly the case even as to the special legacies given by that former settlement; for though their subsistence might not be directly inconsistent with the tenor of those last executed, yet, considering that both were general settlements—that the original legacies (very few in number) were charged indiscriminately upon the whole fee-simple succession, and only directed to be paid by certain trustees from the undivided succession then placed in their hands—and that, twenty years after, the whole of that property was taken finally away from these original trustees—a very great part of it, viz., the large entailed estate, undoubtedly discharged of all legacies, and the remainder placed in the hands of an entire new set of trustees, who had no connection with, or knowledge of the former deed, with specific directions to pay out of its proceeds, not these, but certain other enumerated legacies, to entirely different persons, and to a very large amount,—it would seem difficult to doubt that the whole of these original bequests must be held to have been recalled; and the declared burdens which are alone noticed in that ultimate settlement, or in any way intimated to the present trustees, to have been the only burdens with which it was intended to affect it. The case is very nearly as if the original legacies had been charged exclusively upon a particular property, and that property had been afterwards alienated for obviously inconsistent purposes.

"But however this may be as to the original legacies, or the original legatees, to whom nothing whatever is left by the new settlement, it really seems impossible to doubt that at all events the whole original provisions for the daughter were finally recalled, and that it would be directly and palpably inconsistent to hold that any of these could be claimed along with those in the last set of instruments. The first provisions were an alternative legacy of £10,000, or (in the event which has happened) a right to take in fee-simple the whole free property, of every denomination. By the new settlement, however, she is most certainly to have neither of these things; but in their place, and as an entire new provision, she is to get, along with her husband, a joint annuity of £3000 a-year, with a legacy of plate, books and furniture—to have her husband institute, and her children first heirs in the new entail—to have £30,000 for her younger children—and the whole farm-stock and utensils upon the entailed property for her husband. The question then is—not whether this was or was not an adequate compensation for the annulment of the former provisions,—for the testator was entitled to annul all these without any compensation at all,—but whether the granting of this new provision did not necessarily import the total annulment of the old? and upon this I do not see how there can well be a doubt.

"The words of revocation are—'in so far as inconsistent with these presents.' But could 'these presents,' which did not leave a particle of heritage in fee-simple to any one, but directed the whole property, after paying debts and legacies, to be entailed to the entire exclusion of the daughter, be in any way consistent with a settlement which had no entail in contemplation, but left the great mass of the property directly to that daughter in fee-simple? Looking to the tenor of the deed, therefore, in which it occurs, the clause of revocation, I should say, must be read as if it had run in terms like these—'and whereas I now mean to make new provisions for my daughter and her family, entirely inconsistent with those in my original settlement, I hereby revoke absolutely, and annul in toto the whole of these former provisions; in which case it does not seem to be disputed that the revocation would have been conclusive, even if the last settlement (from being made on deathbed, want of due execution, or otherwise), had proved altogether ineffectual. But the important thing here is, that that settlement has taken effect in almost all its particulars—and especially that the claimant has got (or will get) all that was intended for her by that deed—and will in fact suffer no substantial prejudice by the subjects in dispute being taken by the heirs-at-law. Not only is she and her husband in possession of the whole rents of the entailed estate, with all its stocking and pertinents, as part of the goods in communion, and her younger children provided in £30,000, which was plainly the main remuneration contemplated when the former provisions were withdrawn,—but she herself is in the enjoyment of her annuity of £3000, and her legacy of plate and furniture. But besides, if the other available funds are sufficient to pay the debts and legacies, the only persons having any interest in the present question are the heirs of entail, in whose number she is not included; and that this is truly the condition of matters may be safely enough assumed from the fact, that, till very lately, theirs was the only interest set forth by the acting trustees, one of whom is this very claimant, the daughter herself; and even if the other funds should prove inadequate for payment of the debts and legacies, the only parties who could be affected by the heirs-at-law succeeding in their vindication of the subjects in dispute, would be the creditors and legatees. But as it is only to the residue of the Scotch property, after satisfying all these, that she was originally provided by the deed of 1802, it is plain that, in such an event, nothing whatever would remain to be taken by her under that settlement. In any view, therefore, she has really no interest to maintain that that deed should still be held as subsisting.

"She refers to certain cases as to the effect of revocations occurring in deeds which were reducible on the head of deathbed. But nothing, I think, can be more unfortunate than such a reference. In the first place, there is nothing parallel in the principle on which effect is given or denied to revocations on deathbed, and that which allows or disallows them in cases like the present. In all these latter cases intention alone is looked to, and there is truly no question as to power; whereas a deathbed deed is always annulled, in a question with the heir, as being ultra vires, or rather, as not being truly the deed of the party; and accordingly, if the settlement of 1821 had been challengeable on that ground, the fundamental conveyance of the Scotch heritage to the trustees would have fallen in toto, and no question ever been raised as to its being applicable, or not applicable to the purposes of the trust; whereas, in the actual case, the trustees are infeft on a confessedly valid conveyance to them; and the only question is, for what purposes, or for whose behoof, they shall now dispose of it? But, in the next place, the whole doctrine established by the decisions referred to, is, when properly considered, entirely adverse to the views of the claimant, and, in fact, of itself sufficient to exclude her present pretensions. It is settled, no doubt, that the mere execution on deathbed of an inconsistent disposition of heritage, will not be held per se to revoke a former revocable settlement, so as to let in the challenge of the heir-at-law; because such a disposition, in the event of such a challenge, would be a mere nullity; and the effect of the challenge, therefore, would necessarily be, to leave things exactly as they were before it was executed—and, consequently, on the footing of the former settlement. But wherever there is an express revocation of former settlements, though contained in a deed which is inoperative against the heir in respect of deathbed, it is equally well settled that such a revocation is effectual, and that no one can found, either against the heir-at-law or any one else, upon these former settlements. In the remarkable case of Crawford and Coutts, an attempt was made to amalgamate or combine both these rules, by a clause of revocation very peculiarly expressed; and it was a question of some difficulty to determine what effect should be given to it. But neither of the rules themselves was doubted of, or has ever since been brought into dispute: and it seems plain to me, that the present case is distinctly within the principle of the last. The very fact, indeed, that there was thought to be great difficulty in Crawford's case, satisfies me that there could have been none whatever as to this. It was there attempted to exclude the challenge of the heir-at-law, by an ambiguous or implied saving of that of the donee in a former deed, to this limited effect, though all former settlements were generally revoked. In short, it was an indirect attempt to make the revocation of those earlier deeds depend upon the latter being allowed to subsist; and the greatest doubts were entertained as to the competency of effecting such a purpose, even by words introduced for that very object. In this Court, however, they were found to be effectual: But in the House of Lords, even this plain expression of intention was found to be unavailing, and the heir's right to challenge was admitted, in consequence of the general words of revocation, though so significantly qualified. In the present case, however, there is not the slightest indication of any such purpose being entertained. The revocation has no reference whatever to the ultimate validity of the deed in which it is contained, but only to the consistency or inconsistency of its actual tenor with that of any former settlement. The words, in my opinion, can possibly bear no other sense; since I am unable to conceive how one deed can be found to be consistent or inconsistent with another, except by collating the several provisions which they actually contain; and it does appear to me to be nothing less than simply unintelligible to say, that though their written tenor is wholly irreconcilable, they might become consistent by one of them proving ineffectual! That the one may no longer stand in the way of the other, in such an event, may be very true; but when it is confessedly settled, even in these favourable cases of deathbed, that an express revocation will still have effect, though contained in a deed wholly inoperative quoad ultra, the plain result is, that both deeds must, in all such cases, be found ineffectual, and neither of them capable of displacing the heir-at-law. In the present case, the revocation is as express as words can make it, and the inconsistency of the two deeds as indisputable; and therefore, unless it can be maintained, in the face of all the authorities, that a revocation must in all cases be sopite by the deed containing it proving inoperative, it is obvious that the claimant would have no case, even if the whole of the last general settlement of 1821 had been found incapable of execution, and she left accordingly without any provision under either. But when it appears that, on the contrary, she has actually been secured in the whole of these inconsistent provisions, it must appear altogether extravagant to maintain that she is yet entitled to exclude the heirs-at-law, as the undivested donee under that earlier settlement.

"Holding it then to be clear, that the heirs-at-law are the only parties now entitled to claim these heritable subjects from the trustees, the only remaining questions are—1st, Whether they are entitled to take them free from the debts and legacies with which the whole succession was burdened by the settlement of 1821? And 2dly, If they are liable for a share of those debts and legacies, whether, and to what extent, they are entitled to relief from those who take the other trust-properties?

"Both these questions are attended with difficulty, and I cannot say that I have absolutely made up my mind as to the first of them. But the inclination of my opinion is, that the heirs are now entitled to take these subjects freed from the purposes of the trust; liable, of course, as successors titulo lucrativo, to the debts of the defunct, and as representing him; but entitled to a total relief from those who have no other title to the rest of the trust-property than a disposition expressly burdening it with these debts.

"The chief difficulty in the way of this opinion arises on the cases of Erskine's Trustees, Hamilton and Campbell, referred to in the case for the heirs of entail. But I have already stated (in the note to my interlocutor of 13th March 1839) that these cases differ entirely from the present, in this important particular, that the parties there found liable for their share of legacies and provisions, had no other title to the subjects, which they took bodily from the want of a power of sale, than the trust-deed itself, which had burdened all that was contained in it with these legacies; whereas the heirs here take jure sanguinis, and by a title independent of the trust-deed altogether. In these cases, the parties, taking under the deed, were most justly held bound by the deed; and the judgments, in so far as they touched the point now at issue, in truth proceeded on the plain principle of approve and reprobate. It is very true, that in the present case the heirs must take from the trustees; and do not and cannot challenge the general conveyance under which these trustees are now infeft in these properties. But they assuredly take no benefit under that conveyance, and cannot therefore be held to approve it, in the sense of law; and above all, they do not, like the parties in those other cases, take from these trustees, by the express act or gift of the truster, but by their own inherent legal rights as his natural representatives: And, although the trust is construed into a trust for their behoof (because trustees can never have anything but a fiduciary holding,) still it is a trust constituted and created by the operation of the law alone; and, not being derived from the will or bounty of the ancestor, cannot be affected by the qualities and conditions which he could effectually attach to provisions having no other origin.

"This is the best ground, perhaps, on which to rest the opinion to which I incline. But even if it were thought more consonant with principle or legal theory, to account for the constitution or emergence of a trust for the heirs, by the supposition (or fiction rather) of an intention to that effect on the part of the truster, I should think that the only form such an intention could assume, consistently with what is now fixed in law and admitted in fact, would, if embodied in explicit language, be substantially to this effect:—'I make over all my property to you my trustees (except my entailed estates), and desire you to vest yourselves with it immediately on my death—and then I direct you to sell and turn the whole into money, except my Scotch heritage; and out of the money so realised, to pay my debts and legacies.—But you are not to sell the Scotch heritage; but to find out my heirs-at-law, and convey to them, to be held by them as if they had succeeded to it ab intestato.' Considering that the trustees are in point of fact legally vested with this property, and yet directed to pay the debts and legacies only out of the proceeds of what is conveyed to them—that it has been finally decided that the heirs-at-law are not displaced or excluded from this Scotch heritage; and that, as it cannot be sold or disposed of by the trustees, there can never be any proceeds of it in their hands—it really appears to me that the only way of reconciling the law and the facts, and of explicating the resulting rights of the parties, is to hold (or assume) that the views of the truster (or of the law operating on what has been effectually done by him) had been embodied in some such words as the preceding. The only other way, indeed, in which such a trust for the heirs-at-law could have been directly expressed, would have been by still directing the trustees (as above) to keep the Scotch heritage unsold, and to make it over to the heirs-at-law, 'but only in order that they might, out of its proceeds, pay their proper share of my debts and legacies, and take nothing but the surplus to themselves,'—an arrangement which, as implying that these unknown heirs-at-law were in truth to be nominated as a subordinate and additional set of trust-disponees, and associated as such with those originally appointed, in a joint administration of the property, and in the settlement of debts and legacies, and questions of relief among the different beneficiaries, does appear to me a great deal more irreconcilable, either with the settled law of the case, or the general frame and policy of the deed, than that first suggested.

"But even on the supposition that the heirs are to take the lands burdened with a share of the debts and legacies, there still remains the question as to the particular share which should be imposed on them, or the order in which they and the other beneficiaries should be made liable? Now upon this question I have never had any serious difficulty. I hold it to be quite impossible to maintain that the burden of these debts and legacies is laid on the Scotch properties conveyed by the trust-deed of June 1821, in any respect more onerously or directly than on the West India and other foreign properties conveyed by the other deeds of the same date; or that there is the least pretence for holding that these last properties were entitled to relief from the former; or only to be liable subsidiarie, and after these were exhausted. I take it, on the contrary, to be too plain to admit of question, that the whole were subjected equally, and intended to be made liable pari passu; in so far as the nature of the several properties themselves did not entitle some of them to exemption or relief upon common principles of law: For, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, I think it impossible to doubt that the ordinary rules of ranking, and rights of relief, as between heir and executor, for example, or fiar and liferenter, can never be held to be superseded, but must have effect, in the ultimate accounting under a trust, exactly as in the settlement of debts, and distribution of property, in ordinary succession ab intestato. Now it is upon a plain application of these familiar rules, that I come to the conclusion that the heirs-at-law in the present case, taking a land estate as such in forma specifica, are entitled to relief of all moveable debts and legacies from those who take the executry of the debtor or testator, whether directly as nearest of kin, or as special legatees, or beneficiaries under a trust-settlement: And then it only requires, for the practical decision of the question, to consider, that as the last will and the lease and release, not only grant power, but expressly direct and enjoin that the whole heritable subjects thereby conveyed should be sold and turned into money immediately on the death of the testator; so there can be no doubt that in all questions with the trustees and executors under these last deeds, this direction must be held to have been duly obeyed, and that the whole foreign property in their hands must now be considered and dealt with as actual executry. And upon this ground alone, I hold the heirs entitled to relief; or in other words, only liable after the whole personal estate has been applied and exhausted.

"I do not think it necessary to say anything as to the extravagant proposition of the trustees, that they should keep the property in question unsold, in perpetuity, and make over the annual proceeds to the heirs of entail—except merely, that it is not only wholly without warrant from the trust-deed itself, but, as I think, in manifest contradiction to its most express injunctions, as well as to the opinions judicially delivered in the House of Lords, to the effect that the heirs-at-law had not been displaced or excluded from their right of succession by the tenor of that deed.

"The opinion which I have thus formed, would give the heirs right, as I conceive, to the whole rents and profits of the subjects from the period of the ancestor's death: For the doctrine of bona fide perception and consumption appears plainly inapplicable; and I do not see how, in a question with beneficiaries under a trust, it is possible to stop short of this conclusion; the heirs, however, being always liable for a rateable share of the expenses of the trust-management."

Lord Mackenzie, concurred in by Lords Gillies and Cunningham:

"I rather think, that in this case the heirs-at-law are excluded, by the trust-disposition 1802, from all right to the subjects in dispute, i. e., the Scotch unentailed heritable subjects. This trust-disposition undoubtedly carries these subjects away from the heirs-at-law, if it be not revoked. Now, this trust-disposition 1802 is not revoked absolutely in the trust-disposition 1821, relating to the estates and effects in Scotland; but is revoked only 'in so far as the same may be inconsistent with these presents.' The English will 1821, indeed, which conveys the English property of the testator, contains an absolute revocation of prior deeds; but that, I think, must be held applicable only to deeds relating to English property; and not applicable at all to deeds disposing of heritage in Scotland, which fall under the qualified revocation of the Scotch trust-disposition of the same date as the English will. I cannot construe the English will so as to make it contradict the Scotch trust-disposition of the same date in regard to Scotch heritable subjects. That qualification must, I think, have effect given to it; for it is express. It might be inserted with a view to exclude the heirs-at-law from the chance of pleading the law of deathbed. But whatever was the reason for inserting it, there it stands, an express qualification of the revocation of the trust-disposition 1802. By that qualification, the trust-disposition 1802 is revoked, in so far as it may be inconsistent with the Scotch trust-disposition 1821. But in so far as it may not be inconsistent with this Scotch trust-disposition 1821, it is not revoked. These last negative words, indeed, are not expressed, but they are implied with perfect and complete certainty from the express limitation; and the implication cannot have an effect less than the explicit expression of the negative would have had. Past all question, I think the matter stands just where it would have stood if the disponent had said,—‘I revoke the trust 1802 in so far as may be inconsistent with this present deed; but in so far as it may not be inconsistent with this deed, I declare that the trust-deed 1802 shall stand unrevoked.’ The question then comes to be, is this trust-deed 1802 inconsistent with the deed 1821, in relation to the subject now in dispute? Now, I think that it is not; for this reason: The effect of the judgment of the House of Lords, substantially, is just to take the Scotch unentailed heritage out of the trust-deed 1821 altogether. For, as the effect of that judgment is to establish that the trustees have no power to dispose of the unentailed Scotch heritage for any of the purposes of the trust 1821, it must follow, I think, that truly it is not conveyed to them in trust at all. It is said it may be held to be conveyed, in order to be by them conveyed over to the heir-at-law. As an arrangement merely between the heir and the trustees, such a thing may possibly be admitted by a kind of fiction of law. But in substance we may, I think, be quite sure that this was not the intention of the truster, and that he never made his trust in order to pass his heritage to his heir-at-law. His intention was just the reverse. It was to exclude his heirs-at-law from having any right as such heirs to this property. That intention he has, in respect to certain subjects, failed to express effectively; and so the heir-at-law claims the subject. But that claim rests not on any conjecture of the truster's intention, but on a failure of the truster to express that intention. It comes just to this, that the trustees 1821 ought not to take this subject, because the trust-deed gives them no powers to execute any of the purposes of the trust in regard to it, and the disposition in that deed is given to the trustees only in trust, and for the purposes of the trust. They ought to leave it to the heir-of-law, as not disposed of at all by the truster. The heir may perhaps, in form, state it as vested in the trustees, though sine causa, and plead that they ought to convey it over to him. But his plea in substance rests on this, that the trustees never had right to touch it at all, and that substantially the trust-deed 1821 does not include it at all. Now, in that view, how can it be said, that in relation to this subject, the deed 1802 is inconsistent with the deed 1821? The trust-deed 1802 disposes of this subject. The deed 1821 does not dispose of it at all. How can the disposal of this subject, by the deed 1802, be inconsistent with the non-disposal of it by the deed 1821, or with the disposal of other subjects by the deed 1821? That I am unable to see. It is said that the whole tenor of the deed 1821 is inconsistent with every part of the deed 1802. That certainly is so, if the deed 1821 be read so as to dispose of the Scotch unentailed heritage. But if that unentailed heritage is not disposed of at all by the deed 1821, then this proposition does not seem to be true. One deed of conveyance cannot, I think, be inconsistent with another deed, where the operation of the first deed does not hinder the second deed from having full and entire effect according to its own tenor, precisely as if that first deed had never existed. I think, then, that the heir-at-law is excluded by the trust-deed 1802, which still carries the subject in dispute.

“What is to be the effect, then, of the deed 1802? I do not think that question is so before us as to enable us to decide upon it, nor is such decision perhaps necessary. If the heir-at-law be excluded, the other parties interested do not seem to differ as to the disposal of the subjects falling under the deed 1802, in which they only are interested.”

Lord Fullerton :

“I agree with Lord Mackenzie.

“The point is certainly not free from difficulty,—a difficulty much increased, if not created, by the omission of all mention of the trust-deed 1802 in the discussion in the former action, which terminated in the judgment of the House of Lords. It is also to be regretted, perhaps, that this point, I mean the claim of Mrs Robertson Glasgow under the deed 1802, has attracted so little attention in these pleadings. But informed as I am at present, looking at the import of the judgment of the House of Lords, and the grounds on which it appears from the report to have been pronounced, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that expressed in the preceding opinion, viz., that the beneficial interests created in favour of Mrs Robertson Glasgow by the deed 1802, were not, in so far as regards lands situate in Scotland, effectually revoked by the deed 1821; and that consequently the heir-at-law was, and still is, excluded by the deed 1802.”

Lord President (Boyle) :

“I am disposed to hold, that the fair result of the judgment pronounced by the House of Lords, in the case that depended between the trustees and the heirs-at-law of the late Mr Glasgow of Montgreenan, reversing the decision of this Court with regard to the property of Seafield, part of his unentailed lands, that these lands are not effectually carried by his trust-deed, executed in 1821, in favour of any persons whatsoever, and that any claim that his heirs-at-law may assert to them, has not been affected by any of its provisions. Accordingly, the summons of declarator at the instance of the heirs-at-law that has since been raised, concludes, ‘that according to the conception and terms of the said trust-deed, the heirs-at-law have not been legally displaced, disappointed, or excluded from the said subjects, in favour of the trustees, or of the parties interested in or favoured by the said trust-deed;’ and on this principle it is maintained throughout their pleadings, that they take jure sanguinis alone the unentailed lands, which in reality must be held as not included under the trust-deed of 1821.

“It is at any rate clear beyond all question, that these unentailed lands are not conveyed, or directed to be conveyed, to the heirs-at-law of the granter, either in reality or under any fiction, to favour whom none of Mr Glasgow's deeds indicate indeed the most distant intention. But if these lands have been disposed of to any other person or persons than the heirs-at-law, by any other valid deed, either under the denomination of lands belonging to, or that might belong to the granter at the time of his death, effect must be given to that deed, if it has not been revoked. Now, it is plainly manifest, that by the trust-deed of settlement executed by Mr Glasgow in 1802, his whole estates, real and personal, including consequently the unentailed lands that he might die possessed of, were conveyed to trustees, by whom the residue thereof, after fulfilling other purposes, was directed, on failure of heirs of the granter's body, to be made over to and in favour of Ann Glasgow, his natural daughter, now Mrs Robertson Glasgow, to the absolute exclusion of his heirs-at-law, whose right of succession was thus entirely cut off.

“It is said, however, that by the trust-deed of 1821, relative to Mr Glasgow's heritable and moveable estate in Scotland, the deed of 1802 was effectually revoked, and it certainly is by this deed alone that any revocation can be held to be established; because the English will, executed of the same date, however ample its revocation of former wills may be held to be, cannot, in my opinion, operate as a revocation of a settlement of Scottish heritage, nor could it ever be intended as such. What, then, are the words of revocation in the trust-deed of 1821? The clause runs thus:—‘And I do hereby revoke all former deeds of settlement executed by me in relation to my real and personal estate and effects hereinbefore conveyed, in so far as the same may be inconsistent with these presents, excepting the said two deeds of entail, and a will, conveyance, and lease,’ &c.

“Now, nothing can be clearer, than that the above is not an absolute revocation of all former settlements. It is only a qualified one, and solely applicable to deeds, ‘in so far as the same may be inconsistent with these presents.’ Whatever deeds are consistent with the deed in which this limited revocation is contained, according to the declared purpose of the granter, shall not be held as thereby revoked. Now, whatever may have been the object which the granter had in view by so restricting the effect of his revocation, there is no ground on which it can be denied effect. If, then, the trust-deed 1821, whatever may be its effect as to other subjects, has not disposed of, or affected the unentailed lands belonging to the granter, but has in reality left them as entirely open to the claims of the heirs-at-law as if it had never existed, it is not easy to see how the deed of 1802, which did contain a direct disposal of the granter's whole estate, including his unentailed property, can be held as inconsistent with that of 1821, as both deeds may still be effectual for their respective purposes, without any inconsistency whatever. On these grounds, and for the other reasons assigned by Lord Mackenzie, I concur in his Lordship's opinion."

Lord Ivory declined giving any opinion, having been counsel in the cause.

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I have considered the cases carefully, and feel great difficulty, but I incline to agree with the majority of the consulted Judges. Had the later settlements not contained such a qualified revocation of the one in 1802, I would have held it revoked, as it differs in so many particulars from those last. But the revocation is restricted to the terms, "in so far as inconsistent with these presents." The conveyance is said to be insufficient, because the House of Lords found that it was inoperative as to the unentailed lands; but still the deed is not null and ineffectual. It is a good conveyance to the trustees, who must convey either to the heirs-at-law or to Mrs Glasgow. The testator showed his intention, by his trust-deed, not to convey to her fully as much as he can be supposed to have done against his heirs-at-law. I own I am at a great loss whom to prefer; but the deed of 1802 does not seem to be inconsistent with that of 1821.

Lord Manareiff.—I concur with the opinion of Lord Jeffrey; and it is so very full, that I need not go into details. The deed of 1802 was not a special conveyance of lands to Mrs Glasgow, but a general settlement, superseded and revoked by the deed of 1821. Although there were no special revocation, it would be implied. The two deeds cannot stand together. Mrs Glasgow's claim appears to be an ingenious scheme for defeating the judgment of the House of Lords; but I am of opinion that her plea is not well-founded in law.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I regret with Lord Fullerton that the argument in these cases has been conducted so exclusively against the heirs-at-law. The heirs-at-law first maintained that they were entitled to take the unentailed lands directly; but that view failing, they now follow it up and say, that the trustees hold the lands under the burden of denuding in their favour; that there are no trust-purposes applicable to the unentailed property, and hence, that the trustees must reconvey to them; that if the heirs-at-law had appeared in the adjudication in implement, it would not have been granted, seeing the trustees would have been bound just to reconvey; and in their additional case they state their claim jure sanguinis, and irrespective of the trust-deed altogether. They show that the trust-purposes don't apply to the unentailed lands; that in truth the trust-deed is silent as to them; and this is necessary for their case. For if there were any one purpose of the trust which could be, under the trust, worked out and satisfied from the unentailed lands, the law would effectuate the trust-deed to that extent. This being the nature of their pleas, it is necessary to determine the effect of the clause of revocation in the deed 1821, and I am of opinion that it does not revoke the deed of 1802. What is the effect on former deeds of a clause of revocation in one which conveyed lands to trustees for certain purposes which could not be extricated? The truster revokes all former deeds, as the same may be inconsistent with these presents. He makes reference to the effect of such a revocation when these deeds shall be brought into collision, and compared upon this principle, that the former are to stand recalled, in so far as inconsistent with the latter, and no farther. The testator has provided for such a question as has here occurred;—if the conveyance to the trustees be not sufficient, and if the ultimate trust be not effectual, the former is not to fall. He had no intention of dying intestate. If the last trust be not applicable to the unentailed lands, is not this a case where the first is not inconsistent with the second? The testator does not leave it on implied revocation, but on a question of law, viz., the legal construction of two deeds, as interpreted by a Court of law. He does not leave it to the Court to say merely what was his intention, but what are the effects of the two deeds, and the extent to which the former is inconsistent with the latter. If the deed of 1821 gives no directions as to the unentailed lands, the deed of 1802 must subsist. The intention of the testator would be violated, if we were first to hold the deed of 1821 silent, and then that the deed of 1802, containing directions, was revoked. I am therefore of opinion, that according to the clause of revocation and the intention of the testator, the deed of 1802 was not revoked. His Lordship stated, that Lord Meadowbank had authorised him to say, that he concurred with the opinion of the Lord Justice-General and Lord Mackenzie.

The Court preferred the claim of Mrs Glasgow, and allowed expenses to both parties out of the trust-funds.

Bankrupt Act, § 4—Deceased Debtor.

An application was made for the sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor before the expiration of six months from his death, but with the concurrence of his executor. The heir was a pupil; and a factor loco tutoris having been appointed, also concurred. The Lord Ordinary thought the duty of a factor was rather to realise and preserve the estate, than to concur in its alienation; and was advised that the factor should apply to the Court for special authority to concur.

Agent and Client—Auditor's Report—Objection.

A client, dissatisfied with the party to whom the Sheriff had remitted certain business-accounts which he was owing to his law-agent, to be taxed, brought the cause into the Court of Session; and the Court, at his own suggestion, remitted to the Sheriff-clerk of Inverness-shire instead. On the day fixed for the taxing, the client intimated that he meant to apply to the Court for leave to appeal their interlocutor to the House of Lords, and required the Sheriff-clerk to postpone executing the remit. He proceeded, however, with the taxing; but it being in the absence of the client, he objected to the report, and craved to have an opportunity afforded him of stating his objections to the accounts. The Court approved, and decerned.

Process—Bill-Chamber—Extractor—It is incompetent for the Inner-House to decern for expenses in a case in the Bill-Chamber.

The Lord Ordinary on the bills having refused a bill of suspension with expenses, the suspender reclaimed to the Inner-House. On advising the reclaiming note their Lordships adhered, found expenses due, and remitted to the auditor to tax the account, and report. The taxed amount was afterwards decerned for by the Inner-House. The process being transmitted to the extractor of Court, he declined to issue an extract, in respect it was Bill-Chamber procedure, and that the expenses ought to have been decerned for there. A note was boxed to the Court stating this, and craving their Lordships to delete the interlocutor approving of the auditor's report, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary on the bills to decern for the account. On moving the note on Friday last, the case was delayed for inquiry into the form. In the meantime, the following memorandum, which had been obtained by the agents from Mr Parker, was laid before the Lord Justice-Clerk:

"The Judges of the Inner-House, in reviewing an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, are sitting as a Court of review in the Bill-Chamber. The proceedings are not in the Court of Session, and indeed cannot be, until the bill is passed and brought before a Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House, in the form prescribed by the Advocacy and Suspension Act (1838). Accordingly,

"1st, Where a reclaiming note complains of an interlocutor refusing a bill of suspension in the Bill-Chamber, and their Lordships intend to alter,—they recal the interlocutor reclaimed against, but they do not pass the bill. They remit to the Lord Ordinary to pass it. 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 46.

"2d, If the reclaiming note complain of a judgment passing a bill, and their Lordships intend to alter, they do so, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the bill, with or without expenses, as the Court may direct. See the same Statute and section.

"3d, In like manner, where the bill has been refused in the Bill-Chamber, with expenses, and the Court intend to adhere with costs, they 'refuse the reclaiming note, find additional expenses due, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to modify and decern for the same.' The proceedings are then retransmitted to the Bill-Chamber, where the account is given in, taxed, and decerned for. The Bill-Chamber Clerks issue the certificates or extracts of all judgments in Bill-Chamber cases."

On resuming consideration of the written note today, the Court granted the prayer thereof, and remitted to the Bill-Chamber accordingly.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 108.—THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Appellants, v. ADAM CHRISTIE and OTHERS, Respondents.

Trust, Latent—Bankrupt—Statute 1661, c. 24—Reduction—Completing Titles—Ancestor—Heir—Guarantee—Security—Cash-Credit—Thomas Allan, partner of the firm of Robert Allan and Son, bankers in Edinburgh, was infest as absolute proprietor of two estates which were purchased by him with funds belonging to the firm, and in the books of the firm, accounts were kept relative to, and in the name of these estates, in which the disbursements by the firm, in the purchase-money, improvements, &c., were put to the debit, and the rents drawn were carried to the credit of the accounts. Robert Allan and Son got a cash-credit from the Royal Bank, and in security and repayment of their operations thereon, gave their joint bond as a company and as individuals—Thomas Allan at the same time disposing one of the foresaid estates in farther security. In less than a year after Thomas Allan's death, his son and heir, also a partner of the firm, which was continued under the same name after Thomas's death, granted to the Royal Bank a second bond and disposition in security over the two foresaid estates, in consideration of an additional loan to the firm—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That these estates were the private property of the deceased partner, and not held in trust by him for the company: 2. That being so, the conveyance by his son, within a year after his death, was null and void, under the second branch of Statute 1661, c. 24, prohibiting dispositions by apparent heirs to the prejudice of their ancestor's creditors: 3. That the company was dissolved by the death of the partner, and that without any notification to the public or to customers, although the articles of copartnership provided specially, "that, in the event of the death of any partner, his heirs shall not be entitled to examine the books of the company; but the survivors shall make up a statement of the deceased's account, counting up to the first balance after the decease, and attest the same by their signatures or oath, if required; and such statement, signed and attested, shall be held as sufficient, and shall preclude any right to further examination by the heirs or others." 4. That the first bond and disposition in security was not a continuing guarantee, but became inoperative on the death of the partner by the change in the company which then took place; and, 5. That the cash-credit having been operated upon subsequently to the death of the partner, in the same manner and under the same firm as before, and the account being kept by the bank as a continuous account, a balance standing against the company at the date of the partner's death, was cleared off by payments afterwards made by the surviving partners. 6. Observed by the Lord Chancellor, that the principle recognised in the case of Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Merivale, 530, is applicable in its full extent to the present case.

The company of Robert Allan and Son carried on business for many years as bankers in Edinburgh; and, during the period of its subsistence, there were various changes in the individuals composing the firm. Upwards of twenty years ago, the late Mr Thomas Allan, who had then the sole interest in the concern, assumed his cousin, Mr Alexander Wight, as a partner; and Mr Allan's eldest son, Robert Allan, was added to the company in 1831, under a provision that his participation in the profits should not commence until January 1832. On that occasion the parties executed certain articles of agreement, by which their respective interests in the business were fixed upon the footing that Thomas Allan was to have one-half, and Alexander Wight and Robert Allan one-fourth share. The agreement provided, 12th,

"That in the event of the death of any partner, his heirs shall not be entitled to examine the books of the company; but the survivors shall make up a statement of the deceased's account, counting up to the first balance after the decease, and attest the same by their signatures or oath, if required; and such statement, signed and attested, shall be held as sufficient, and shall preclude any right to further examination by the heirs or others."

Mr Thomas Allan died on the 12th September 1833. The company continued to carry on business till August 1834, when it stopped payment, and a sequestration of the company estates was awarded on 2d September following.

At Mr Thomas Allan's death he was infest, as proprietor, in the two estates of Campse in Fifeshire, and Lauriston in Mid-Lothian. The circumstances connected with the acquisition and management of these estates by Mr Allan, are detailed in the following extracts from a report by Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant, prepared by order of the Court of Session in the present action :

ESTATE OF CAMPSIE.

This estate was formerly the property of Mr David Betson, who appears to have obtained, in 1812, a cash-credit with the company of Robert Allan and Son for £8000, for which he granted to trustees for them a bond and disposition in security over his estate. It is stated that Mr Betson was sequestered on 27th September 1814, and that, of this date (27th February 1816), the lands were sold by missives of sale to Francis Walker, Esq., W.S., at the price of £7000 Sterling, payable at Martinmas 1816; and that Mr Walker then declared that he had made the purchase for the behoof of Thomas Allan, Esq., banker in Edinburgh. The articles and minutes of sale are not produced.

The books of the company, previous to 1st January 1817, are not produced; but it appears from the cash-ledger, No. 10, fol. 404, that there was at that date a balance of £1887. 1. 6. due to them on an account kept in name of "David Betson, Dunfermline, and Messrs Anderson and Wilkins, London." It would appear from the whole tenor of the correspondence with Messrs Anderson and Wilkins, entered in the company's English letter-books, that whatever may have been the form adopted on the occasion of the sale of the lands of Campsie in 1816, the purchase was then made by desire and for behoof of Messrs Anderson and Wilkins. See letters to them of 23d December 1816, 4th April 1817, 4th April and 1st May 1818, 17th January, 4th February, and 21st February 1820. During the period of this correspondence, the account above referred to was continued, and the advances by the company thereon were greatly increased, the rents received for the lands of Campsie being brought to the credit of the account. Constant complaints are made by the company of the extent of their advances, and of the inconvenience thereby occasioned to them; and Messrs Anderson and Wilkins are urged to sell the lands of Campsie, or relieve the account by paying off the mortgage held by the company thereon.

Of these dates (21st November and 2d December 1820), a disposition of the lands of Campsie was granted by the trustee on Betson's estate, with consent of the commissioners thereon, and of Mr Walker, in favour of Mr Thomas Allan; and of this date (13th December 1820), Mr Allan, as surviving trustee of Robert Allan and Son, executed a disposition and assignation, with consent of the company, of the heritable debt constituted in favour of Robert Allan and Son to himself as an individual. The narrative of this deed contains the following declaration: "And the said Francis Walker having declared that the said purchase was made by him for behoof of me the said Thomas Allan as an individual, an absolute disposition thereof is to be granted to me as the purchaser; and whereas the said Robert Allan and Son, as the creditors in the said heritable security, are entitled to draw the whole of the foresaid price of £7000, and interest thereon, to be applied towards payment of their aforesaid debt of £8587. 0. 3., bearing interest from the 16th day of July 1819; and it is fit and proper that, upon receiving payment thereof, a disposition and assignation of the said heritable security should be granted to me, as purchaser foresaid, for fortifying my title to the said lands; therefore, having instantly made payment to the said Robert Allan and Son of the foresaid price of £7000, and interest thereof from the said term of Martinmas 1816 to the said 16th day of July 1819, the receipt whereof the said Robert Allan and Son do hereby acknowledge, I, the said Thomas Allan, as surviving trustee for the said company of Robert Allan and Son, have sold and disposed," &c. Mr Allan was subsequently infest on the disposition by Betson's trustee. The account in the company's books is continued in the name of "David Betson, and Anderson and Wilkins," to 11th November 1823, when there remains a balance due to the company of £8909. 10s., which is of that date transferred to the debit of an account opened under the title of "Estate of Campsie, near Dunfermline." In making the transference, this balance is stated to be the "real cost of Campsie at this date." This account is continued under the same title, during the whole period of the existence of the company. There is brought to the credit of the account the rents received from the estate, and to its debit the outlay connected with the estate, and the expense of the title in Mr Allan's person, together with progressive interest on the account. It is balanced annually, and the balance is entered to the credit of stock in each year's balance-sheet, under the title of "Estate of Campsie."

ESTATE OF LAURISTON.

The negotiations for the purchase of this estate were commenced by Mr Thomas Allan in May 1823, by some correspondence between him and Dr Coventry; after which Mr Allan set off for London, where Mr Law, the proprietor of Lauriston, and the trustees who held the estate for him, resided, and where Mr Allan, of this date (13th June 1823), as appears from the copy in his own hand-writing produced, made an offer of £26,000 for the estate. Subsequent to this, difficulties had occurred with regard to Mr Law's title to the property, and the terms of the disposition to be granted by him and his trustees in favour of Mr Allan. It was not until the close of 1824 that these difficulties were arranged, by an agreement that £20,000 of the price was to be in the meantime invested in Government stock in the names of trustees, for Mr Law and Mr Allan, and the remainder to be paid to Mr Law. Both this £20,000 and the remainder of the price were provided for by the funds of the company.

In October 1823, an account was opened in the company's books, under the title of "Estate of Lauriston, near Edinburgh." This account is continued in the company's books under the same title, and is debited in 1824 with the price paid as above stated, together with stamps and other expenses, and is balanced on 31st December 1824 by the sum of £26,272. 8. 7., which is included in the company's balance at that date under the same title. In the succeeding year's account there are brought to its debit various payments made on account of outlay at Lauriston; but in the month of August 1825, there are two accounts opened in the company's cash ledger,—the one entitled "Improvements at Lauriston," and the other "Expenses at Lauriston." These accounts are continued in the company's books, the improvement-account being charged with all sums paid by the company of that nature; and the account for expenses, with payments for furniture, servants' wages, taxes, &c.

They are balanced annually,—the balance of the improvement-account being carried to the debit of the "Estate of Lauriston," and that of the expenses-account to the debit of the account of "Thomas Allan." The estate-account, besides the balance of the improvement-account, annually transferred, is debited with public and parochial burdens, insurance, &c., and also with progressive interest, stated annually, and is credited with the sums actually received for rents; but no account is taken of the rents of the house and gardens which were occupied by Mr Thomas Allan. By the agreement which was entered into between the partners when Mr Robert Allan was assumed in 1831, it is provided (article 8), "That Lauriston be taken as Mr Thomas Allan's own speculation, he paying the firm 3 per cent. interest upon the cost, and on what is or may be laid out upon the property; but the balance of the account in question is included in each year's balance of the company's stock, under the title of "Estate of Lauriston," as well after as before the date of this agreement.

The advances made by the company, to defray the expense of buildings and other improvements on Lauriston, amounted in the end, along with the original price of £26,272. 8. 7., to £45,987. 15s.

In March 1832, the company applied to the appellants for credit in a cash-account, to the extent of £20,000, to be kept in the bank's books in name of the firm of Robert Allan and Son—they giving their joint bond as a company and as individuals; and Thomas Allan at the same time granting a disposition of the estate of Lauriston in security of the advances. On these terms the proposal was acceded to by the directors of the Royal Bank, and a bond was executed on 30th March 1832, by which the whole of the partners bound themselves, jointly and severally, and their heirs, executors, successors, and representatives whatsoever, and also the company, and whole stock and profits thereof, to pay to the bank and their assignees the said sum of £20,000, or such part or parts of it as should be paid or advanced to the said company or firm of Robert Allan and Son, in manner therein mentioned; and "for further security and more sure payment to the said Royal Bank of Scotland, &c., and without prejudice to the before-written obligation for payment of the said sums, but in corroboration thereof," Thomas Allan sold, alienated, and disposed, all and whole the lands of Lauriston, under the usual conditions and provisions of cash-credit bonds.

Upon the precept of seisin contained in this bond and disposition in security, the defenders were infest, and their infestment duly recorded; and immediately thereafter, the company or firm of Robert Allan and Son proceeded to operate upon the cash-credit, drawing out and replacing from time to time such sums as their occasions required.

In July 1834, after Thomas Allan's death, the company, having occasion for a loan of money, over and above the amount of the cash-credit, again applied to the Royal Bank for an additional advance of £22,000. The application was acceded to; and the security then granted by them to the bank was in the form of an heritable bond, and bond of corroboration and disposition in security, being made applicable to the sums already advanced, or to be advanced on the cash-credit, to the extent of £20,000, as well as to the new loan of £22,000.

After narrating the former bond and disposition in security for the cash-credit, the new bond proceeded in these terms:

"And now, seeing that the Court of Directors of the said Royal Bank of Scotland have agreed to continue the said credit of £20,000 upon the said account, kept in the books of the said Royal Bank of Scotland, in Edinburgh, in the name of the said company or firm of Robert Allan and Son, as aforesaid, upon our granting the bond of corroboration and disposition in security after written—and that they have farther instantly advanced and paid to us, for behoof of the said firm of Robert Allan and Son, the sum of £22,000 Sterling, in consideration of our granting the bond and obligation for repayment of the same, and disposition in security thereof hereinafter written; therefore we, the said Robert Allan and Alexander Wight, do hereby, without hurt or prejudice to the heritable bond and disposition in security before mentioned, or to any of the obligations therein contained, or to the infestment following thereon, and security thereby constituted in favour of the said Royal Bank of Scotland, and their foressaids, but in farther corroboration thereof, et accumulando jura jurius, bind and oblige ourselves, both as partners of the said company and as individuals, jointly and severally, and our heirs, executors, &c., and also the said company or firm of Robert Allan and Son, and whole stock and profits thereof," to make payment to the Royal Bank of the said sum of £20,000, or such part or parts of it as have been, or shall be advanced to the company. Then followed an obligation by the partners in similar terms, for repayment of the loan of £22,000; and finally,

"without hurt or prejudice to the obligations for payment of the several sums hereinbefore written, or to the said heritable bond and disposition in security before recited, and infestment following thereon, and security thereby constituted in favour of the said Royal Bank and their foressaids; but in further corroboration thereof," &c.,

Robert Allan thereby sold, alienated, and disposed to the bank, under the usual conditions and provisions, the lands of Lauriston, and also the lands of Campse, to both of which he had made up titles as heir served and retoured to his deceased father, Thomas Allan, for the express purpose of being enabled to grant this security. Upon the precept of seisin contained in the bond, infestment followed in favour of the appellants. The result of the operations upon the cash-credit, as conjoined with the advance of £22,000, was to leave the company, at the date of their failure, debtors to the appellants in the sum of £42,000.

Mr Robert Christie, accountant in Edinburgh, was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estate of the company, and of Messrs Robert Allan and Alexander Wight as individuals. With his concurrence the present action was raised at the instance of the respondents, as creditors of the deceased Thomas Allan, either as an individual, or as liable for the debts of the company of which he was a partner, concluding for reduction of the heritable bond, and bond of corroboration granted in July 1834, and the security thereby constituted in favour of the appellants, on the ground, that being granted by Robert Allan within a year of his father's death, the security was void, as being to the prejudice of his father's creditors, contrary to the provisions of the Statute 1661, c. 24. The summons also contained a separate declaratory conclusion, having reference to the original bond and disposition in security granted in 1832, namely, that it should be found and declared that the balance due to the Royal Bank, as aforesaid, under that bond and disposition in security, whether taken as on the 12th of September 1833, when Mr Thomas Allan died, or on the 31st of December 1833, the date of the first balance of the books after his death, had been paid, and the security thereby extinguished, and the lands freed and disburdened of the debt.

In defence it was maintained—1. That the estates of Campse and Lauriston were not the private property of Mr Thomas Allan, but held by him as trustee for the company, and therefore most properly pledged for the advances to the company. 2. Even if they had been his private property, the Statute 1661, c. 24, was only applicable to conveyances by the heir in favour of his own creditors to the prejudice of his ancestor's, and not to the competition of ancestor's creditors inter se; and, 3. That the company was not dissolved by the death of Mr Thomas Allan in 1833, either at that date, or of the next balance thereafter; and that therefore the bond was a continuing guarantee, which covered all advances made to the company down to their sequestration.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lord Ordinary" "repels the defences against the other conclusions, both reductive and declaratory, and decerns in terms of these conclusions: Finds the defenders (appellants) liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—Under the reductive conclusion, the Lord Ordinary thinks it clear that Campse and Lauriston must be considered as having been the property of Thomas Allan individually. He stood as the sole owner on the titles and on the record; and although his having obtained or taken the money of his partners to make the purchases, and caused accounts to be opened between them and these estates, these accounts do not contradict the titles, but, on the contrary, in some respects confirm them. So that, however the company might have compelled him to pledge or sell the estates in order to pay their advances for the original prices, if they had claimed them as their own during his life, this would have been a demand in which they would have had no right to succeed.

"If this be assumed to be the fact, the question, how far the creditors of Thomas Allan, who dealt on the faith of his apparent ownership, are liable to be affected by any latent equities to which he may have been subject, does not arise. He was not in the situation of a trustee, but in that of an absolute owner, liable to no such equities. And if so, the Lord Ordinary holds that the disposition of his property to the defenders by his son, within a year after his death, was an infringement of the Act 1661, c. 24. The defenders say that this disposition was granted to one of his creditors, and that this excludes the Statute. The Lord Ordinary differs both as to this view of the fact and of the law. This disposition was not to a creditor of Thomas Allan, but to the defenders, who once were, but who had ceased to be his creditors. On the security of this conveyance, the defenders no doubt made advances which went to the house kept by the surviving partners, and this house was a creditor of Thomas Allan. But the advances were not made, nor meant to be made to the house in its character of a creditor of Thomas Allan; and the son, in disposing the estates in security, had no view but to raise funds for the use of his own company. Even assuming, therefore, that the debt due by Thomas Allan was de facto diminished exactly according to the amount of these advances (which, however, was not the case), this use to which the borrowers chose to turn their loan, cannot alter the legal character of the original transaction.

"But even although the arrangement had been all along intended as a pure bona fide conveyance of the estate, in order to raise funds for the direct payment of one of Thomas Allan's creditors, still it would have been struck at by the Act. At least, the Lord Ordinary can discover no authority or principle for holding that that valuable Statute, which forbids an heir to affect his predecessor's estate within a year after his death, to the prejudice of the predecessor's creditors, can be held to be complied with by the heir's giving it all away to a single creditor of the ancestor. It is true that a separation of the ancestor's creditors from those of the heir, and not any distribution between the former, inter se, forms the chief description of the general object of the Act. But the result is an enactment, declaring that 'no right or disposition made by the said apparent heir' shall be lawful, 'in so far as it may prejudice his predecessor's creditors.' Can it be said that these creditors, as a body, are not prejudged by a conveyance of the whole property by the heir to a favoured creditor, as, for example, to a company of which he himself is a partner?

"The main declaratory conclusion—which is, that the debt due by Thomas Allan under a prior bond was paid before the second one was granted by the son—requires that it should be fixed, whether, in consequence of the death of Thomas Allan, on 12th September 1833, the company to which he belonged was dissolved, either then or at the next balance on 31st December thereafter. The Lord Ordinary holds, that there is nothing in the 12th clause of their 'notes of agreement' which excludes the operation of the established rule, that the death of a partner dissolves a company. The settlement with that partner's heirs is declared to be delayed till the next balance; but, quoad the public, the usual result is allowed to take place. And if the partnership was dissolved by Thomas Allan's death, the defenders don't and can't pretend that they required notice of it.

"If this shall be held to be the correct view, the principles of the case of Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Merivale, 530, as explained by Mr Bell, Vol. II. p. 638, apply here. And, if they do, it was agreed at the debate that the balance due by Thomas Allan to the defenders, under the first bond, was all paid prior to granting the second one."

The defenders having reclaimed, the accountant's report, above referred to, was ordered by the Court, upon the circumstances connected with the estates of Campse and Lauriston. Cases were also ordered. For the arguments of parties see Jurist, Vol. XI. pp. 448–450. These cases were afterwards appointed to be boxed for the opinion of the other Judges on the following adjusted queries:

"Query, 1. Whether, keeping in view the state of the feudal titles, the evidence afforded by the company's books and other documents, and the conduct of the parties generally, the estates of Campse and Lauriston, or either of them, were acquired and vested in the person of Thomas Allan as his own individual property? Or, whether they were held by him in trust, or for behoof of the company of Robert Allan and Son, or subject to their disposition, down to the period of his death?

"2. Assuming the said estates, or either of them, to have been vested in Thomas Allan in trust, or for behoof of the company, or subject to their disposition—Is the bond and disposition in security, of 29th July 1834, under all the circumstances appearing on the record in this process, reducible in whole or in part—and if in part, to what extent it is reducible under the Act 1661, as a conveyance granted by the heir within year and day of the ancestor's death, and to the prejudice of the ancestor's creditors?

"3. Assuming the said estates, or either of them, to have been the private property of Thomas Allan as an individual, or to have become so by any subsequent arrangement or conveyance in his favour—Is the bond of 29th July 1834, with reference to the whole circumstances of the case, reducible as above, under the Act 1661?

"4. Whether, and to what extent, the bond of 30th March 1832 remained in force, as a continuing guarantee and security over the estate of Lauriston, to cover advances, or any balance due upon advances, made by the defenders to the company of Robert Allan and Son, at or after Thomas Allan's death, and down to the date of the final sequestration of the company? or, if it did not so remain in force, at what period did it cease to operate as a continuing guarantee and security over the estate of Lauriston; and whether the balance, if any, that may have been due when the said bond ceased so to operate as aforesaid, was paid, or wholly or partially extinguished subsequently?"

Opinions were given in by the consulted Judges, which see ante, Vol. XI. pp. 450–461. On advising (17th May 1839), the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The Royal Bank appealed, pleading a reversal on the following among other grounds:—1. The respondents have not instructed that the estates of Campse and Lauriston were the property of Thomas Allan individually. On the contrary, it sufficiently appears that these estates were not the absolute property of Thomas Allan as an individual, but truly belonged to the company of Robert Allan and Son, although the formal title was made up in the name and person of Thomas Allan, the principal partner of the company. This is a question of evidence and not of law, on which the Judges have hesitated and differed in opinion. Both estates were considered and treated by the firm as theirs in their books, &c.; and in a question of this kind, not with a third party, are onerous acquirers of the property from Thomas Allan, where the shape of the title might have been conclusive; but in a question as to the true nature of Thomas Allan's right, it is admitted on all hands that the books of the company must afford most important evidence. By the feudal law of Scotland, a company, as such, cannot in its own name or firm hold heritable property, which was the reason why the titles of the property were taken in the name of Thomas Allan alone, but he was merely a trustee for the company. This view is corroborated by other circumstances,—1st, the 8th article of the agreement in 1831, "That Lauriston be taken as Thomas Allan's own speculation, he paying the firm 3 per cent. interest upon the cost, and upon what is, or may be laid out on the property." Campse was held in the same manner as Lauriston, and no such stipulation was made as to Campse. The inference is, that Campse was still to be held in trust for the firm. But, even as regarded Lauriston, the arrangement was prospective, and was never afterwards formally carried into effect. 2d, The only important use of the property was for behoof of the firm, viz., by impledging it for the loan to the appellants in 1832. 2. On the supposition that the estates, or either of them, truly belonged to Thomas Allan himself and not to the company, the Statute 1661, on which the respondents found, would not apply to the present case, because the conveyance challenged was truly a conveyance in favour of creditors of Thomas Allan the ancestor, and the Statute does not strike at such a conveyance as that in question. 3. The security which the appellants got under the bond of 1832, continued as an effectual guarantee even after the death of Thomas Allan; and, at all events, it is effectual for the balance which was due at Thomas Allan's death, or at the 31st of December thereafter, and the appellants are not precluded, by any thing that has happened, from still striking the balance at one or other of these dates, if it shall be held that they were in error in supposing that they had an effectual security down to the date of the bankruptcy.

The respondents, in reply, maintained the pleas which are embodied in the opinions of the majority of the Judges.

At the conclusion of the Lord Advocate's reply on 6th April 1840:

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, it is very much to be regretted, that in a case which involves so much property, the materials upon which we are called upon to decide are so extremely meagre, and the evidence so very unsatisfactory. I do not find, however, that either party in this case has proposed to bring before your Lordships any other facts than those which are to be found on the printed papers before your Lordships' house; nor do I find that the learned counsel on either side now suggest that any opportunity should be afforded to them to enable them to bring forward any other means of explaining the transaction, beyond the papers which are before you. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the only course your Lordships can pursue, is carefully to investigate the accounts, and the documents which are printed, and to see whether you can come to any satisfactory conclusion upon them. If it is found impossible to do so, why, then the question will be, what means your Lordships should adopt for the purpose of getting better information? It certainly does seem very strange, that in a transaction of comparatively very recent date, and of which so many persons must be cognizant, there should have been no better information as to the title of these respective parties who are claiming this property, than that which appears upon the printed papers before you. It may be that neither party has the means of bringing any farther evidence forward;—if so, then it is impossible that you should come to a satisfactory conclusion upon the evidence before you, without a very careful examination of all the accounts which have been brought under your consideration. If the points which were made as to the title to the estate, shall appear to have been decided one way, then of course the further consideration of these points of law would not arise. But it is material to come to some conclusion as to the title to this property; and for that purpose, I would propose to your Lordships that you should adjourn the further consideration of this cause.

The case being advised of this date, the Lord Chancellor said:—

My Lords, the first question which occurs in this case is, whether the estates of Lauriston and Campse ought to be considered as the property of the late Thomas Allan, or as held by him in trust for the firm in which he was a partner? and upon that question I have not been able to find any substantial difficulty. The negotiation and contract for the purchase of Lauriston was conducted by Mr Thomas Allan, and in his own name; the title was made up in his person;—he was, in respect of that estate, enrolled as a freeholder of the county of Edinburgh. He enlarged the house, and made extensive improvements to the estate, and lived in the house with his family, for which there is no trace of his having been charged with any rent to the firm. It appears, however, that the purchase-money was paid by the firm; and the amount, together with other expenditure in respect of the estate, was not placed to the debit of Mr Thomas Allan, but was the subject of a separate account, to which all such payments were carried as debits, and all receipts on account of the estate were placed as credits. That such an account should have been opened, proves nothing; for it appears that other private accounts of Mr Thomas Allan were kept in the books of the firm,—such as the education account of his children; but why the balance was placed to the account of the stock of the firm, and not to the private account of Mr Thomas Allan, is not explained. It may have been so done because the firm had advanced the money for the purchase of the estate, and it may therefore have been thought right that the property itself should, in their books, be treated as belonging to the firm till the payment of the purchase-money and other expenditure on the estate had been arranged between Mr Thomas Allan and his partners, although it does not appear that the firm had any security upon the property. But however that may be, all ambiguity which that mode of keeping the account might otherwise have produced, is removed by the notes of agreement entered into upon the admission of Mr Robert Allan in 1831; the 8th article being—"That Lauriston be taken as Thomas Allan's own speculation, he paying the firm £3 per cent. interest upon the cost, and on what is or may be laid out upon the said property." This has been considered in the argument for the appellants as a new contract, giving to Thomas Allan what before belonged to the firm. But it was probably entered into only for the purpose of guarding against the new partner supposing, or concluding from the entries in the books, that Lauriston was to be considered as the property of the firm; and it does not appear that any change in the mode of keeping the accounts was adopted on this memorandum being made. The whole history of the purchase, the title taken, and the declaration of the partners, prove that Lauriston was the private property of Mr Thomas Allan. The case of Campes is so far different, that the firm had originally a mortgage upon it. The mortgagor having been subject to a sequestration, this property was sold, and it seems doubtful on whose account it was purchased. But in December 1820, it was conveyed by the trustee under the sequestration to Thomas Allan; and soon after, by a deed to which the firm were parties, it was declared that the purchase was made for Thomas Allan as an individual, and the firm assigned their security upon the estate to him as the purchaser, acknowledging the receipt of £7000,—the purchase-money. It is true that the accounts show that in this case, as in the case of Lauriston, the purchase-money was not paid by Thomas Allan, and that the accounts of the property were kept in the same way as was adopted with respect to Lauriston. But the parties interested have acknowledged that the property belonged to Thomas Allan, and his title was made up as beneficial owner; and all his dealings with the property were consistent with his being so. There is not, therefore, I think, sufficient evidence to convert him into a trustee for the firm. So far, therefore, I think the judgment of the Court below was clearly right; and in this judgment, ten out of the twelve Judges concurred. The question which it seems expedient to consider in the next place, is, whether, at the time of the date of the second bond, any thing was due to the Bank of Scotland from the estate of Thomas Allan alone? His bond, of the 30th of March 1832, was to secure repayment to the bank of any balance to the extent of £20,000 which might be due to the bank from the firm of Robert Allan and Son, in which Thomas Allan was a partner, in respect of advances and accommodation to be afforded to them by the bank. Thomas Allan died in September 1833, and beyond all doubt, by that event, the firm of Robert Allan and Son, as it had up to that time existed, was dissolved, so far as it affected the bank. That the business was to be considered as going on as before, for the purpose of settling between the surviving partners and the estate of the partner deceased, by special agreement between the partners, cannot affect the question; and it is also quite clear that the security which Thomas Allan so gave to the bank, to secure the repayment of advances made to the firm in which he was a partner, that is, to himself and his partners, could not be used as a security for advances made after his death to a firm in which he was not a partner; that is, to the persons who had been his partners, whether they continued the old style and firm, or adopted another. Now, it is not in dispute that the payments made by the surviving partners, with whom the account was continued after Thomas Allan's death, to the bank, without any specific appropriation prior to the date of the second bond, exceeded the amount of the debt due to the bank at the time of Thomas Allan's death,—and the defendants admit, as appears in the 59th page of the appellants' case, that there were periods between the time of Thomas Allan's death, and the date of the second bond, at which there was no balance due to the bank, and that at the date of the second bond, there was only a balance of £400, and interest due: So that there is no ground upon which it can be maintained that the debt due at the death of Thomas Allan was not paid at the date of the second bond, except that of the bond of 1832 being available to secure advances made after the death of Thomas Allan, for which there is no pretence. It seems to have been supposed by some of the learned Judges, that the case of Devaynes was not applicable to the present, because this was a case of credit, and not of deposit. Those learned Judges recognise the law in Devaynes' case as applicable to Scotland, as indeed the case of Speirs v. Houston, 4 Bligh, 615, and 3 Shaw and Wilson, assume it to be. It is to be regretted that the subsequent decisions which have taken place in England upon that subject were not brought under the consideration of those learned Judges. If they had been, I have no doubt but that the application of the principle, in its full extent to this case, would have been recognised by them. Many cases have occurred in this country; but it is sufficient to mention Pemberton v. Oahes, 4 Russel, 154; Bodenham v. Purchas, 2 Barnewall and Alderston, 39; and Simson v. Ingham, 2 Barnewall and Creswell, 65; because in one or other of those cases, all the circumstances occurred which have been supposed to distinguish this case from Devaynes' case. Without therefore calling in aid the fact, that the whole debt at the time of Thomas Allan's death was destroyed by the balance due to the bank, from the continuing firm having ceased to exist, such debt so due at Thomas Allan's death, would have been discharged by the application of the subsequent payments to such debt,—such payments having been made without any appropriation by the parties paying, and having been carried by the parties receiving such payments to the account kept by them, consisting of the old and new transactions, and constituting, therefore, a continuing account, and from which appropriation it was not competent for the bank to remove such payments at a subsequent time, when the consequences were seen, as was decided in Bodenham v. Purchas. When, therefore, Robert Allan, the son of Thomas, executed the second bond to induce the bank to continue to himself and his then partners the floating credit to the amount of £20,000, and to advance £22,000 for their use, he was not dealing with a creditor of his father, or giving to any such creditor a security for any debt of his father, but he was providing a credit for himself, and securing a debt of his own, upon the security of property derived by him from his father, and that within one year of his father's death, which is precisely the case guarded against by the Statute of 1661. In what way this transaction might operate upon the state of the account between Thomas Allan's estate and the surviving partners, does not appear to me to be in the least material. That was not the object or immediate effect of the transaction; and it is not proved that what was advanced by the bank was applied in payment of the debt due from Thomas Allan to the firm. The question, therefore, does not arise, whether, within the Statute, an heir can within the year, effectually prefer one of his ancestor's creditors to another, by giving to him a security upon the ancestor's estate. The ground upon which I rest my opinion is, that the bond and security of 1834 was not given to secure or pay any debt of the father. This case has been most laboriously argued below, and at the bar of this House, and it seems to have engaged very largely the attention of the learned Judges. I cannot say that I have felt the difficulties which seem to have been entertained by some others. I think it sufficiently proved that Lauriston and Campes belonged to Thomas Allan individually; that the debt due to the bank at the time of his death was discharged before the date of the second bond; that the security of 1832 cannot be applied to secure any debt contracted after the death of Thomas Allan; and that his son Robert had no power, by his bond of 1834, to affect the lands for his own benefit, and to secure his own creditors to the prejudice of the creditors of his father. It follows from this, that, in my opinion, the judgment of the Court below was right, and ought to be affirmed. Taking this view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider what the effect of the bond of 1834 would have been upon the liability of Thomas Allan's estate to the bank, if any debt had remained due upon the bond of 1832. The surviving partners of Thomas Allan would have been primarily liable for the debt; and by the bond of 1834, the creditors took a new security for the £20,000, and continued the credit for that sum for an indefinite period, which, by the bond of 1832, and the law applicable to it, had determined at the death of Thomas Allan. As to costs, it is true, that upon some of the questions considered by the Judges, there was a very even balance of opinion; but if a majority had been in favour of the appellants upon some one of the questions, it would not have influenced the decision of the cause,—a majority upon other of the questions being against them. It does not appear to me that there is in this case sufficient to induce the House to depart from the rule (which I always do with reluctance) of making an unsuccessful appellant pay the respondent's costs, who in this case are unsatisfied creditors, and who have been under the necessity of instituting these proceedings, and of incurring the expenses attending their progress, for the purpose of obtaining relief against an act under which the appellants' claim, and by which an attempt was made to deprive them of those means of obtaining payment of their debts to which they were entitled. I therefore shall move the House, that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Second Division.—Lord Cockburn, Ordinary.—Richardson and Connell, Appellants' Solicitors.—Alexander Dobie, Respondents' Solicitor.—[W.H.D.]

29th April 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 109.—MISSSES CASAMAJOR and OTHERS, Appellants, v. PEARSON and ROBERTSON, W.S., and OTHERS, Respondents.

Trust—Settlement—Succession—Construction—Annuity—A party having left a trust-settlement, with directions to lay out capital sums to answer annuities of £200, £400 and £400, for his three sisters, and if the residue of his estate should not be sufficient for yielding the annuities, to pay the interest arising on the whole residue to the sisters, in proportion to the annuities provided to them; and also with directions to pay the capital sums laid out for producing the annuities to certain residuary legatees, as and when the sums became tangible by the death of the said annuitants respectively; and one of the annuitants having predeceased the trustor, and another having died during the subsistence of the trust; and it not being ascertained before the accounting was completed, whether the annual income, arising from the estate while both the annuitants surviving the testator were alive, would be sufficient to satisfy their annuities for that period in full—Held (altering the judgment of the Court of Session), that during the continuance of the trust, the annuitants could only divide among themselves the income of the estate as far as it would go, and that upon the death of one of them, the share or capital which was invested to secure the payment of that annuity became tangible and payable to the residuary legatees; and cause remitted to the Court of Session with a declaration to that effect.

This was a question in the Porterfield multiplepointing, in which a judgment on other points was formerly pronounced in the Court of Session (16th December 1836, ante, Vol. IX. p. 154), and carried to the House of Lords (18th July 1839, ante, Vol. XII. p. 101), where it was partly affirmed, and partly reversed. The points raised in the present proceedings chiefly regarded the rights of parties interested in the trust-funds retained to produce annuities for the sisters of the trustor, Alexander Porterfield, in terms of his settlement. The clause of the settlement providing the annuities was in these words:

"Quarto, In the next place, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee to pay the following annuities to my sisters after named, which I hereby leave to, and settle on them during their respective lives, viz.,—to Mrs Christian Porterfield or Fotheringham, wife of the said Frederick Fotheringham, an annuity of £400 Sterling; to Mrs Ann Porterfield or Paterson, wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Paterson, residing in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, a like annuity of £400 Sterling; to Mrs Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan, an annuity of £200 Sterling, and this over and above, and in addition to the annuity already settled on the said Mrs Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan by me; which several annuities hereby provided, I direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee to pay to my said sisters, during all the days of their respective lives, and that half-yearly, commencing payment thereof at the second term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen after my death, for the year preceding such first term of payment, and continuing payment thereafter at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas as aforesaid, during the lives of my said sisters respectively: And for the better fulfilment of this purpose, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee to vest and lay out capital sums for answering the foresaid respective annuities, on any security or securities which they or he may think proper, either personal, heritable, or in the public funds, and to take said securities in such terms as they or he may think best adapted for fulfilling the foresaid purpose: And in the event that, after payment of my debts, fulfilment of the obligations in which I may stand bound at the time of my death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution hereof, and of the £500 to my said sister Mrs Alexander, the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities hereby settled on my said sisters, then it is my meaning and intention, that the said residue, whatever it may be, shall be vested and laid out, and the interest and dividends arising therefrom be paid unto, and divided among my said three sisters, Mrs Fotheringham, Mrs Paterson and Mrs Buchanan, during their respective lives, in the same proportions, and exactly in the same terms in every respect, as above pointed out with respect to the full annuities of £400, £400, and £200; and I do hereby direct my said trustees or trustee to regulate themselves accordingly."

The fifth clause was as follows:

"In the event of there being any of the proceeds of my said funds and estate remaining, after setting apart capital sums sufficient to yield the three annuities of £400, £400, and £200, as above specified, then I hereby direct my said trustees or trustee to pay such surplus, together with the capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foresaid annuities, as and when such capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively, or, in the event of there being no surplus, then the capital sums, whatever their amount may be, so to be vested and laid out as aforesaid, as and when such capital sums shall become tangible as aforesaid, to and among Mary Paterson, Helen Paterson, Alexander Paterson, and Mary-Ann Paterson, all children procreated of the marriage between the said Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Paterson and Mrs Ann Porterfield or Paterson; Buchanan, Buchanan, and Buchanan, all daughters of the said Mrs Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan, equally among the said Mary, Helen, Alexander, and Mary-Ann Patersons, and Buchanan, share and share alike, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen (under the declaration, however, after mentioned), or as soon after the first of said events as the said capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foresaid annuities shall become tangible by and through the deaths of the said several annuitants respectively."

Mrs Buchanan predeceased the trustor, and Mrs Fotheringham, who survived the trustor, died in March 1834. In the course of the management of the trust-estate, it was not distinctly ascertained whether the annual proceeds would be sufficient to pay the annuities of Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson in full. The trustee having made up a set of accounts, the Misses Casamajor and others, who had right to the capital sums laid out for the annuities when they should be disengaged, objected to these accounts, and the principle on which they were constructed. The trustee had proceeded upon the principle, that on the supposition of there not being more annual proceeds than would produce the annuities of Mrs Paterson and Mrs Fotheringham, the whole annual proceeds should be devoted to that purpose, without any deduction on account of disengaged fee or capital in consequence of the annuitant (Mrs Buchanan) predeceasing the testator. And the full annuity of £400 not having been paid to each of the ladies, Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, for a certain number of years, it was maintained by the trustee that they had a claim for their arrears upon the whole annual proceeds, and that the surplus of one year should supply the deficiency of another.

The Misses Casamajor, &c., on the other hand, pleaded—That two-tenths of the residue of the trust-estate had become divisible on the death of the testator, in consequence of the predecease of Mrs Buchanan, who would have been an annuitant to the extent of £200; that in like manner four-tenths were divisible on the death of Mrs Fotheringham, who was an annuitant to the extent of £400; and that in each case, the surviving annuitant or annuitants were entitled to no more than the proceeds or income arising from the remaining proportionate capital sums. But the various questions which arose will be best understood from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary disposing of them.

"20th December 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this cause, and having considered the interlocutors of the Court, and the judgment of the House of Lords as applied by the Court—Holds the state of the trust-accounts, No. of process, the revised objections to that state for Miss Jane Casamajor and others, No. of process, and the revised answers to those objections for Alexander Pearson, No. of process, as now duly lodged; and having heard parties' procurators on the state of the cause, and on the said objections and answers, Finds that the event of Mrs Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan, one of the annuitants, to whose benefit the proceeds of the trust-estate were in the first instance appropriated, having died before the testator, had not the effect of vesting in the residuary legatees any right over the portion of the capital of the estate or its proceeds, which must otherwise have been laid out for securing an annuity of £200 to her during her life, except in so far as there might be during the lives of the two surviving annuitants, Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, a surplus of the annual proceeds of the whole estate, after paying in full to the said two annuitants the annuities of £400 each provided to them, in conformity to the findings hereinafter expressed: Finds that the full security and payment of these annuities constituted a primary and preferable burden on the whole residue of the trust-funds and estate, after deducting the sums necessary for paying and satisfying the testator's debts and obligations, the expenses of the trust, the legacy of £500 to Mrs Alexander, and the two legacies of £1000 each, payable to George and Thomas Patersons: And finds, that until the said annuities were fully satisfied, so far as the whole interests, dividends, rents, or profits of the said free fund or estate might be sufficient for that purpose, no tangible or divisible surplus fund could arise during the lifetime of the two annuitants which could be claimed by the residuary legatees: Finds that, in determining what shall be considered as the residue of the said trust-estate, and what shall be considered as the interest, dividends, rents, or produce of such estate primarily appropriated to the payment of the said annuities, the whole expenses incurred in realising, or endeavouring to realise and convert into money, the various subjects constituting the trust-estate, or in changing the securities thereof, must be deducted from the gross capital: Finds that the ordinary annual expense of managing the trust-estate, including the ordinary expense of management, and uplifting the rents of the heritable estate while unsold, must be deducted from the gross annual rents or profits thereof: But finds that all extraordinary expenses brought upon the trust-estate in the course of such management, such as the expense of processes for the division of a commonry, or for augmentation of ministers' stipends, or any similar expenses, must be deducted from the capital stock of the estate: Finds that in so far as there may have been at the death of Mrs Fotheringham any arrears of the said annuities outstanding and unpaid to her, or to Mrs Paterson, to the utmost extent to which the free proceeds of the funds and estate, estimated in conformity to the judgment of the House of Lords, and the above finding, were adequate, in the annual produce thereof, to the full payment of the said annuities, such arrears must be paid in preference to any claim by the residuary legatees: And finds that, in case there may have been a surplus of the said annual produce beyond the payment of the said annuities in any one year, or more years, preceding the death of Mrs Fotheringham, such surplus must be applied to make up any deficiency thereof in other years of the same period: Finds that a portion of the capital stock, or money previously appropriated to the security and payment of the said two annuities, but which has been set free by the death of Mrs Fotheringham, one of the said annuitants, must, so far as necessary, be laid out for securing to Mrs Paterson, the surviving annuitant, in conjunction with the remaining sum already invested, the full payment of her said annuity of £400, during all the years and terms of her life, posterior to the term for which the annuity to Mrs Fotheringham was last payable; but in respect that the purpose of the payment of the said annuities in full is provided for solely by the investment of capital sums sufficient to yield an equal amount in the proceeds thereof, and that it is expressly declared in the trust-deed, that in the event that 'the residue of the proceeds of my estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities hereby settled,' &c., the testator's 'meaning and intention' is, that the residue, whatever it may be, shall be invested, and the interest or dividends thereof paid to the annuitants in the proportions of their several annuities: Finds that there is no warrant in the trust-deed for applying any part of the capital of the trust-estate for making up any deficiency in the said 'proceeds' thereof, for paying the emerging annuities as they fell due during the lives of the annuitants respectively: Therefore, finds no claim competent to Mrs Paterson, or to the executors of Mrs Fotheringham, for sums alleged to be due as arrears of annuities falling due prior to Mrs Fotheringham's death, in so far as it may appear that the whole interest, dividends, or profits of the proceeds of the estate being insufficient for the payment of the full annuities, were paid to them, or may be payable under the previous finding of this interlocutor, proportionally, according to the terms of the trust-deed: Finds no sufficient or relevant ground set forth in the process for impeaching the management of the trustees in the exercise of the discretion committed to them with regard to the time and manner of bringing the heritable property, composing the chief part of the trust-estate, to sale; and finds that the trust-accounts, as between the pursuer, as surviving trustee, and the objectors, as residuary legatees, must be settled and adjusted in this process on the footing of the sale and previous administration having been in this respect duly conducted; and before farther answer, at the desire of both the parties, remits the whole accounts of the pursuer to Mr William Moncreiff, accountant in Edinburgh, with instructions to consider the accounts, as made up by the accountant employed by the pursuer, with the vouchers thereof, and the revised objections and revised answers for the parties, having in view the points of law determined by the Lord Ordinary's former interlocutor, adhered to by the Court, so far as the same has been affirmed by the House of Lords, and by the judgment of the House of Lords itself, and also having in view the findings of this interlocutor; with power to him to call for all explanations from the parties which he may think necessary, and for inspection of whatever books he may require for enabling him to make a satisfactory report on the matters still in dispute; and to report to the Lord Ordinary how far the account produced exhibits a just and true account of the pursuer's intromissions with the trust-estate and funds, according to the principles laid down in the said interlocutors and judgment; and in case it shall appear to him that it is in any respects insufficient or unsatisfactory, to state particularly the objections which arise to it, and the grounds of them, and in general having regard to the said state of accounts as reported by the accountant to the pursuer, to report to the Lord Ordinary what is the just and true state of the account between the pursuer and the parties severally interested in the trust-estate: And further, instructs the accountant, that, in framing his report with reference to the expense of the trust-management under the findings of this interlocutor, he do exhibit in a distinct form the particular articles of expense which are charged severally against the capital, and against the yearly rents, interest or dividends of the said trust-funds and estate. And recommends to him to prepare his report as soon as circumstances will enable him to do so.

"Note.—Some observations may be necessary or useful:

"1. The judgment of the House of Lords finds, 'that the sum applicable to the payment of the annuities,' was 'the residue of the said trust-fund, after deducting,' &c. It is very clear to the Lord Ordinary that this can only mean that the residue of the estate, after the deductions specified were made, that is, the free capital, is the fund, the annual issues and profits of which are to be applied in payment of the annuities. There might indeed have been an ambiguity in the terms employed in the first part of the fourth provision of the trust, by which the annuities are appointed, because, in general, annuities given as special legacies, where no other intention is expressed, may be preferable over the whole capital of the estate: But when the whole of the fourth provision is read together, there can be no ambiguity, because it is in plain words provided that capital sums are to be invested for securing and paying the annuities, which are afterwards to be paid to the residuary legatees; but that 'in the event that, after payment of my debts,' &c., 'the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities,' &c., 'then it is my meaning and intention that the SAID RESIDUE, whatever it may be, shall be vested and laid out, and the INTEREST OR DIVIDENDS arising therefrom, be paid unto or divided among my said three sisters,' &c., in the same proportions; and the testator directs his trustees to regulate themselves accordingly. The Lord Ordinary cannot therefore entertain any doubt, that all that the annuitants could claim, is either full payment of their annuities, or, if the estate did not yield so much in annual produce, the whole interest, dividends, rents, and profits of the free residue, whatever it might be; and the judgment of the House of Lords does not import any thing else. The object of that judgment was singly to find, that the two legacies provided to George and Thomas Patersons must be deducted from the capital before striking the residue, as well as the debts, expenses, and the legacy of £500.

"But, on the other hand, there can be as little doubt that the full annuities of £400 each must be paid to the annuitants, in so far as the free annual proceeds of the residue of the funds and estate, reckoned according to the judgment of the House of Lords, were or might be, at any time during their lives respectively, sufficient for satisfying them. Therefore the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the arrears of the annuities unpaid must be made good, in so far as there are any funds in the hands of the trustee, which consists of rents, profits, interest, or dividends accruing from the trust-estate in any of the years during which both the rights of annuity subsisted, although in particular years the annuities may have been paid in full, while there was a deficiency in other years.

"2. The Lord Ordinary thinks it very clear that there is no ground for the plea that the annuity which was provided to Mrs Buchanan must be considered as a burden on the proceeds of the trust-estate to diminish the fund for payment of the annuities to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson. That annuity never existed, having completely lapsed by Mrs Buchanan having predeceased the testator. But still the full annuities of £400 each were provided to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, and are found to have been primary and preferable burdens on the whole proceeds of the estate. The real meaning of the plea of the objectors is, that the benefit of Mrs Buchanan's predecease is to accrue to them as residuary legatees, although there should be a defalcation in the annuities to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson; in other words, that these annuities shall not be preferable over the proceeds of the estate, but that the residuary legatees shall be preferable to them pro tanto. The Lord Ordinary conceives this to be contrary both to the express words of the settlement and to the final judgment of the Court and the House of Lords. Mrs Paterson and Mrs Fotheringham are asking nothing in the right of Mrs Buchanan, or as emerging to them by her death; for nothing ever was vested in her, and therefore nothing could so emerge. They are asking simply their own annuities and no more; and though the proceeds appropriated to the payment of them are greater in consequence of their being relieved of the annuity intended for her, they are still nothing else but the proceeds of the estate over which their claim is preferable, aye and until their full annuity shall be satisfied.

"3. As Mrs Paterson is still surviving, the Lord Ordinary thinks it clear that her full annuity of £400 must be paid de futuro, although the proceeds of the estate may have been insufficient before Mrs Fotheringham's death to pay both the annuities in full. For her right remains just as it was,—a preferable claim over the whole proceeds of the estate, though the fund is enlarged by the death of Mrs Fotheringham.

"4. The only question on which the Lord Ordinary entertains real doubt is, how far there is a just claim over the now enlarged proceeds of the estate to make up retro the deficiencies in the annual proceeds to pay the two annuities during Mrs Fotheringham's life. It is with some difficulty that he has come to be of opinion that this part of the claim is not well founded. In the case of Mrs Fotheringham's executors, it can hardly be maintained; for, attending particularly to the words of the settlement, it is evident that the preference given to the annuities was over the annual proceeds of the estate only, and that there is no warrant for applying any part of the capital to make up those annuities. But to give Mrs Fotheringham's executors any part of the proceeds accruing after her annuity had ceased, would really be to apply part of the capital, otherwise devolving on the residuary legatees, to make up her annuities during her life; or, in another view, it would be to allow her executors to draw annuities after her whole right to them had fallen by her death. The question is much nicer in the case of Mrs Paterson, she being still alive, and in a situation to say that the whole free proceeds at any time arising should still be appropriated to the full payment of her annuity from the beginning. The Lord Ordinary is sensible of the difficulty of denying effect to this. But, on the whole, considering the anxious terms of the provision for payment of proportional sums only out of the proceeds existing, and the clause regulating the effect of the failure of one annuitant, he does not think that, on a fair construction, it can be held to have been the testator's intention to give such a retroactive effect to the increase of the funds by the death of an annuitant.

"5. The Lord Ordinary sees no sufficient ground laid in this process for any claim on the part of the objectors against the trustee personally on account of his administration, or the delay in the sale of the estate. In all such trusts there are difficulties which the parties interested in the ultimate result are very apt to undervalue; and they are but too much inclined to assign interested or unworthy motives for what is no more than the ordinary course of such things. If the objectors mean seriously to make a case of malversation to any effect against the trustee, they ought to have libelled a proper action of damages, on such relevant grounds as they might venture to adopt. All that the Lord Ordinary says, or means to find, is, that there is no sufficient ground laid in this process for requiring the pursuer to account on any other principles than those which are applicable to every trust, containing the usual clauses for the protection of such trustee.

"6. But undoubtedly the accounts of the trustee rendered, must be duly audited. And the Lord Ordinary certainly thinks that there are several matters involved in them which do require investigation. The points of objection at last insisted in were very few. Indeed, they were nearly confined to the payments made upon certain bills said to be prescribed, and the mode of charging interest on the one side of the account, and allowing interest on the other. But as there may be some other questions, the Lord Ordinary has thought it proper to make the remit to the accountant in such general terms as to embrace every thing. He has no belief, however, that the accountant will find it necessary to make up an entirely new state of accounts, though it is proper that the whole should be checked; and the result must be brought out in conformity to the judgments of the Lord Ordinary, the Court, and the House of Lords. There is of course some law involved, both in the questions regarding the bills and the mode of stating interest. But so much depends on the facts, that it is better to see the precise state of them before deciding any thing.

"7. A point of some difficulty was in the end debated before the Lord Ordinary, viz., in what manner the expenses of management of the trust-estate should be charged against the fund; that is, whether against the capital, or against the annual produce of that capital? It is clear enough that the expression in the trust-deed, 'the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate,' means the residue of capital after the subjects are converted into money, or at any rate, the residue of the stock of the estate, after the appointed deductions are made from it; and so the House of Lords have understood it; and therefore it is very clear, that all the expense incurred in bringing it into that state must be charged against the capital of the fund, according to the express terms of the deed, and the judgment of the House of Lords. But the difficulty which was not at all under the view of that House, or at all contemplated in the particular finding, is, that there was an heritable estate which could not in any view be sold in an instant, and which was not in fact sold for many years; and the material question relates to the expense of managing that estate in the meantime. It is not a simple point. On the one hand, the only clauses of the deed which relate to the expenses of the trust, suppose them to be deducted before the residue of the estate is to be struck, the whole interest and dividends of which are to be paid to the annuitants until the full annuities be paid; and it is not at all an ordinary case of lifrent and fee, but a case of special annuities appointed to be paid preferably. On the other hand, the state of the matter to which the words plainly apply is not that which occurred. There is no mention of rents at all; and therefore, assuming that the trustees did their duty, and that still the sale of the lands was unavoidably, or at least in bona fide delayed, the rents can only come in place of interest or dividends, by inference and construction, by a necessary implication of intention. Taking this to be the fair and just result, the question is, whether it can be more than the free rents, after deducting the ordinary and necessary annual expenses of management, that can be so taken. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion, that the rents cannot be reckoned as surrogatum for interest or dividends till after deducting the ordinary expenses required for producing those rents; but that all extraordinary charges occurring must be deducted from the capital when ultimately realised. He understands that the state of the trustees is made up in some degree on this footing. But being sensible that there will be difficulty in the adjustment, he has instructed the accountant to exhibit, in a distinct form, all the particulars to be charged the one way or the other."

Both parties reclaimed:

The Misses Casamaijor and others prayed, that it should be found, 1. That on the death of the testator, two-tenth parts of the capital of the free residue of the trust-funds became tangible and divisible among the residuary legatees: 2. That any surplus of the capital of the free trust-funds, beyond what was then necessary for securing the annuities payable to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, did then become tangible and divisible among the said residuary legatees: 3. That any surplus of the annual proceeds of the free residue of the trust-estate which has existed in any year or years during the subsistence of the trust, beyond what was necessary for satisfying the annuities payable for such year or years respectively, was not claimable by the annuitants to make up deficiencies in other years, but belonged to the said residuary legatees.

Mrs Fotheringham's trustees and Mrs Paterson prayed, that it should be found that there was a claim competent to the executors of Mrs Fotheringham and to Mrs Paterson to be paid the arrears of annuity due to them prior to Mrs Fotheringham's death, out of the income of the trust-funds subsequent to that event. The claim for Mrs Fotheringham's executors was given up at the bar, but that for Mrs Paterson was insisted in.

At advising on 6th June 1840, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it finds no claim competent to Mrs Paterson for sums alleged to be due as arrears of annuities falling due prior to Mrs Fotheringham's death."

ham's death, in so far as it may appear that the whole interest, dividends, or profits of the free proceeds of the estate being insufficient for the payment of the full annuities, were paid to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, or may be payable under the previous finding of the Lord Ordinary's said interlocutor, proportionally, according to the terms of the trust-deed; and find that Mrs Paterson is entitled to payment of the whole arrears of annuity due to her out of the interest, dividends, or profits of the free proceeds of the whole trust-estate accruing during her own lifetime: Quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of both reclaiming notes; reserving all questions of expenses, and decern."

Misses Casamaijor and others, the residuary legatees, appealed, and maintained—1. During the period, at all events, prior to Mrs Fotheringham's death, the annuity payable to Mrs Paterson was limited, by the trust-deed, to the free annual proceeds of a certain proportion of the trust-estate; and Mrs Paterson is not entitled to have her annuity for that period made up to £400 a-year from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate accruing subsequent to Mrs Fotheringham's death. 2. The proportion of the capital of the trust-estate, which Mrs Paterson is entitled to have set apart for providing her annuity, did not become larger after Mrs Fotheringham's death than it was during her lifetime. 3. It ought to be ascertained under the accounting, whether, at the time of the testator's death, the free capital of the trust-estate was more than sufficient for procuring investments for providing the full annuities; and if such was the state of matters at that time, the surplus which then existed should be dealt with as a fund which was then divisible among the fiars of the residue; and the subsequent interest or annual proceeds thereof should be held to have belonged to them, and not to the liferent annuitants. 4. At all events, any surplus of the annual proceeds of the free residue of the trust-estate, which has existed in any year or years during the subsistence of the trust, beyond what was necessary for satisfying the annuities payable for such year or years respectively, was not claimable by the annuitants to make up deficiencies in other years; and the same, with the interest thereof, belongs to the fiars of the residue. 5. According to the true meaning and construction of the settlement, two-tenth parts of the capital of the free residue of the trust-funds became divisible among the fiars of the residue, on the truster's death; and each of Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson became entitled only to the revenue of four-tenths thereof.

The respondents (the surviving trustee and surviving annuitants) maintained—1. As there was a deficiency in the annual revenues of the trust-estate, after deducting the preferable burdens, to pay the full annuities to Mrs Fotheringham and Mrs Paterson, and as Mrs Buchanan had predeceased the testator, the payment of these annuities constituted a primary burden on the whole residue, and no portion of the capital was set free by the death of Mrs Buchanan or otherwise, so as to admit of its being divided among the residuary legatees. 2. As the interests and dividends drawn from the whole residue of the trust-estate were appointed to be applied to the payment of the annuities, it was the plain meaning and intention of the testator that the surplus revenue of one year should be applied to make up the deficiency of another year, while such surplus accrued during the lifetime of the annuitants respectively. 3. The rights and interests of the annuitants.

VOL. XIV.—No. XV.

cannot be affected by the delay on the part of the trustees to bring the heritable property more immediately to sale.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, which has unfortunately been the subject a second time of appeal to your Lordships' House, raises a question of some difficulty from the obscurity of the mode of expression which has been adopted by the author of the trust-deed, upon which the question arises. My Lords, with regard to the former appeal, I will only observe, that nothing that was decided upon that occasion will have the slightest reference to the present. It regarded totally different interests, and different parts of the trust-deed. The questions now for consideration, therefore, are totally unaffected by any thing which was decided by this House or by the Court of Session upon the former occasion. My Lords, the circumstances which gave rise to the present questions are shortly these:—Provision was made in this trust-deed for three annuities, and, subject to the interests of those annuities, a gift was made to certain persons who were entitled to the residue of the estate. The testator, it appears, had three sisters. One sister died before his own death. The provision was, that the property should be sold, and the proceeds invested in sufficient sums to provide for the payment of those annuities. Now, one question raised was, whether the amount which would have been necessary to provide for the annuity of the sister who predeceased, was or was not to be a fund applicable to the payment of the other annuities, or whether it was to go immediately to those who were to take in remainder upon the death of the annuitants? Now, the short answer to that claim is, that the annuity having lapsed by the previous death of the legatee, at the moment of the death of the author of the trust, there was no such annuity, and no such legacy. That sum, therefore, was a fund applicable to pay those legacies and annuities which remained. The legacies and annuities which remained, were the two annuities of £400 each, to each of the surviving sisters. The deed therefore must be read and construed as if there were no such disposition in it. Upon that point there does not appear to be any difficulty whatever; and I apprehend it to be quite clear, that the Court of Session were right in holding, that the property which existed at the time of the testator's death was applicable to pay the two annuities of £400 each. But, my Lords, the difficulty arose here. The testator had directed the property to be sold, and out of the proceeds of the sale, sufficient sums to be invested to answer those two annuities and the legacies. His death took place many years ago, and the property was not sold. It remained in the character of land, and produced an income, which, it appears, for the first year after the death, was more than sufficient to pay the annuities of £400 to the two sisters, but which, at a subsequent time, did not produce sufficient to pay those two annuities. Nothing, however, was done. No sale took place—no application was made by the annuitants to have a sale—no application was made by the residuary legatees to have a sale; but the property remained as land for several years. To the extent of the income of the land, whatever was produced after paying the prior charges, was paid over to the annuitants—leaving at first a surplus, and subsequently not producing enough to pay the annuities. Then one of the annuitants died—one of the sisters died—and the surviving sister makes this claim, which has been recognised by the Court of Session (the Court of Session differing, in this respect, from the opinion first expressed by the Lord Ordinary),—namely, that the surviving sister has not only a title to the income which may arise from one-half of the property which was devoted to the payment of that annuity, but that she has a title, as against the moiety released by the death of the sister, to be paid the arrears of the annuity which were not paid out of the proceeds of the land at the time of the testator's death. Another claim was made, that the surplus income which arose in the first year after the death of the testator, is also applicable to pay the subsequent deficiencies. The Court, however, have decided, that this is a privilege belonging to the surviving sister alone, and that the representatives of the sister who is dead, are bound to take that which the estate produces, and have no claim against any part of the property for the payment of the deficiency. My Lords, I cannot but think that there has not been quite that accurate attention paid by the Court below to the terms in which this property is devoted to the payment of the annuities, and in which it is afterwards given over, which might have been bestowed upon it, and which, if understood in the sense in which I understand them, would have prevented all the difficulty which has arisen in the Court below in dealing with those minute parts of the case,—inasmuch as, according to the construction which I put upon this instrument, there is no room left for raising those minor points. It is clear that the testator contemplated two events. It is clear that he contemplated an immediate sale. He directs an immediate sale. It is contrary to his intentions, and contrary to the expectations he entertains, that an immediate sale should not take place. Perhaps, before I advert to the particular language used in this instrument, I may recollect to your Lordships' recollection the rule which has been established in this country, after some difficulty and some doubt, but which is now fully recognised, and which is the only rule by which questions of this sort can be determined with any thing like certainty, or any thing like justice to the parties. It frequently happens that what a testator contemplates does not take place. He intends land to be converted into money, or money to be converted into land, and he gives directions accordingly, and those directions are not acted upon; and after many years having passed, the question arises, how the interests of the parties are to be arranged?—not entirely according to the directions of the testator, because he has given no directions with respect to the state of circumstances that has arisen,—but how the intentions of the testator are best to be carried out with regard to the state of circumstances which has arisen subsequently to his death; because, of necessity, the Court must adopt some course of arranging the interests of the parties. You cannot arrange them exactly as the testator intended, because the facts are different from what he contemplated: the Court is therefore under the necessity of adopting some course with reference to the intention of the testator, and with reference to what is just between the parties. My Lords, I allude to the doctrine laid down in the case of Sitwell v. Bernard in 6th Vesey; and there are many other cases in which a similar difficulty has occurred. In that case the testator intended that all the moneys should be converted into land. That was the declared intention of the author of the trust-disposition; and contemplating that to take place, and intending that to take place soon after his death, and intending to impose upon the parties claiming under his will a motive to stimulate them to carry his intentions into effect, he gave the whole of his estate in trust, and directed his income to accumulate till land should be purchased. He directed the money to be invested in land, and then gave a tenancy for life, with remainder over in the land to be purchased. Many years elapsed, and no land was purchased. The property remained as the testator had left it, in the shape of money; and the question arose, what was to be done with it? It was quite contrary to the testator's declared intention, that any party should derive any benefit from the fund, so long as it remained in the shape of money; but the Court held, that as it had remained in the shape of money, and there had never been a conversion of it, it was necessary to adopt some middle course in order not to defeat the obvious intention of the author of the gift,—namely, that the tenant should derive some benefit; and the Court directed the accumulation to cease after the expiration of the first year after the death of the testator, considering that a reasonable time within which the intentions of the testator ought to have been carried into effect, and directed the income of the fund so existing to be paid to the party who was tenant for life of the land,—thus departing from the terms of the author of the gift, but doing that which, under all the circumstances, appeared to be most consistent with his intention. Now, in this case there is a direction to convert the land into money; and when converted into money, after setting apart funds to meet the amount of the annuities of £400 a-year each, the surplus was, in so many words, given over to the legatees. Now, it is obvious that, by not converting the land into money, the chance which the testator contemplated of the proceeds of the estate being more than was necessary to meet the annuities, and of there being, therefore, a fund applicable to the immediate payment of the residuary legatees, would not come into operation, because it never could be ascertained that there was any such fund; and therefore, there could be no such claim enforced till after the sale took place; and therefore, to that extent, they were disappointed and postponed. Those who claimed the annuities had reason to be content; because it was immaterial to them whether the annuities came out of the land or out of the money, provided there was sufficient. So long, therefore, as a sufficient income came out of the land, they received what it was intended they should receive. But when that income failed, and the produce of the estate was not sufficient to pay the annuities, they had the remedy in their own hands. They might then have insisted upon the execution of this trust, and upon the sale of the estates, in order that they might have the benefit of having a fund which probably would have produced more income in the shape of money than whilst it existed in the shape of land, in order to pay the annuities which the land was to pay. But they took no such step. They received the income of the land, so far as it would go. They permitted the property to remain in the state in which the testator had left it, but which he had directed to be changed into another form, for the purpose of securing the payment of the annuities. The question therefore is, whether, independently of the particular terms of the gift to which I have adverted,—whether, if there had been more doubt upon these terms than in my opinion there is,—the fair justice of the case between the parties would not be, to act upon the rule established in Sitwell v. Bernard, and the other cases, that if the parties chose to permit the property to remain, contrary to the intention of the testator, in the state in which he left it, but which he had directed to be changed, that they should take it for better for worse, in the situation in which they have it, and are not entitled, at a future time, to pay themselves in full, to the prejudice of those who, if the property had been converted at the time the testator directed, might at least have had a chance of having a share in it, and who, in all probability, would at that time have had a share. Therefore, independently of the particular provisions of this deed, I should have thought the justice between the parties would have been, to let them receive such income as the land would produce, until the period of conversion, and to give them no title, as against either the future income of the fund, or as against the capital of the fund that has not been converted, for the purpose of paying the deficiency of the fund. Your Lordships will just permit me to call your attention to the extraordinary consequence of yielding to this claim. The first year after the death of the testator, the land produced more than enough to pay the annuities. Now, supposing there was £200 more than enough to pay the annuities, the claim is, that that surplus fund is to be held liable to make good the deficiency in any future year. Now, a deficiency might not occur for twenty or thirty years. The land might have been sufficient to keep down the annuities, and only just sufficient, or it might have produced more. Then, was that accumulating income to be held de anno in annum by the trustees, because perchance, twenty years hence, the land might not produce sufficient to pay the annuities? And yet, according to the claim made by these annuitants, that would be the consequence. If they have a claim of lien to answer future deficiencies, the trustees would not then be warranted in paying it over to the legatees. In what situation, then, would the legatees be? They are entitled immediately to receive the surplus of the fund beyond what is necessary to pay the annuitants; but they would be prohibited from receiving the surplus beyond what is necessary to pay them; and the funds are to be retained during the continuance of the lives of the annuitants, in order to meet the possible chance, more or less remote, of the land not being sufficient to pay the annuities. It seems quite impossible that such a construction should be adopted, leading to such extravagant consequences. In point of fact, there has been no one year in which a surplus has been found beyond the first two or three years. But that makes no difference in principle. It only shows how extravagant the proposition would be, to consider the annuitants as entitled to the surplus of one year, in order to meet the deficiencies of future years. But, my Lords, when we come to see what it is that the testator has directed upon the face of this deed, it appears to me that these considerations may be thrown out of view; because, as I construe this instrument, it is this:—Upon the sale of the estate, if the funds were sufficient to secure the annuities of £400 (an event which undoubtedly the testator contemplated), then there would be capital sums invested sufficient for that purpose, and then any surplus of the proceeds of the estate, and those capital sums so invested, when made “tangible,” as the expression is, by the death of the annuitants, were to be paid over to the residuary legatees. But the testator had the prudence not to confine his view to that event only, because he contemplated the possibility of the proceeds of the sale of the estate not being sufficient to secure the whole amount of those annuities, and he then directs, that in that event, there being no surplus, the whole proceeds of the sale, after paying the prior charges, shall be invested, be the amount what it may, and that the income arising from that fund, which is assumed to be inadequate to pay the annuities of £400 a-year each to the sisters, shall be divided between the sisters, in the same proportion in which they would be entitled to the full income, provided it had been sufficient to pay the annuities, and then upon the death of each of the annuitants, either the whole fund which shall have produced sufficient to pay the £400, or the amount of the fund, whatever it might be, should in that event be paid over to the residuary legatees. Now, my Lords, if that be the construction of the deed, then it excludes all the other questions, because the event there has happened,—a deficient fund exists—a fund not sufficient to pay the whole of the annuities. Upon the death of one of the annuitants, that portion of the fund which was set apart to answer that annuity is to go over to the residuary legatees. Then, what claim can the surviving annuitant have against the income of the other moiety, to keep down the annuity which had fallen in arrear? It is quite obvious that there cannot be both claims. If it is liable to keep down the deficiency of the fund to pay the annuity, then it cannot go over to the residuary legatees. If, then, the construction of this instrument be, that supposing the fund to be inadequate to the payment of the annuities, yet upon the death of one of the annuitants, the capital of the fund is to go over to the residuary legatees, then all claim of the surviving annuitant to that released portion of the fund must necessarily fail, according to the construction I put upon this deed. It is also free from the argument which was pressed at the bar, and which seems to have been rather assumed in the Court below,—namely, that in the event of the fund being sufficient, it was not to be divided into different investments, to answer the different annuities, but was to remain in one fund, and the annuities to be charged upon that gross fund. Now, if the testator has directed, that upon the supposition of the fund not being sufficient upon the death of one of the annuitants, the fund answerable to that annuity shall go over, it is not very material whether the fund was to remain as one aggregate fund, or whether the fund was to be divided; though undoubtedly the intention would be more manifest, if it appeared upon the face of the instrument that the fund, even in that case, was to be divided, and to be set apart to answer the annuities of the remaining annuitants. According to the construction I put upon this instrument, however, he has directed, in case of deficiency, the fund itself to be appropriated according to the shares and proportions to which the annuitants would have been entitled, had there been a sufficient fund. The case is the same,—there is no difference in the result,—if he had directed that the share, whether a divided share or an undivided share, applicable to the annuity of one of the sisters, was to go over, in the event of the death of that sister, to the residuary legatee, and not to be a fund to make good the annuity of the surviving annuitant, to the extent of forming a fund which might be adequate to the purpose. Now, before the particular words are adverted to, there is another part of the instrument only necessary to be adverted to, for the purpose of showing how much it was in the contemplation of the author of the deed that the property might not be found adequate, or nearly adequate, to pay those annuities of £400 a-year, and the legacies. He directs, in a subsequent part of the deed, that two legacies of £1000 each should be paid, according to the construction of this instrument, in priority to the application of the funds to secure the annuities. That is to say, if the residue amounts to a certain sum, £15,000, then the two legatees were to have

£1000 each; but if the residue was under £15,000, and not less than £8000, then they were to have £500 each. He contemplated, therefore, the possibility of that event; and he also contemplated that there might be less than £8000, and then they were to have no legacy at all. Now, I will suppose that it was exactly £8000. If it came exactly to £8000, then the two legatees were to have £500 each,—they therefore were to have £1000 out of the £8000,—£7000 remaining to answer annuities of £1000 a-year. It is quite clear (for it runs through the whole instrument) that he contemplated not only the case of there not being enough to pay the £1000, but of there being a fund very inadequate indeed to meet those charges. With that present to his mind, and guarding against both alternatives, he makes this provision: He directs the property to be sold, and “in the event that, after payment of my debts, fulfilment of the obligations in which I may stand bound at the time of my death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution hereof, and of the £500 to my said sister Mrs Alexander, the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foreshaid annuities hereby settled on my said sisters”—(he had before provided for their being sufficient—he now provides for their not being sufficient)—“then it is my meaning and intention that the residue, whatever it may be, shall be vested and laid out, and the interest or dividends arising therefrom be paid unto, and divided among my three sisters, Mrs Fotheringham, Mrs Paterson and Mrs Buchanan, during their respective lives, in the same proportions, and exactly in the same terms in every respect, as above pointed out with respect to the full annuities of £400, £400 and £200.” Now, here he directs not merely that the annuities shall be paid in those proportions, but he directs that in case of a deficiency, the residue shall be invested, and the income paid, “in the same proportions, and exactly in the same terms.” How is that direction to be complied with? Why, if there were but two, as the annuities were equal, equal sums to be invested, and equal annuities to be paid,—whether the sum amounted to only £2000, or to what was sufficient to pay the annuities of the £400 a-year, was perfectly immaterial. Whatever it was, the sisters were to share it equally between themselves. The intentions of the testator, and his directions, were applicable to the one case as well as to the other,—the only difference being, that the income of the sisters would depend upon the amount of the fund. In no other respect were the directions of the testator to be varied by the circumstance of the estate producing more or less money. That is the principal direction; and then he goes on,—“and I do hereby direct my trustees to regulate themselves accordingly.” Then comes the fifth provision, which gives the fund over—“Quinto, In the event of there being any of the proceeds of my said funds and estate remaining, after setting apart capital sums sufficient to yield the three annuities of £400, £400 and £200, as above specified, then I hereby direct my said trustees to pay such surplus, together with the capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foreshaid annuities, as and when such capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively.” Now, so far he has provided for the event of the capital being sufficient to meet the annuities, and he has directed what is to be done with the surplus, if any, together with the capital sums invested, when they become tangible by the death of the annuitants. Now he is about to provide for the other contingency, of the fund being inadequate for this purpose: “Or in the event of there being no surplus, then the capital sums, whatever their amount may be, so to be vested and laid out as aforesaid, as and when such capital sums become tangible as aforesaid.” Then, what is the second alternative? He has presented us with two alternatives. In the early part of the instrument he has directed the investment of capital sums sufficient to answer the purpose of the annuities, and if these be not sufficient, he has directed an investment of the residue, whatever it may be, to answer the annuities pro tanto. Then, in the gift over, he says: if there be a surplus, the surplus, together with the capital sums so invested, when become tangible by the death of the annuitants, is to go over; or in the other event, of the funds invested not being sufficient to pay the annuities, then the capital sums, become tangible by the death of the annuitants, are to go over. That, my Lords, is precisely what has happened, although the property has not been sold, and the money not invested. It has been hitherto an inadequate fund; and it cannot be contended, that if the estate had been sold, and had produced a fund inadequate to pay the annuities in full,—that if in that event the residuary legatees had been entitled to one-half of the residuary fund on the death of one of the sisters—they would not be entitled to one-half of the fund when it is not converted into money. If that could not be contended in the event of the fund being invested, it is clear that it could not be contended in the present circumstances of the fund not being invested. If the right construction of the sentence be, that in the event of the fund being deficient, there nevertheless shall be an investment of the fund, whatever it may be, to answer the annuities pro tanto, then the whole is intelligible. But if that be not the right construction, it is not very easy to understand or to decide the meaning of the terms of the instrument. But how does that affect the claims of the annuitants? The fund is answerable to pay the annuities equally: each annuitant, therefore, is entitled to one-half, whether it exists as one fund, or whether it is divided. It is difficult to see how that can affect the claim of either of the annuitants to receive out of the future income of the other, what shall remain unsatisfied by the produce of the estate. My Lords, whether the one construction or the other be correct, I apprehend that the testator has sufficiently declared that the parties, if they cannot get the whole amount of the annuities, must take the income which the fund will produce, whatever it may be, and that upon the death of one of the annuitants, the fund which thus becomes tangible shall go over to the legatees; and with that declaration, your Lordships probably will think it right to vary the interlocutor which has been appealed from. The better way will be, to declare that to be the construction which your Lordships put upon this instrument, and to refer it back to the Court of Session to apply that to the interlocutor to be pronounced. This case presents some difficulty. In the first place, with regard to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which is left untouched by the Court of Session, except so far as it is altered with regard to Mrs Paterson's claim to future arrears of the annuity, I am not quite sure that I entirely follow all the provisions of that interlocutor. The expressions are not sufficiently distinct to enable me to understand how far the learned Judge intended to go. For instance, the second finding “finds that the full security and payment of these annuities constituted a primary and preferable burden on the whole residue of the trust-funds and estate, after deducting the sums necessary for paying and satisfying the testator's debts and obligations, the expenses of the trust, the legacy of £500 to Mrs Alexander, and the two legacies of £1000 each, payable to George and Thomas Paterson.” That is perfectly correct, according to my view of the case, if it is confined to each year; but it appears to me impossible, from the language used, to ascertain whether the learned Judge meant to confine it to each year, or whether he meant to say that the fund is answerable, during the whole continuance of the trust, to make good those annuities. If that be the meaning, then I differ from the learned Judge.

Mr Attorney-General.—My Lords, if I may humbly suggest, it would be very important that your Lordships should make an express declaration in your order upon that subject.

Lord Chancellor.—It will be quite explicit, if the House declare the true construction of the instrument to be, that although the income was inadequate to pay the annuities, upon the death of one of the annuitants, one-half of the fund went over to the residuary legatees, and it precludes the possibility of the income of that fund being applicable to any other purpose.

Lord Advocate.—Also to find (which was not done), that Mrs Paterson, the surviving annuitant, is entitled only to the income of one-half of the fund from the death of Mrs Fotheringham.

Mr Attorney-General.—That would follow.

Lord Chancellor.—The Lord Ordinary thought that neither of them took it. When it came before the Court of Session, they were of opinion that Mrs Paterson was entitled to payment of the whole arrears of the annuity due to her. But it appears to me that it will be quite free from all doubt, if the House declare, that during the continuance of the trust, the annuitants can only divide the income of the estate as far as it will go, and that upon the death of one of them, the share which was invested to secure the payment of that annuity went over to the residuary legatees. That would exclude all the other questions; and I think the better way will be to make these declarations, and then to refer it back to the Court of Session to apply them.

Ordered accordingly.

2d February 1842.

No. 110.—ROBERT KEMP (Napier's Trustee), and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. JOHN NAPIER and OTHERS (Mrs Elizabeth M'Whinnie or Napier's Trustees), Defenders.

Husband and Wife—Donatio—Revocation.—A husband, a number of years after marriage, executed a bond of annuity, in which, for the alleged purpose of supplying the want of a marriage-contract, he bound himself to pay to his wife, in satisfaction of her legal claims, an annuity of £200 during his life, and of £500 after his death, in the event of her survivance.—Held that the annuity of £200 was revocable, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem.

John Napier of Mollance married Mrs Elizabeth M'Whinnie in 1791. At the date of the marriage he was a clerk in the office of the Bank of Scotland at Kirkcudbright,—was possessed of little substance, and received no tocher with his wife. A few years after he engaged extensively in business, and in speculations of various kinds. In 1806, when the Galloway Banking Company was established, he became a partner and manager, and continued owner of one-half of the whole stock of the bank till its dissolution in 1821. In the meanwhile, and subsequently, he made large purchases of land—the value having been estimated at above £120,000. In 1827, he executed an heritable bond of annuity in favour of Mrs Napier. This bond, on the narrative that no marriage-contract had been executed between the spouses, “proceeds to supply that defect” by binding Mr Napier, his heirs, executors and successors, to pay to Mrs Napier, in satisfaction of all legal claims, and farther, to pay to her “a free annuity of £500 Sterling yearly during all the days of her life,” in the event of her survivance. In security of these two annuities the bond contains procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine in the lands of Mollance in favour of Mrs Napier, who was accordingly infeft. At the date of this infeftment, the estate of Mollance, though burdened to a considerable extent, afforded ample security for the annuity, but subsequently additional bonds were granted more than sufficient, independently of it, to exhaust the whole estate.

“a free annuity of £200 Sterling yearly during all the days of my life, for her sole use and benefit, and exclusive of my jus mariti or control, debts or debts, in any manner of way, payable at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment thereof at the term of Whitsunday first, and the next term's payment at Martinmas thereafter, and so forth half-yearly, termly and proportionally thereafter during my lifetime, with one fifth-part more of legitimate penalty in case of failzie, and the legal interest of the said annuity from and after the respective terms at which the same falls due, and in time coming during the not-payment thereof;”

In 1836 Mr Napier became bankrupt, and his estates were sequestrated. In these circumstances the present action, for the purpose of reducing the bond of annuity, was raised by his trustee, Mr Kemp, and insisted in by Messrs Hankeys and Company, bankers in London, who, as heritable creditors of a date subsequent to that bond, had the real interest in the action—there being no hope of any reversion for the personal creditors.

Defences were lodged by Mrs Napier, and her husband for his interest; and she having died during the dependence, the action was carried on by her husband and two of her children, as her trustees, who alleged that the whole sums falling due under the annuity, from 1827 to 1839, the date of Mrs Napier's death, were unpaid, and fell to be ranked preferably on the estate.

The following were the grounds of reduction:—First (formal).

“Secundo, The said heritable bond of annuity is null and ineffectual as against the pursuer or the creditors of the said John Napier, in respect it was granted by him whilst he was insolvent, or at least in labouring circumstances and largely indebted, and was a fraudulent and collusive device, intended for the purpose of excluding or prejudicing the claims of the grantor's creditors, prior as well as future. Tertio, The said heritable bond of annuity is null and reducible at the instance of the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, under the Statute 1621, c. 18, which enacts and declares ‘all alienations, dispositions, assignments and translations whatsoever, made by the debtor of any of his lands, teinds, reversions, actions, debts, or goods whatsoever, to any conjunct or confident person, without true, just, and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid, the same being done after the contracting of lawful debts from true creditors, to have been from the beginning and to be in all time coming, null and of none avail, force nor effect, at the instance of the true and just creditor, by way of action, exception or reply, without farther declarator.’ Quarto, At least the said heritable bond of annuity is revocable or reducible, in whole or in part, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and is to be held as revoked or reduced by the subsequent contraction of debts, both heritable and personal, to such an amount as to produce the insolvency and bankruptcy of the grantor; and, at all events, the said heritable bond of annuity ought, under the circumstances before stated, to be now reduced and set aside accordingly, at the instance of the pursuer under his foresaid right.”

The pursuers pleaded—1. The bond of annuity challenged is null and reducible at the instance of the pursuers, in respect the grantor was at its date insolvent, or at least was largely indebted and in labouring circumstances, and the granting of said bond was a fraudulent and collusive device between the grantor and his own wife, made with the purpose of excluding or prejudicing the grantor's creditors. 2. Said bond is null and reducible at the instance of the pursuers under the Statute 1621. 3. The bond is revocable or reducible, in whole or in part, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and must now be held to be revoked, and the pursuers are entitled either to exercise the power of revocation, or have the deed declared invalid. 4. At least the said bond, in consideration of the circumstances under which it was granted, and the purpose for which it is now attempted to be used, ought to be set aside at the instance of the pursuers, in whole or in part. 5. Separatim, The bond is ineffectual or reducible, in so far as relates to the annuity of £200 during the husband's life; in respect it was gratuitous, unreasonable, revocable, and incapable of competing with onerous creditors,—and the claim for arrears of annuity, now insisted in by the wife's representatives, over and above the aliment and support afforded to herself during her life, is untenable in law.

The defenders pleaded—1. The pursuers, Messrs Hankeys and Company, who are posterior creditors, having contracted with Mr Napier long after the date of the bond in question, and the said bond having been made public, and acted upon from its date, and in the knowledge of the pursuers at the time they took their heritable securities, it is not competent for the pursuers now to plead the alleged insolvency of Mr Napier at its date as a ground of reduction, and they are barred personali exceptione from maintaining this action. 2. It is not competent for Messrs Hankeys and Company to pursue reduction of the bond to Mrs Napier, they being personally barred from challenging it on the grounds libelled on; inasmuch as they acted and transacted with Mr Napier up to the date of his sequestration in 1836 as his general agents and bankers in London, and were well aware of the state of his affairs, and had numerous transactions with him, and were conjunct and confident persons at the time when their own heritable bond in security and infestment were taken. 3. The bond of annuity and the easine in favour of Mrs Napier are neither null nor reducible on any of the grounds pleaded by the pursuers, Messrs Hankeys and Company, who are posterior creditors, transacting on the faith of the public records, and were aware of the real prior security in favour of Mrs Napier. 4. More particularly, they are neither null nor reducible on the alleged ground of Mr Napier's insolvency at the date of the bond, or as a fraudulent and collusive device between him and Mrs Napier, for the purpose of prejudicing or excluding his creditors: in respect that, at the date of the bond, Mr Napier was not insolvent, nor even in labouring circumstances; and so far from being a fraudulent and collusive device to injure his creditors, the transaction was, on the contrary, a natural, fair, and onerous one. 5. As the bond was granted for a just, true, and onerous consideration, and in return for the rights surrendered by Mrs Napier, it is not reducible under the Statute 1631. 6. The bond is not revocable or reducible, in whole or in part, as a donatio inter vivos or uorum, and neither in fact nor in law can it be held as revoked, or as still revocable by the pursuers. 7. Separatim, in respect that Mrs Napier renounced her right of terce, claims of jus relictæ, and all others competent to her after her husband's death, in consideration of the annuity of £200 during his life, as well as the provision thereafter, such annuity was neither gratuitous nor unreasonable, neither is it revocable at the instance of posterior creditors, taking infestment in the full knowledge of such prior security. 8. As the said annuity was granted to Mrs Napier, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti, her trustees are entitled to recover the arrears; nor have the pursuers any just counter-claim in law, except for such sums as Mr Napier may have granted to Mrs Napier for her sole use and benefit since the date of her husband's sequestration.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the record, and thereupon considered the process and writs produced, sustains the reasons of reduction, and reduces, decerns and declares in terms of the libel: Finds no expenses hitherto incurred due to either party, and decerns.

"Note.—This is a challenge of an heritable bond of annuity granted by a husband in favour of his wife, whereby he bound himself instantly to pay to her an annuity of £200, secluding his own jus mariti, and which was to be raised to £500 in case she survived him. That bond of annuity was granted in 1827, when the spouses had been married for nearly forty years, and when the husband was engaged in a most extensive trade. Infestment was at the same time given to the wife over lands which certainly formed an ample security at its date for the annuity, if the bond was valid and irrevocable.

"The husband, however, afterwards contracted heritable debts over the properties contained in this security to an amount exceeding their value; and he incurred other personal debts to a very large amount, for which it is said there are not funds to afford one farthing of a dividend. His estate was sequestrated in 1836, and the trustee has brought the present action for setting aside the wife's bond of annuity; and it is insisted on, it is believed, chiefly for behoof of posterior heritable creditors, whose security will be greatly deficient if the heritable bond in favour of the wife be sustained. She herself is now dead; but her family, as her successors, allege that the whole annuities from 1827 till her death in 1839 are unpaid, and fall to be ranked preferably on the proceeds of the heritable estates now sold. Her bond has now been reduced on the following grounds:—

"1st, The bond of annuity was a voluntary unilateral deed, granted by a husband in a precarious and extensive trade in favour of his own wife, while no antecedent obligation has been proved binding him to execute such a deed. It is humbly thought that this is a plain case of donatio, which the husband was entitled and bound to revoke, when it was necessary for the purposes of justice to his onerous creditors that he should execute a revocation.

"2d, If the husband had the power of revoking this donation, it is supposed to be a clear and incontestable proposition in law, that this faculty was adjudgeable by his creditors, and must be held as transferred to the trustee in the sequestration for their behoof, in virtue of the adjudication contained in the Act of Sequestration.—See Erskine, B. I. tit. 6, § 31.

"On the whole, it humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary that the security under challenge is a novel species of preference attempted to be given by a husband to a wife, and that it would be alike contrary to the principles of bankrupt law and to the interests of trade to support it."

Both parties reclaimed,—the defenders on the merits, and the pursuers for expenses.

At advising,

Lord President.—There is a manifest distinction between the annuity of £200 made payable during Napier's life, and the annuity of £500 made payable after his death, in the event of his wife's survivance. The latter is granted in lieu of her legal claim, as jus relictæ, &c., and may be considered onerous; but if there ever was a purely gratuitous donation between husband and wife, it is this annuity of £200. The simple question then is, whether, in consequence of Mr Napier having become insolvent (for I don't say that he was so at the time when the bond was granted), his creditors, who will otherwise be cut out of their debts, are not entitled to have it recalled as a donatio? This is the question; and I think the Lord Ordinary has decided it rightly, only he has gone a little too far, for he has sustained the whole reasons of reduction, while we are inclined to go entirely on the fourth.

Lord Gillies.—I concur. In consequence of Mrs Napier's death, the annuity of £500 may be laid out of view, though indeed it may be founded on as an admirable proof, showing that it was granted in lieu of the wife's claims, and that the other was not so granted, but was a pure donation. In fact, it was just pin-money. The defenders, in their statement, endeavour to give the matter a different complexion, and say (p. 22) that Mrs Napier "was desirous, during her husband's life, to have the means in her power to be of immediate service both to her children and grandchildren." This is stated as the inductive cause of the annuity of £200, and makes it even less than pin-money,—making it, in fact, just continue to be the husband's own property. In these circumstances, insolvency having taken place, and there having been a de facto revocation of the annuity by the subsequent granting of bonds in favour of other heritable creditors, I can have no difficulty in concurring with your Lordship to sustain the fourth reason of reduction.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must certainly be varied. As to the annuity of £500, it is gone; but the Lord Ordinary sustains the whole reasons of reduction, whereas all that is meant is only to sustain one-half of one reason, namely, the fourth. Now, in so far as the action concludes, that on sequestration the annuity of £200 became revocable as a donation, I am clear that it must be sustained. It was clearly a donatio,—she was to draw it during her husband's life,—she granted nothing in return, and she was, moreover, to receive an annuity of £500 in the event of her surviving. Being thus a donatio, it was clearly revocable; and then, when the husband became insolvent, and sequestration took place, the creditors, without reference to the period when their debts were incurred, became vested with the right of revocation. It is not disputed that they have revoked it; and had they not done it themselves, they were clearly entitled, after the sequestration, to compel the husband to do it for them. I don't see that any thing depends on the date of the reduction,—it rests on the right of revocation. And I have always understood, that when a donatio is revoked, it is revoked altogether, as to all effects of being good. It is said, that if part had been paid, there would have been no title, on revocation, to reclaim it,—the money having been actually paid under the exclusion of the ius mariti. I have some doubt of this. If the money is actually spent, it is gone. The spouses have spent it together, and neither the husband nor his creditors could, by revocation, reclaim payment of what he had given his wife to spend. But nothing of the kind is asked here. There is no conclusion to this effect. But the wife's trustees maintain, not only that she was entitled to keep what she spent, but to make good the whole right which vested in her,—meaning by this the whole of the arrears. I cannot see it; as I have already said, in so far as the money is spent, it is gone; but in so far as it exists, I cannot see in what respect it differs, after revocation, from the case of moveables. Say moveables existed to the value of £1000, how could the wife have resisted the husband's right to revoke a donation of these? Just as little could she have resisted the revocation of a sum of money, if the money had been marked, and not spent. The present is an a fortiori case; for here the money has not been paid at all, and what the wife's trustees claim is, only the arrears not paid. Suppose that, instead of an annuity, the bond granted by the husband had been for a sum of £1000 instantly payable, is it possible to doubt that on revocation, if none of it had been spent, but all had remained due, there would have been a good ground to reclaim payment of this? I cannot have the least doubt. The plain effect of revocation is, that the wife can demand nothing, past or future, on the ground of the donation. It is said that the Messrs Hankeys are claiming for a debt contracted in 1835, whereas the bond was granted in 1827. I don't see the relevancy of this statement. They are creditors, and are entitled to the full benefit of the revocation. They are just in the husband's place. I am therefore clear that we ought to adhere to the interlocutor, in so far as it sustains the fourth reason of reduction, and declares that nothing can now be claimed by the wife under the bond of annuity.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur entirely. In the first place, it is almost admitted that the annuity for £200 must be considered as a donation; and in the second place, it cannot be disputed that the granting of subsequent heritable securities and sequestration amount to a revocation. It has in fact been recalled; and the only question is the effect,—whether the revocation disposes of all claims for arrears previous to its date? I cannot see the slightest doubt for holding that it does not. After revocation has been made in circumstances like the present, if a sum, forming part of the donation, is clearly extant or traceable, the effect is to enable the party interested in the revocation to recover it. Suppose each year's annuity had been paid as it fell due, and lodged in bank, the creditors would clearly have been entitled to the whole amount; but all difficulty is here removed, because no payment has been made, and the only sums in dispute are arrears not paid. I cannot see any ground for the defenders' claims.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it sustains the whole reasons of reduction libelled; adhere to said interlocutor, in as far as it sustains the fourth reason of reduction as applicable to that part of the heritable bond which relates to the annuity of £200, and to that extent refuse the reclaiming note for said trustees, and reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the libel accordingly: Find it unnecessary now to entertain the action as to any other part of said bond, or to any of the other reasons of reduction; refuse the reclaiming note for said Robert Kemp and others, and find neither party entitled to expenses."

2d February 1842.

No. 111.—LETHEM'S REPRESENTATIVES, Raisers, vs. WILLIAM BAIRD and MRS JANET HADDOW or FELL, Claimants.

Husband and Wife—Surrogatum—Circumstances in which a wife was preferred to her husband's creditors, for a sum of money which had been lodged by him in the hands of a third party for a special purpose, but which was held to be clearly traceable as part of the price of her heritable estate.

John Haddow of Easterseat, was succeeded in that property by his two daughters, as heirs-portioners. Mary, one of them, was married to William Fell, who afterwards acquired right to the other daughter's half. The whole property thus came to belong to Fell and his wife—one-half pro indiviso to each. In 1827, Fell borrowed the sum of £540 from William Robertson, to whom, with the concurrence of his wife, he granted a disposition of the lands of Easterseat, ex facie absolute, but restricted by a back letter to a security for the sum lent. At the same time, Fell addressed the following holograph letter to Robertson:

"The disposition granted to you by me and Mrs Fell, for the lands of Easterseat, for the purpose mentioned by you to me, of your letter of this date, should they ever be sold by you, I hereby bind myself to allow you to retain £500, to secure an annuity for Mrs Fell, in such manner as we shall think proper. Should you get up your money, they shall be returned to us in the same manner as previously disposed."

In 1829, Robertson, with the consent of Mr and Mrs Fell, sold the lands of Easterseat to George Hamilton for £1260. Before the price was paid, certain alleged creditors of William Fell used arrestments in the hands both of Robertson and Hamilton. The price was however settled in terms of the following state, holograph of William Fell:

"1829.

" This account settled, and the bal. of £464. 1. 8½. pd. to me by Mr Wm. Robertson, jun. of Kennedies, who is hereby discharged by me of all demands this 4th day of April 1829 years."
" WILLIAM FELL."

On this occasion Fell addressed the following letter to Mr Patrick Lethem:

" 4th April 1829.—SIR, As your friend Mr Robertson entertains some scruples about some arrestments lodged in his hands by alleged creditors of mine, and as I have every wish to give him satisfaction on the subject, I now consign in your hands the sum of £300 Sterling for his relief, in case of any of the arrestments lodged in his hands, or in the hands of Mr George Hamilton, are found to be effectual in any respect, and any expenses he may be put to on that account; and if he is subjected, his draft upon you will be sufficient warrant to you for the money."

It appears to have been understood at the time by Messrs Robertson and Lethem, and also by William Fell himself, that the £300 consigned belonged to Mrs Fell. Accordingly, in a note by William Fell to Lethem, he says,

" 28th October 1829.—Mr Lethem will please pay Mr Robertson the interest due upon the money deposited in his hands belonging to Mrs Fell, and this shall be his authority,"

And in a letter of Robertson, addressed after Lethem's death to his son, he calls the sum consigned, " money belonging to Mrs Fell."

Fell having gone off to America, a process of multipointing was raised by Lethem's representatives. The fund in medio, being composed of the £300 originally consigned, with the interest accruing thereon since 1829, was claimed in toto by Mrs Fell, and also by William Baird, pro tanto, in payment of a debt for which decree had been obtained against William Baird previous to the sale of Easterseat. Baird had endeavoured to fortify his claim by successive arrestments. No arrestment had been used by Mrs Fell.

Baird pleaded—1. The arrestments used by the claimant in the hands of the raisers, being the first and only effectual diligence to attach the fund in medio, the claimant, in virtue of said arrestments, is entitled to be preferably ranked and preferred to the whole of said fund. 2. Whatever claim Mrs Fell may, under the circumstances alleged by her, have against her husband or Mr Robertson to make good their alleged obligations to her, she can have no claim to compete with the claimant for any part of the fund in medio, which was clearly a personal fund belonging exclusively to Fell, the common debtor, and as such was duly attached by the claimant's diligence.

Mrs Fell pleaded—1. The claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of her claim, in respect that the fund in medio is now, and always has been, the claimant's property, as being the surrogatum for her portion of the pro indiviso half of the said lands, which does not fall under the jus mariti of her husband, and is not attachable by his creditors. 2. In respect, farther, that the said consignment was made on the understanding that the rights of parties were not to be thereby affected, but were to be given effect to as if the price had still remained in the hands of the purchaser. 3. In any view, the claimant's husband had no power to impignorate the said sum, belonging to the claimant as aforesaid, in security of his own proper debts, without the special consent and authority of the claimant herself. 4. Even supposing the sum consigned had been attachable for the debts of her husband, the claimant would be entitled to be ranked and preferred over it, pari passu, with her husband's other just and lawful creditors, who have not validly attached the same by diligence, for the amount of one-half the price of the said lands, with interest from the said 4th April 1829, the date of settlement of the price. 5. The claim of Mr Baird ought to be repelled, in respect he has not produced legal evidence of the debt said to be contained in the alleged decree at the instance of him and Mr Maxwell, on which the horning at their instance bears to have been issued. 6. Mr Baird's claim ought not to be sustained, as stated, seeing that, of the two arrestments founded on by him, the first is prescribed, and both are otherwise invalid and insufficient to create any preference over the fund in medio, in respect of the circumstances herein before stated.

" 16th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this process, and thereafter considered the claims and productions of the respective claimants, finds that the fund in medio is composed of the sum of £300 Sterling, with the interest accruing thereon since 1829: Finds that the principal sum is clearly traced to have been a part of the price of the lands of Easterseat, of which the claimant, Mrs Fell, was proprietrix to the extent of one-half, and that the same was brought to sale in 1829, in virtue of a general disposition (qualified by a back letter limiting it to a security) extending over the whole property, to which Mrs Fell became a party for a debt of her husband's: Finds, that when Mrs Fell subscribed the said disposition for her husband's behoof in 1827, he granted a holograph letter or obligation, addressed to the creditor, binding himself, in the event of a sale, that £500 should be invested in the purchase of an annuity for the claimant; which obligation seems to have been highly just and proper in itself, and at all events has never been reduced or challenged: Finds that the sum in medio forms part of the price of the claimant's lands, which were sold during her coverture for £1260 Sterling, or thereby, and consequently is a portion of the fund which should have been employed in the purchase of the said annuity for her: Finds that the claimant is entitled to trace and to claim this fund preferably, and to the exclusion of the creditors of her husband, prior to the sale of her lands: And finds it established that the debt of the competing claimant, Mr Baird, was not contracted posterior to the sale, or on the faith of the fund in medio, but was due to Baird at a prior period by William Fell, the husband alone: Therefore, on the whole, sustains the claim of Mrs Fell, and prefers her to the fund in medio; and repels the claim of Mr Baird, and decerns: Finds no expenses hitherto incurred due to either party, and decerns.

" Note.—As the Lord Ordinary views this case, it is one in which the principles, both of strict law and of equity, alike support Mrs Fell's claim.

" When she was asked to join her husband in a security extending over her portion of the estate in 1827, the husband most properly bound himself, if the lands were sold, that £500 of the price should be expended in purchasing an annuity for Mrs Fell. This was a highly onerous and most reasonable obligation, entitled to every support from the law. Accordingly, when the lands were sold in 1829, they brought a price which showed that Mrs Fell's half of the price was far above £500.

According to a state produced, it was upwards of £630, but after certain appropriations to her husband's debts, the free balance left to her in the purchaser's hands, in April 1829, was reduced to £464. Had Mr Robertson acted rightly in reference to this balance, he should have brought a multiplepounding, in which a separate curator should have been appointed for Mrs Fell, and every shilling of this balance should have been invested for the purchase of the annuity to her.

"Instead of that, £164 was paid to Mr Douglas, and the remaining £300 was deposited (on 4th April 1829) in Mr Lethem's hands as a guarantee fund to meet certain arrestments raised by the husband's creditors, in case any claims under them should ever be rendered effectual. Fortunately no claim has arisen under these arrestments; and, therefore, the question is brought simply to this,—whether the wife can now demand this payment of the price of her own lands to meet in part her onerous and just claims, arising from a sale of her estate, to which her husband, during her coverture, got her accession?

"The Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that she is now entitled to trace and identify this fund,—seeing that none of the parties for whose use it was (improperly) pledged in 1829, can urge any claim upon it. She has now a good right, both in equity and law, to be placed in the same situation she would have been if a multiplepounding had been brought by Robertson relative to the fund in his hands in 1829. If the Lord Ordinary do not greatly mistake the case, the claim of Mrs Fell, for her own half of the price, or at least for £500 of it, could not then have been resisted.

"It is quite true, as pleaded by the opposing competitor, that Mrs Fell used no diligence to attach the fund, while the other claimant has fortified his claim by successive arrestments of it as belonging to Fell; but in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, no diligence on the part of Mrs Fell was necessary to attach the fund, as it was radically her own property; and whatever plea might have been set up by any creditor under a very specific pledge, to which her consent may have been obtained, she has that equitable lien on the fund, quoad ultra, which entitled her to claim it to the exclusion of all the other creditors of her husband.

"The Lord Ordinary has given no expenses yet incurred, because Mrs Fell would have been obliged to make a claim in this process, even if unopposed; but if the litigation goes on, both the past and future expenses will be in the hands of the Court."

Both parties reclaimed,—Mrs Fell for expenses, and Baird on the merits.

At advising, the Court did not call on Mrs Fell's counsel.

Lord Gillies.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. Fell bound himself, in selling Easterseat, to vest £500 of the price in the purchase of an annuity for his wife,—was this a binding obligation? I cannot conceive any obligation more strictly onerous.

Lord President.—I am of the same opinion. On looking at the whole productions, I think it impossible not to be satisfied that the fund in medio is clearly traced to be in right of the wife. Look at the letter where he describes it as Mrs Fell's money, and to the letter of Robertson of the same effect. Even after she recovers this sum, the lady will still be very unfortunate, as she only gets £300 instead of £600, the price of her pro indiviso half.

Lord Mackenzie and Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court adhered on the merits, but altered as to the expenses, and found Baird liable to Mrs Fell in the whole expenses of the competition.

Divorce—Adultery.

Vide ante, p. 27. The Court of this date resumed consideration of this cause, and disposed of it on the merits. Lord Medwyn and Lord Moncreiff concurred in opinion with the Lord Ordinary, that the adultery was proved; while the Lord Justice-Clerk considered that the evidence was not sufficient to establish guilt. The following interlocutor was pronounced:

"Find it proved that the defender committed adultery with the Rev. J. M. on the night between Tuesday the 7th and Wednesday the 8th of March 1837; and on the night between Tuesday the 1st and Wednesday the 2d of August 1837, and therefore decern and declare in the divorce, in terms of the conclusions of the libel."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 113.—JAMES M'CLELLAND (Allans' Trustee), Pursuer, v. ROBERT RODGER and COMPANY, Defenders.

Process—Jury Trial—Motion for New Trial—Held incompetent, when moving for a new trial, to found upon misdirection, or omission in point of law on the part of the Judge, no exception to the charge having been taken at the trial.

About the beginning of February 1839, the defenders made an advance of £3000 to James Allan and Son, who drew a bill on them for the amount, payable at four months' date. The bill of lading of the cargo of the "Hope," consisting of grain, was indorsed over and delivered to the defenders; but it was alleged that no real transfer of the cargo was thereby intended to be made. It was said to have been agreed between the parties that Allan and Son should pay discount on the bill to the bank, or person who discounted the bill; and besides, they were to pay the defenders a commission of four per cent. for making the advance, if the sale of the cargo of the "Hope" should be unprofitable. But if the cargo should be sold to profit, the defenders were to be entitled to one-half of the profits. On the arrival of the Hope at the Broomielaw in March 1839, James Allan took charge of the cargo. Part of it he sold at the ship's side, and the remainder he put in the store of Alexander Galloway in his own name. The cargo commenced being discharged on the 21st March 1839, and its delivery was completed on the 30th. On the evening of the 31st March, or early in the morning of the 1st April, Allan resolved to suspend payment; and about ten o'clock on the forenoon of the 1st April, and immediately before the despatch of circulars notifying his bankruptcy to his creditors, he addressed to Alexander Galloway a note in the following terms:—"Deliver to Messrs Rodger and Company all our English barley landed from the Hope." The storehouse-keeper, after receiving this letter, executed and delivered an acknowledgment of the receipt of 740 bolls of barley on account of Robert Rodger and Company, and subject to their order. This document was obtained by James Allan, who went to the store in order to obtain a transfer of the grain, and was handed by him to the defenders. A corresponding entry was made in the books of the storehouse-keeper, and an account was opened in the name of Rodger and Company. Thereafter the barley in store was sold by the defenders, and they drew the proceeds. Further, there were sums due on account of purchases from the cargo of the Hope, unpaid to Allan, amounting to about £544. 13. 5; and on the 2d and 3d of April, new invoices were rendered by him to the purchasers, bearing that he had sold the grain for behoof of the defenders. In consequence, they demanded and received payment from the parties, but two of them insisted upon an indemnity against being subjected to a second payment.

On the 8th April 1839, the estates of James Allan and Son, and James Allan as the sole partner of the firm, were sequestrated. The pursuer was appointed interim factor on the sequestrated estate, and on the 7th of May 1839, he was appointed trustee. His nomination was confirmed by the Court on 8th May 1839.

The present action was instituted for the purpose of challenging the transactions, and the deeds expressive thereof, whereby the grain in store, and the proceeds of what was sold and not recovered by Allan, were appropriated by the defenders.

Pleaded by the pursuer—1. The transactions whereby the defenders appropriated the grain in store, and the proceeds of so much as had been sold by Allan and Son, but unrecovered by them, are reducible, seeing that they were not truly the proprietors of the grain at the time, that the right of property in the cargo never was truly transferred, or intended to be transferred to them, and the right to the grain, and to the unrecovered proceeds of so much as was sold by the bankrupt passed to his creditors. 2. The transactions challenged, and deeds expressive thereof, are reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5. 3. The grain in question having been placed, with the knowledge and concurrence of the defenders, under the disposition and control of the bankrupt, after the alleged transfer in their favour, and the bankrupt having publicly and in every respect dealt with the cargo as his own property, it must be held to have passed to the creditors of the bankrupt, even upon the assumption, which is contrary to the fact, that a real transfer had originally taken place; and no acts of the bankrupt done after he had become hopelessly and notoriously bankrupt and insolvent, can defeat the rights of his creditors. 4. The whole transactions are reducible ex capite fraudis, seeing that the object and intention of the defenders and the bankrupt was, through the form of a pretended transfer, and the colourable title thereby given, to vindicate the goods intended to be transferred in the event of Allan and Son's bankruptcy, and to withdraw them from the lawful creditors of the bankrupt, while the pretended seller was to remain the true proprietor of these goods, and to sell and dispose of them at pleasure, subject only to a claim on the part of the defenders for a commission or a share of the profits. No act done in completion of such an illegal agreement can legally prevail to affect the rights of the general body of the creditors of the bankrupt. 5. Generally, the transactions complained of, and documents founded on by the defenders, are illegal, invalid, and reducible, and the petitory conclusions of the action are well founded.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. There is no room in the present case for a reduction under the Act 1696, inasmuch as the transference of the cargo in question, and any appropriation of the same, or of any part thereof, was not in satisfaction or security of any prior debt, but of a present advance or novum debitum. 2. There is equally little room for any reduction at common law, in respect that no fraud upon the creditors of James Allan and Son took place, but the transactions complained of were fair bona fide transactions, which the parties were entitled to engage in, carry through and complete, according to the true terms of the agreement between them. 3. Generally, there is no valid ground for any of the conclusions of the summons, reductive, declaratory or petitory.

The following issues were adjusted and sent to trial:

"It being admitted that on the 8th day of April 1839, the estate of James Allan and Son, grain-merchants in Glasgow, of which James Allan was the sole partner, was sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statute, and that the pursuer is trustee on the said estate:—

"1. Whether, on or about the 1st day of April 1839, the said James Allan and Son were insolvent, and wrongfully and fraudulently granted the order, No. 20 of process, to transfer to the defenders about 700 bolls of barley, then in the warehouse or granary or granaries of one Alexander Galloway, in Alston Street, Glasgow; or wrongfully and fraudulently transferred the said grain, or caused the same to be transferred to the defenders? and whether the defenders are indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer, as trustee aforesaid, in the sum of £1200, or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said barley, fraudulently transferred as aforesaid?

"2. Whether, on or about the said 1st day of April 1839, at least within sixty days prior to the said 8th day of April 1839, the said James Allan and Son granted the said order, or caused the said transfer to be made as aforesaid, in payment or security of a prior debt due by them to the defenders, in preference to other creditors, in violation of the enactment of the Statute 1696, cap. 5? and whether the defenders are indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer, as trustee aforesaid, in the sum of £1200, or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said barley?

"3. Whether, on or about the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th days of April 1839, or any of them, the said James Allan and Son wrongfully and fraudulently granted the orders, Nos. 21, 22, 23, and 24 of process, and one to Thomas Hill, late maltster in Glasgow, or any of them, ordering the persons therein named, or any of them, to pay to the defenders the price of certain quantities of grain imported in a vessel called the Hope; or wrongfully and fraudulently caused the said payments to be made? and whether the defenders are indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer, as trustee aforesaid, in the sum of £600, or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the amount of the sum or sums in the orders last aforesaid, fraudulently transferred as aforesaid?

"4. Whether, on or about the said 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th days of April 1839, or any of them, at least within sixty days prior to the said 8th day of April 1839, the said James Allan and Son granted all or any of the orders last aforesaid, or caused payment of the same to be made in payment or security of a prior debt due by them to the defenders, in preference to other creditors, in violation of the Statute 1696, cap. 5? and whether the defenders are indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer, as trustee aforesaid, in the said sum of £600, or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the amount of the sum or sums in the orders last aforesaid?"

The jury returned the following verdict:

"At Glasgow, the first day of May 1841 years, before the Honourable Lord Ivory, compared the said pursuer and the said defenders by their respective counsel and agents, and a jury having been empanelled and sworn to try the said issues between the said parties, say, upon their oath, that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuer £1132. 16s., being the sum in the first and second issues, and £544. 13. 5., being the sum in the third and fourth issues, with interest on both sums from 1st September 1839."

The defenders moved for a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted. The verdict was challenged on three grounds: 1. That it was against law; 2. against evidence; and 3. that the Judge did not, in his direction to the jury, state sufficiently and explicitly the effect of the bill of lading. It being objected in limine, that no exception to the charge of the Judge had been taken at the trial, it was

Argued, That it was not disputed that the money was advanced, and that the bill of lading was indorsed in security. This, in law, gave right to the defenders to follow and take possession of the grain. A view of the legal character of the bill of lading was necessary to a right inference from the facts; but this was omitted by the Judge. By the Act 55 Geo. III. c. 42, § 6 and 7, it is competent to move for a new trial on the express ground of misdirection; and a bill of exceptions is not necessary; neither is there any authority in the cases for requiring a note to be taken at the trial, so as to form the foundation of a bill of exceptions. This may be a convenient rule, and if it be not observed, it may be difficult to get evidence of the charge; but the presumption is, that the Judge lays down good law, and if the Court can be satisfied that the verdict is contrary to it, the justice of the case requires a new trial: 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 16 and 17. Anderson, 2 Mur. p. 261. Fisher, 2 Mur. p. 595. Forbes, 3 Mur. p. 51. Scott, 3 Mur. p. 529. Rogers, 4 Mur. p. 31. Adam on Jury Trial, pp. 331, 185, 341, 320. Hosey, 4 Mur. p. 424.

Answered—If there be no remonstrance against the charge of the Judge at the time, acquiescence is to be implied: Allardice, 4 Mur. p. 539. An objection to a verdict as against law, must be not against law generally, but against the law fixed and laid down by the Judge at the trial. Parties ought then to object to the law laid down, and get a note of it taken by the Judge, so that there may be a record by which all must be bound. A Judge is not bound to have, or to preserve notes of his charge. The more recent cases are all in support of the necessity of an exception being taken at the trial: Robertson, 29th June 1838, F. C.; M. and R. App. Cases, 3d June 1839. Campbell, 1st July 1834, F. C. Scott and Gifford, 2d March 1832, F. C.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The issues are said to depend upon matters of fact and law, and a right inference could not be drawn from the facts without the law being laid down. In the full knowledge of the law by the defenders' counsel, the charge of the Judge was given, and no observation was made upon it. With the aid of that charge a verdict was returned for the pursuer, and I am clearly of opinion that the defenders are not now entitled to raise any question upon law which was not objected to at the trial. Jury trial in Scotland rests upon Statute or decisions. We are not bound to adopt any arbitrary rules from England; and we have no benefit from their practical rules. In England, the Courts have received the report of the Judge as to what was stated at the trial and ex intervallo. This is hazardous. One word determined the Cromarty cause, in which Lord Cottenham set aside Lord Cockburn's charge. By Statute we have right to a motion for a new trial, but we have no provision that we shall not make the law stated at the trial matter of record. Being so left at liberty, are we not entitled to make this matter of certainty and precision? As to misdirection, it is said that it is not provided that the objection on that ground must be stated at the trial; but the same clause admits of a motion for a new trial on the improper admission of evidence; and it would be utterly extravagant to hold that this could be taken advantage of, without the objection being taken at the trial. In principle, both cases are alike. There are several principles applicable to jury trial, opposed to the course proposed: 1st, Trial consists of two parts; that which prepares for the verdict, and the verdict itself. Now, there is nothing final as to the Judge's law; and if objected to, he may see cause to alter, omit or supply. But although a verdict may be reviewed, that which is prior to the verdict becomes closed and final by the verdict. What is complained of to the Court must have been complained of to the Judge: Hamilton, Robertson and Campbell. In the 2d place, I am not aware that a Judge can be called on to write out, ex intervallo, the law which he charged, and which was not objected to. He may now accompany his notes with remarks—a thing of very doubtful expediency; but he cannot be called on to furnish a certificate of what law he laid down. In such a case there would always be some misunderstanding. The Judge cannot recollect all his expressions; and it is in human nature, that, in framing his report, he should be in favour of correct expressions and correct law rather than the contrary. I cannot therefore understand how a party can object to misdirection when he has no record of it, and can obtain none. The Judge may say, either he does not recollect, or declines ex intervallo, or sends what he understands to be what he said. Is this fitting in judicial proceedings? Are the parties to be satisfied when the Judge varies from their own notes; or is the Court to be satisfied? Why should parties bring things to such a pass when they could so easily remedy it by objecting at the trial? It were to place the Judge in a very cruel situation. In the 3d place, whatever charge a Judge gives is to aid the jury, and to enable them to understand facts, or to draw inferences. For this end the law must be correctly stated, and clearly explained; and it is only of importance as addressed to them by the Judge; for it is of no consequence what is stated as law by the counsel. The Judge does not sit to pronounce judgment himself, but to aid the jury; they, therefore, are most materially interested in the correctness of the Judge; and if there be any omission on his part, it is peculiarly incumbent upon the parties to remind him of it. Hence, any system of reviewing a charge, when the attention of the Judge has not been called to its incorrectness before the jury retire, is a most imperfect procedure, and at variance with the principles of jury trial. In the 4th place, from the necessity of the case, a great deal of what passes at a jury trial is matter of conventional arrangement and consent between the counsel and the Judge, both as to the admission of evidence, and as to the law required to be laid down. No record whatever of this is kept till some objection be taken and put on record. Whatever, therefore, is not objected to, I hold to be acquiesced in. As grounds for a new trial, I see no difference between a misdirection not objected to, and the improper admission of evidence not objected to; much less between law not charged, but said to have been omitted. The early cases may be explained; and the conclusion of the matter is stated by Adam, pp. 172, 319 and 339. It being admitted that the verdict is in accordance with the charge of the Judge, this excludes any argument on law not moving for a new trial.

Lord Medwyn.—It being assumed that the law was not fully enough laid down at the trial, can the defenders now object to the verdict on this ground? Adam says, that when there is a misdirection by the Judge, the remedy in England is by moving for a new trial. Here it is very generally done by a bill of exceptions, which may be presented on a Judge refusing to lay down the law. Is the practice in England, then, excluded here by Statute or decisions? The recent cases seem to determine, that where a verdict is to be disturbed on the ground of misdirection, it should be by a bill of exceptions. This secures accuracy,—is fair both to the Judge and the opposite party; and if the cases fix it, I shall be happy to see the practice made conformable.

Lord Moncreiff.—I concur; but in early years there was a strong impression that it was competent to move for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, although no exception was taken, or note required to be taken at the trial, and that this was not matter of favour. But, in examining the later cases for a considerable period, it seems settled, that unless the party raise the objection to the law of the Judge at the trial, it is incompetent to do so in a motion for a new trial. The case of Campbell is not exactly in point; but it is evident that it was there held, that unless the question of law be raised at the trial by appeal to the Judge, either objecting to the law stated or omitted, it is incompetent to get at it in Court. Robertson also is to the same effect; and looking to these cases, I concur with your Lordships. I must, however, interpose one qualification,—that when required to say whether a verdict be contrary to evidence, we must apply our minds to the law applicable to the facts, and keep it in view. Looking to the issues here, while considering whether the verdict be contrary to evidence, we must have in our minds what is insolvency, and what constitutes fraudulent, and must regard also what is put in issue, and what in defence. I cannot raise law in relation to misdirection or omission; but I do not say I cannot regard any law.

Subsequently the pursuer proceeded to show cause why a new trial should not be granted—and argued, that although the nature and effect of bills of lading, of insolvency, and the Act 1696, must be considered generally, yet the fact that the law on those heads had been omitted to be laid down at the trial, was now, as a substantive exception to the verdict, entirely out of the question. The real point put to the jury was, whether it was the intention of the parties, as disclosed by the circumstances attending the transactions, that the bill of lading should transfer the property of the cargo? The jury held there was no such intention; and if so, that then the grain stood vested in Allan at his bankruptcy, and belongs to his trustee.

Replied.—That having advanced money, and received the bill of lading in security, that transferred the right to the cargo, and was civil possession: Bell, I. 198, 199. Then, if the defenders had the right, did they waive it? If the jury proceeded on this ground, the verdict was contrary to evidence.

The Court refused the motion, and discharged the rule.

NO. 114.—CARFRAE'S TRUSTEES, Raisers, v. JOHN CARFRAE, Claimant, and HARRIET and JANE CARFRAE, Competing Claimants.

Trust-Settlement—Heritable and Moveable—Provisions to Children.—A party by his trust-settlement directed his trustees, "if it shall not have been done previously, to lend out on good heritable security the sum of £10,000, as soon after my death as possible, for securing payment of the yearly interest and produce to my widow;" 2d, "As soon as possible after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, if not previously done, to lend out the sum of £9000 for the security of provisions to my daughters." Lastly, "As soon after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife as may be convenient, to convey and make over, in equal portions, to my sons A and B, the free residue of my estate, heritable and moveable." The wife survived the trustor. He himself left heritable securities to the amount of £7400; and the trustees, over and above, took heritable securities to themselves, amounting to £10,184. After the death of the widow, but before the division of the residue, A, the son, died intestate. In a competition between his heir and executors for the half of the residue—Held, 1. That the heritable securities left by the trustor himself were to be imputed pro tanto in making up the investment of £10,000 for the widow: 2. That after her death the said £10,000 was to be kept up to the amount of £9000, for the security of the provisions to the daughters: 3. That the remaining £1000, together with the whole other residue of the testator, was moveable, and that the half destined to the residuary legatee deceased, descended to his executors.

The late John Carfrae, coachmaker in Edinburgh, grandfather of the claimants, died in 1831, leaving a trust-deed of settlement, dated 8th May 1830. By this deed he conveyed certain heritable subjects and bonds, specially described, and generally all his property, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at his death, to the raisers of the present process.

The fourth purpose of the trust contains the following direction:

"I do hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee, to pay to my said wife, during all the years of her life, in case she shall survive me, the yearly interest and produce of the sum of £10,000, and that half-yearly, at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first payment thereof at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen after my decease; and for securing the said yearly payment to my said wife, I hereby direct my said trustees or trustee, as soon after my death as possible, if it shall not have been done previously, to lend out, on good heritable security, the sum of £10,000 Sterling, and to make regular payment of the interest thereof to my said wife during her life, at the said two terms, declaring that the half-yearly payments that may be made to her, previous to the money being so lent, shall be at the current rate of interest paid at the time for money lent on good heritable security."

The eighth purpose of the trust is thus expressed:

"I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee at my death, if my said wife predeceases me, or at her death if she survives me, to set apart the sum of £3000 Sterling for each of my said three daughters, Jean, Margaret, and Isabella, and that over and above the sum of £1000 Sterling, provided to each of them as aforesaid, making together the sum of £4000 Sterling to each; but it is declared that my said daughters shall in no event be entitled to demand payment from my said trustees of the principal sum of the said £3000, to be set aside for each of them, nor to dispose thereof in any way except to the extent after mentioned; And I direct my said trustees or trustee, for the security of the said provision of £3000 to each of my daughters, to lend out as soon as possible after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, if not previously done, the foresaid three sums of £3000 each, amounting together to £9000, upon good heritable security, and to take the title thereto to themselves, as trustees aforesaid, and to pay, from and after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, the interest and produce arising from the said three sums of £3000 each to my said three daughters during their lives,—each of them receiving the interest corresponding to the sum of £3000, and no more."

The last purpose of the trust provides for the disposal of the residue in these terms:

"I do hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee, as soon after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife as may be convenient, consistently with the due execution of the other purposes of the trust, to convey and make over in equal portions, share and share alike, to my said two sons Thomas and William, the free residue and remainder of my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable," &c.

To accomplish the purposes of the trust, powers are conferred on the trustees to pursue for and receive "the principal sums, interests, and annual profits of the debts, heritable and moveable, particularly and generally before conveyed, to take new security therefor, grant discharges thereof, and renounce or dispose the securities held therefor. They are also empowered, if it shall be necessary for enabling them to pay my debts and the provisions and legacies herein after mentioned, to sell and dispose of such part of the said trust-estate and effects as they shall consider proper."

The testator was survived by his widow and his two sons and three daughters; and the condition in which his funds stood at the time of his death was, that independently of the special heritable subjects, to which the present question does not relate, there were £7400 lent on heritable security, while the remainder of his funds, amounting to £15,842, were moveable.

Subsequent to the testator's death the trustees lent upon heritable security the sum of £12,484. 18. 3.; while of the £7400 standing heritably secured when the testator died, there was paid up only £1600,—leaving £5800 of the testator's own investments still heritably secured, and making the whole amount held by the trustees upon heritable security £18,284. 18s. 3d. In this situation of the trust the testator's widow died in January 1838, and in November 1839, Thomas Carfrae also died, leaving an only son and two daughters. Thomas not having left any will, his estate falls to be divided according to the law of intestate succession; and the present process was raised by the trustees of John Carfrae, in part for the purpose of having it determined whether Thomas's share of the residue of the trust-estate be heritable or moveable, or to what extent it is heritable or moveable. The claimants are the tutor-at-law of the son of Thomas, who is a pupil, and the two daughters, claimants competing with him.

The daughters pleaded—That no more than £10,000, at the most, of the funds of the testator, can be viewed as having been directed by him to be heritably invested, if it shall not have been done previously; but that, as there stood already £7400 heritably secured at the time of his death, the only portion of the moveable or personal funds left by the testator, which it was incumbent upon the trustees to invest heritably for any purpose, was £2600, the sum requisite to make up the £10,000. There was, indeed, an express direction that £9000 should be heritably secured to meet the provisions of the testator's three daughters; but this was to be done only after the death of the widow, and if not previously done; and thus the investment of £10,000 to secure the widow's liferent interest necessarily exhausted the testator's instructions also as to his daughters' provisions, and satisfied at once the fourth and eighth purposes of the trust. That as, upon the death of the widow, the heritable investment made for her security was to the extent of £9000; specially destined to be kept up for the daughters' provisions, and as the remaining sum of £1000 was not specially destined in an heritable shape to the residuary legatees, but was left by the testator to fall back into the general estate, and to be dealt with as residue,—there is no ground for holding that the jus crediti of the residuary legatees was even to that extent made heritable destinatione testatoris. As the interest of Thomas Carfrae in the residue was to the extent of one-half, the patrimonial interest depending on the issue of this the only real question between the competing parties, is consequently to the extent of £500. Now, although this sum had been heritably invested, in conformity with the appointment of the testator, that appointment had reference to a temporary purpose, being the mere securing of the widow's liferent interest. Had the direction of the deed been that there was to be an heritable investment taken by the trustees for behoof of the widow in liferent, and of the sons, Thomas and William, in fee,—then, indeed, the subject-matter to which the jus crediti in Thomas and William attached, would have been so far heritable destinatione testatoris. But there is no such declaration in this deed. Had the widow predeceased the testator, no temporary investment of the personal funds would have been requisite. The sons would instantly have had right to the whole estate of their father, subject to the special provisions to the daughters and sister. There could have been no question, then, that their jus crediti to demand the residue from the trustees was of a moveable nature. In addition to the £7400, such a sum must have been taken from the personal estate, and invested on heritable security, as was requisite to secure the £9000 to the daughters. But the whole remaining estate being personal at the testator's death, the right to it in his sons instantly vested, and was a moveable right, and descendible to their executors.

Pleaded for the tutor-at-law—That to the extent of the heritable bonds left by the truster, £7400, which were not specifically invested for his wife's annuity and his daughters' provisions, and no part of which was necessary to pay the debts, legacies and provisions, the residue must be considered heritable, and Thomas's share of it must descend to his son and heir. It is not to be presumed that money provisions—as those in question, though directed to be heritably secured by the trustees, unquestionably are—were intended to be defrayed out of the heritable rather than out of the moveable funds of the truster. On the contrary, unless it clearly appear to have been the intention of the truster that the heritage should be applied to this purpose, in preference to the moveable estate, it must be presumed to have been intended that those money provisions should be defrayed out of the moveable estate; but these heritable bonds were not invested for this specific purpose; nor does the trust-deed afford the least indication that the truster intended them to be held as invested for this purpose. It is impossible, therefore, to hold, that by the expression, "if it shall not have been done previously," the truster intended to alter the nature of his succession, to make that moveable which he left heritable, and to make that a burden on his heritage which, sua natura, was a burden on his moveable estate. Supposing, however, that the truster could be held to have intended this sum of £7400 to constitute part of the £10,000 directed to be invested on heritable security for his wife's annuity, of this only £9000, required for the provisions to the daughters, is specifically disposed of by the deed of settlement. The remaining £1000, freed on the widow's death from her annuity, constitutes part of the residue, and this unquestionably is heritable. It was made so by the truster's own act; and although his object was different, he must be held to have contemplated and intended all the legal results of a change from moveable to heritable; one of which is a descent to the heir instead of the executor. It has been conclusively settled by a long series of decisions, that the object of a party in investing money on heritable security, cannot affect the consequences as to succession. It is said, however, that in the present case, the object intended was temporary,—that the investment can only be held to have been intended to last during the widow's life; and that the money was then to be uplifted and paid in cash to the residuary disponees. Now, it is quite true that the purpose was temporary, but there is no ground for maintaining that the truster contemplated that the extra sum relieved from the temporary burden of the widow's liferent was to be realised before division. On the contrary, it falls under the general direction as to making over and conveying the residue to the two brothers. To the extent, therefore, of £1000 at least, the residue of the truster's estate must be deemed heritable; but it is conceived that it must be so held even to the full extent of £7400, being the amount of heritable bonds left by the testator at his death.

A record having been made up and cases prepared, the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Court, and accompanied his interlocutor with the following note:

"The Lord Ordinary has reported this case, because the parties are, on both sides, anxious to have the family question that has here arisen authoritatively settled by a judgment of the Court.

"The view which the Lord Ordinary himself would be disposed to take of the case is as follows:—

"1. Apart from the difficulty occasioned by the directions to lend out so much of the trust-funds for securing the widow's and daughters' provisions, there could have been no dispute, as regards the construction and operation of the clause which regulates the disposal of the residuary interest arising under the trust-deed. The trustees would, in this case, have possessed no authority to deal with the trust-estate, so as, in any respect, to alter its character, such as the truster had left it, by changing it either from moveable to heritable, or the reverse.

"2. It seems hardly less clear, that, in dealing with the provisions to the widow and daughters, it was intended, not that the trustees should lend out two several sums of £10,000 and £9000, but only that these sums should be lent out successively, the one after the other. That is to say, 1st, £10,000 was to be lent out 'as soon as after my (the truster's death) as possible,' for securing payment of 'the yearly interest, and produce' to the widow. 2d, 'As soon as possible after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife,' £9000 was to be lent out ('if not previously done') for the security of the provisions to the daughters. But,

"3. The original investment for the widow having, by this time, answered its primary purpose, so far as regards her security, became, on her decease, available also for this latter or secondary purpose, viz., of an investment for security to the daughters. The different terms at which the investments are directed to be made, the one on the truster's own decease, the other not till the decease of the longest liver of him and his wife, point out this as the natural construction. The direction to lend out the second sum, 'if not previously done,' seems to have had in view what would or would not be necessary, according to the contingency of the wife's surviving or predeceasing the truster. If she predeceased, then, her provision lapsing, there would be no room for the primary investment in her behalf; in which case a lending out of £9000 would, as not having been 'previously done,' be required for security of the daughters. If, on the contrary, she survived (which was the actual case), then £10,000 having been already lent out, a further lending of £9000 would become unnecessary upon her decease; the burden upon the first investment ceasing by that event, and the trustees being entitled to lend farther, only 'if not previously done.'

"4. But here the question arises, Whether, the truster himself having left certain heritable securities to the amount of £7400, this £7400 is or is not to be imputed pro tanto of the fund which the trustees are directed to hold invested for behoof successively of the widow and daughters? The Lord Ordinary inclines to think that it must be so imputed. For, 1. In directing the primary investment of £10,000 to secure the widow, the trustees are appointed, in words of precisely similar import to those which have just been commented on with reference to the secondary investment for security to the daughters, to lend out this sum of £10,000, 'if it shall not have been done previously'; and thus the same principle of construction, which excluded the necessity of a second lending out of £9000 for the daughters, £10,000 having already been lent out for the widow, would seem equally to exclude the necessity of the trustees lending out £10,000 for the widow, £7400 having already been lent out by the truster, so as to be available pro tanto. 2. The trust-deed conferring no further power to lend than is contained in the clauses for securing the widow's and daughters' provisions, the declaration, in another portion of the deed, that they shall not be liable 'for the solvency of any person to whom they may lend out sums of money for answering the purposes of this trust,' would seem, more especially when combined with the allusion to the possibility of sums being already lent out, to infer an implied limitation of their powers to such a lending only as should in strictness be necessary for explicating these trust-purposes. 3. Nor does there seem much force in the argument, that the previous lendings out must be construed as necessarily referring to that specific form of investment alone, which would immediately connect the particular security with the individual whose interests were to be secured; because, in no view does the truster appear to have intended that there should be any such specific connection between the security and its object,—the investments being all to be made, not in name of the party to be secured, but in name of the trustees themselves; and thus the title of the trustees, when completed under the securities created by the truster, standing substantially in pari causa with their title to any after securities which might be created by themselves, and taken, like the others, exclusively in their own names.

"5. There remains, however, another and more difficult question behind. For, even should it be held that the £7400, left heritably secured by the truster, falls to be imputed pro tanto in making up the investment of £10,000 for securing the widow, and so would also be absorbed in the secondary application of that investment for security to the daughters, there is still a difference of £1000 between the investment necessary for the widow, and that required for the daughters, which, in any view, must be dealt with as forming part of a fund which the truster expressly directs to be laid out, and to certain effects held in the shape of heritable security. Now, how far this £1000 is to be regarded as heritable or moveable, is a question on which the Lord Ordinary has not been able to form any very decided opinion, nor has he found himself much aided by a consideration of Dick v. Gillies, 4th July 1828, to which both parties refer with apparently equal confidence, as supporting their respective arguments.

"On the one hand, if, under the direction to invest upon real security, the matter is to be dealt with in the hands of the trustees, precisely as if the truster himself had made the investment, and thus left his estate so far in the shape of actual heritage, this unappropriated balance of £1000, as not having been reconverted into moveables prior to the death of Thomas Carfrae, the father of the parties here competing, and there being in fact no necessity for such reconversion from the state of the trust-funds otherwise, would, it is thought, fall to be dealt with in his succession, as still partaking of the character of heritage. On the other hand, if regard be had to the very specific and peculiarly limited purpose of the direction to invest, viz., in the widow's case, 'for securing the said yearly payment to my said wife' during her life, i. e., the yearly interest and produce of the sum of £10,000; and in that of the daughters 'for the security of the said provision of £3000 to each.' And further, if it be kept in view, that, unless with the burden, and for the purpose of securing these parties, the whole estate of the deceased vested in the residuary legatees a morte testatoris, at which period, with the exception of the £7400 of heritable debt (itself exhausted by the after provisions), the entire estate (so far as here in discussion) was left in a moveable shape : And finally, if it be considered, that not only for the purpose of investing of new, for behoof of the daughters, £9000 out of the £10,000, which had become disengaged by the widow's death, but still more, for the purpose of actually dividing the remaining £1000 between the residuary legatees, it might have been requisite to uplift and turn into money the original investment, there is much to be said in favour of holding it to have been the intent of the truster himself that this portion of the residue should, so far as the residuary legatees were concerned, be regarded and dealt with as moveables.

"The latter view seems to be in substantial accordance with that of the minority of the Court in Dick v. Gillies, and is perhaps the result at which the Lord Ordinary would, on the whole, have arrived, but for the apparently conflicting opinion of the majority in that case. How far, as here contended for by one of the parties, there be not room to doubt whether some at least of the Judges composing this majority were not influenced by a certain degree of misapprehension as to the fund, which was in that case set apart for securing the mother's annuity, being identical with the separate provision which was, from a distinct source, settled in fee upon her issue, is a question entitled to the consideration of the Court, but upon which the Lord Ordinary does not feel himself entitled to enter."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—The testator, by his trust-deed, directs his trustees to pay to his widow the yearly interest of £10,000, and on her death to lay out £3000 for each of his three daughters, upon heritable security, if not previously done. The testator left £7400 heritably secured at his death; his wife survived; and the last purpose of the trust is, as soon after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife as convenient, the trustees shall make over the free residue of the estate equally to two sons. One of the sons died before this last purpose was executed, and a competition now arises between his heir and executors as to the heritable or moveable nature of the residue. The wife survived, and at her death the £10,000, secured for her annuity, was kept up to the amount of £9000 for the daughters' provisions. Thus £1000 became disengaged, and I am clearly of opinion that it is moveable. The sons, on the death of the widow, took it between them as residuary legatees. This is different from the case of Dick, where the estate was taken up ab intestato, and was heritable. But here the estate is not taken up ab intestato, but by residuary legatees, and as a personal fund.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am clearly of the same opinion. Nothing can be clearer than that the £7400, heritably secured by the truster himself, was meant to be imputed as part of the investment for his widow's annuity, and the provisions to his daughters. The only point is as to the £1000. The trustees invested heritably £10,000, but the investment was temporary and contingent. If the widow had not survived, things would have remained as they were at the truster's death. The £7400 would have been taken in part of the investment for the provisions to the daughters, and all the rest of the testator's estate would have been moveable. Suppose the trustees had kept the £1000 heritably invested, when they came to divide the residue, they might not have split the bond, but given it wholly to one of the sons as part of his share. One of the sons died early, and before a division; but the residue was moveable. As to Dick, it is impossible to assimilate the two cases.

The Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court preferred the claim of the daughters. No expenses were asked.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

NO. 115.—DAVID KIRKLAND, Pursuer and Advocate, v. ADAM CREICHTON and OTHERS (Kirkland's Trustees), Defendants and Respondents.

Trustees—Bona Fides—Personal Liability—Circumstances in which gratuitous trustees were found not to be personally liable for the expense of a process of count and reckoning instituted against them, and in which they were ultimately unsuccessful.

James and David Kirkland carried on business together as tanners, from 1807 to 1814, when the contract expired, and the books, which were kept by James, were marked as correct. Without any new agreement, the copartnership continued until it was dissolved by the death of James in 1826. The defenders, his trustees, having discovered a bill for £200 due to him by David, dated March 1803, demanded payment; and in September 1831, instituted an action against him for recovering its contents. David thereupon brought a counter action of count and reckoning against the trustees, claiming a balance of £900 as due to him on the copartnership concerns. In the Inferior Court, there were no fewer than four reports by accountants given into process successively. The first brought out a balance in favour of the trustees, amounting to £400. This balance diminished in each of the two following reports; and in the fourth, the balance turned in favour of David, to the amount of £91. Decree was pronounced in the Inferior Court in terms of the last report; but David, dissatisfied with the judgment, advocated the cause to the Court of Session. On a remit by the Lord Ordinary to an accountant, he enlarged the balance in favour of David to about £500; and this being objected to by the trustees, he, by a supplementary report, still further enlarged the balance against them to the sum of £612. 14s. The bill, with twenty years' interest upon it, was found to be due by David, but the processes were not conjoined, and the accounts of the copartnership had never been adjusted, further than by the doqueting in 1814. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"7th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard procurators, Recals the interlocutors of the Sheriff complained of, and decerns against the representatives, the children and legatees of James Kirkland, for the sum of £612. 14s. Sterling, with interest thereof from the 11th day of November 1839 until paid: Decerns also against the respondents, the trustees of the said James Kirkland, for the said sum of £612. 14s., with the interest thereon from the said 11th of November 1839 until paid: Finds the respondents, as trustees, and personally, liable in expenses of process incurred both in the Inferior Court and in this Court: Allows an account to be lodged, and remits to the auditor to tax and report."

Kirkland's trustees reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—There can be no doubt that trustees may so misconduct themselves as to subject themselves personally to the expenses of a litigation which they may have carried on; and there is no occasion to quote the cases of Morrison and Raeburn. But if they be gratuitous trustees, and carry on an action for the benefit of the estate, they are not to be made personally liable for the expenses, although unsuccessful. There is nothing here unreasonable in their conduct. The copartnership was dissolved in 1826, and no claim was made by the pursuer till 1831. It is said that the books were in possession of the trustees; but they were in the hands of the pursuer in 1829, and at any time before that, he might have enforced his right of access to them. The books must have been incorrect, judging from the different results brought out in the accountants' reports; and no doubt they were kept by James; but his copartner was as much bound as he to see that they were correct. An action was brought upon the bill, and the claim is so clear that it cannot be disputed. The trustees, therefore, had £200, with interest upon it for twenty years, to meet any expense in the count and reckoning; and were they bound to acquiescence in a claim for a sum amounting to £900. There were four reports in the Inferior Court. In three of them the balance was in favour of the trustees, and in the fourth, the balance turns in favour of David to the amount of £91. Still, deducting this from the sum due on the bill, the trustees had sufficient funds to carry on the action. David very properly advocated, as the result shows; but were the trustees entitled to stand by? The first report here was more unfavourable for them, and they stated objections to it, which were repelled. The second or supplementary report which they procured, is the only instance of their litigiousness; but, by the second, the pursuer is bettered to the amount of £100. To subject trustees personally in expenses of process, there must be mala fides established against them; and I see no reason for imputing it here.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion, and see no ground for subjecting these trustees personally in the expenses of process. The pursuer speaks of the time since James Kirkland died, and the means he had of calling the trustees to account; but why did not David call James to account during his life? Non constat that he could not have explained the deficiency; and the presumption is that David knew this. The trustees lost no time in advertising for claims against the estate. This showed their bona fides; and from no claim being then made by David, they had reason to believe that none such existed. It is only in 1831, when they claim upon the bill, that he then says he has a large claim on the copartner, and which, moreover, he said terminated in 1814. The trustees had funds in their hands: they could know nothing of the accounts personally: they were bound to claim the bill, and David meets it by this action of count and reckoning. An impartial accountant gives in three reports, and in all of them the balance is in their favour. What could trustees do? Could they give it up after the decree of the Sheriff? Had they done so, they would have been personally liable to James's representatives. It would be a rule of extreme hardship, that trustees should be personally liable for all the expenses in clearing up accounts between those partners.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of the same opinion. It is an important principle, that trustees, in entering upon litigation, ought to be sure they have funds to meet the expenses of the opposite parties; but this rule is not trenching upon by the opinions of your Lordships. Every case must depend upon its own circumstances. The interlocutor decrees for the principal sum against the estate; and the trustees, acting gratuitously, are found liable personally for the expenses, without finding those beneficially interested—the children and legatees—personally liable first. They may still be liable; but the interlocutor subjects the trustees first, who have no interest in the estate. Clynne's trustees were held liable personally, but on the ground that two of them were largely interested, and that the litigation was obstinately and pertinaciously carried on. The pursuer says in his count and reckoning, that the partnership terminated in 1814, and he claimed his balance on the ground that it had so terminated, when he knew it went on to 1826. Of all cases, this was the one in which the trustees were entitled to say that the matter ought to be cleared up, and yet so complicated did it turn out, that it required six different reports to bring the accounts to such a state as that the rights of the parties could be determined.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of, in so far as it finds the respondents personally liable in the expenses of process: Find no expenses due upon the discussion raised by the reclaiming note: of new find expenses due from the trust-estate, and allow an account," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 116.—BATHIA PETER, Pursuer and Respondent, v. WILLIAM RENNIE'S REPRESENTATIVES, Defenders and Advocators.

Master and Servant—Wages.—Where services are rendered, the presumption of law, in the absence of circumstances sufficient to exclude it, is, that wages are due.

Bathia Peter brought an action before the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire, in which, on the narrative that, in the end of the year 1820, the late William Rennie, tailor in Sandyhillock of Monymusk, had applied to her to enter his service and take charge of his house; that she had accordingly done so from 1821 till his death in 1836; that she had made no specific agreement as to the amount of wages, and that, in fact, none had been paid her,—she concluded against his representatives for payment of the sum of £128, being at the rate of £8 for each year of her service; or, alternatively, for the sum of £30, Rennie's arm-chair and littlest cow, alleged to have been bequeathed by him to herself and her son. In defence, Rennie's representatives maintained, that the proper presumption, in the circumstances, was, that the board and maintenance which the pursuer and her son received in Rennie's house, were understood by the parties to be an adequate remuneration for her services; that, in point of fact, she had never properly acted as Rennie's servant, having been taken into his house, along with her child, in charity, and been allowed to go out to Monymusk and the neighbourhood to earn money for herself, by washing and other work. She had in this way acquired a considerable sum of money. The defenders had handed over to her a bank check in her name for £26, found among Rennie's papers, and also paid her other sums of lent money,—the whole amounting to no less than £56. As to the bequest said to have been left her, it appeared that some paper of a testamentary nature had been impetrated from Rennie the night before his death, but the defenders maintained that it was not of a description to enable any one to claim a legacy under it.

A proof was led, from which it appeared that Rennie, who was a man of some substance, had a croft, and kept cows. A sister lived with him, who for some time was able to undertake the chief management of his house, but she latterly became very frail, and the management, which for some time had devolved chiefly on the pursuer, devolved on her entirely on the sister's death. The Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor assolviendi,—issuing the following note:

"The Sheriff-substitute is aware that in certain cases it has been decided that wages are due without any special agreement to that effect, but he does not think this one of those cases. Here the pursuer, and for some time her child, lived with the late William Rennie, and, as she says, without having been promised or paid any wages; but she may have expected the old man to have left her a legacy, or other remuneration for her service; and it appears that, in an improbable writ, a legacy is actually left, and forms the second conclusion of the libel. The expectation, then, may be assumed as the cause of the pursuer's entering into, and remaining in, Rennie's house; and, if her expectation be not realised, it is held she cannot now claim wages from Rennie's representatives. In regard to the legacy, the pursuer departs from her claim to it, under the writing referred to, and restricts it to £100 Scots; but the Sheriff-substitute is not aware of any authority for such restriction, and it is opposed to the narrative of the libel."

On appeal to the Sheriff this interlocutor was recalled, and an interlocutor pronounced finding the defenders liable to the pursuer "in the sum of £24 Sterling, with interest as libelled, being wages for the last three years during which the pursuer lived with the late William Rennie, and acted as his servant."

Rennie's representatives advocated, and pleaded—1. The last interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute, reversing that of his Substitute, and awarding wages to the pursuer, is erroneous, and ought to be recalled, in respect the pursuer has failed to establish that she entered, or continued in the house of the deceased William Rennie, under a contract of service for hire. 2. Because the facts proved or admitted by the pursuer are inconsistent with, and negative of her claim for wages, and more particularly, the facts that she and her child were entertained by the deceased at bed and board, and that she commenced and continued, during all the seventeen years libelled, her residence in the deceased's house, without stipulating for, demanding, or receiving wages. 3. Separatim, Not only is the rate of wages allowed extravagant and unreasonable, but any services rendered by the pursuer to the deceased were amply compensated by his maintenance of herself and her child, and from her present claims not having been advanced until after the deceased's death, the defenders, his representatives, ought to be assoziied with expenses.

Bathia Peter pleaded—1. The evidence adduced having established that the respondent acted as the servant of the deceased William Rennie, and that he was benefited by her services, the legal presumption is, that she has a good claim for a reasonable and adequate remuneration on account of these services against the advocates, who are the representatives of the said William Rennie, and lucrati by his succession. 2. No circumstances sufficient to overrule this legal presumption have been proved, but, on the contrary, the expression of intention on the part of the said William Rennie to leave the respondent a legacy, and the other facts in the case, tend to confirm and strengthen the legal presumption in favour of the respondent's claim for remuneration. 3. The Sheriff's judgment is well founded upon the merits, inasmuch as the respondent has a good claim for remuneration on account of services performed to the said William Rennie during the last three years of his life; and the yearly amount of wages decerned for is fair and reasonable in the circumstances of the case.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"16th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the parties, and considered the process, Finds that the proof establishes, Imo, That the respondent served the late William Rennie as a servant during the last three years of his life: 2do, That it establishes that no wages were paid to her for this service during this period: Finds, 3to, That by law an obligation to pay wages is implied in the fact of accepting of service, unless there be circumstances which exclude this implication: Finds, 4to, That no such circumstances are established by the proof here. And 5to, That it is proved that £24 for three years is not too high wages according to the custom of the country: Therefore, on these grounds, partly of fact and partly of law, repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits to the Sheriff simpliciter: Finds the advocates liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report."

SCOTTISH JURIST.

Rennie's representatives reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—This case is certainly deserving of attention, for there is a good deal of contradictory proof. On the whole, however, I think there are principles sufficient to authorise us in supporting the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I own I have been much enlightened by the case read from Baron Hume's Decisions, p. 394. Though there are peculiarities in that case which make it differ in some respects from the present, the principle of it applies very strongly to the last three years of the pursuer's service. There are many cases where the Court have felt themselves under the necessity to award wages without any express stipulation. In this case, I think there is satisfactory proof that the pursuer was originally engaged as a servant, under a special covenant or contract between her and Rennie. Then the services which she was required to render were of a very important description. Rennie had a croft and kept cows, and it is proved that his sister, who lived with him, was quite unable, from the state of her health, to take the active management. The view that the pursuer was not sufficiently requited for her services by the lodging given to herself and child, is strongly fortified by the fact that the old man himself endeavoured, by means of a testamentary bequest, to give her a compensation. Though not drawn up formally, the document clearly indicates his intention, and I would have been pleased if it could have been sustained. On the whole, I am clearly of opinion there is sufficient evidence to satisfy us, that the pursuer's claim of wages for the last three years of her service ought to be sustained.

Lord Gillies.—The evidence is circumstantial, and by no means free from contradiction; but on the whole, I am inclined to concur with your Lordship. I feel confirmed in this opinion by the decision in Baron Hume. There some circumstances, perhaps, are more strong; some of them also are less strong than here. After the full statement of your Lordship, I don't trouble the Court with going over the evidence. The material point is, that the pursuer was a servant; that is, that she worked for Rennie as her master, and was entitled to be paid. On the whole, tota re perspecta, I think the interlocutor ought to be sustained.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, though I cannot say that the case is free from difficulty. The proof is not very satisfactory either way; but it is probable the pursuer became an inmate in Rennie's house on a general understanding that if she did service she would be fairly remunerated. No doubt she obtained lodging for herself and child, and was occasionally permitted to go out and wash for her own benefit, and for a long time it does not appear that much service was required from her, as Rennie and his sister appear to have managed in a great measure for themselves. This state of matters, however, gradually changed, and she came at last to do very much the work of an ordinary servant. Now, the only claim under consideration relates to the last three years, when her service appears to have been of this description. Both the man and his sister were old and frail, and the pursuer appears to have done all the work that was necessary. In this situation there must have been an understanding, that when she was doing the work of an ordinary servant, she was entitled to ordinary wages, under any qualification arising from circumstances. I admit that, for an ordinary servant, the sum of £8 yearly is not excessive. It is true Rennie's farm was very small; but he appears to have been a man of considerable substance. My only doubt is, whether the pursuer is to be regarded as so completely an ordinary servant as to be entitled to full ordinary wages. If she was permitted to do something for herself, there may be some ground for modification. It is not common for a servant to go away with her whole wages in her pocket; but here she is claiming the whole as clear profit, after lodging and clothing herself and child. There might, therefore, be some room for deduction; but the point is not clear, and I am not inclined to differ. On the whole, I think the claim must be sustained.

VOL. XIV.—No. XVI.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur. I think the principle of liability has been correctly laid down by your Lordship; and as to the amount, after fixing the liability, I am not disposed to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 117.—MISSSES MARGARET and JANE GRAY FARQUHAR, Claimants and Advocators, v. WILLIAM FINLAY HAMILTON, Claimant and Respondent.

Entail—Heirs-Portioners—Representation—Service—An entail having been rendered ineffectual by the succession of heirs-portioners, while the destination in favour of a series of substitutes remained unexhausted—Held that the heir in possession previous to the succession of the heirs-portioners, was subject to the fetters of the entail,—that the estate was not affectable by his debts,—and that the heirs-portioners (his sisters) had not incurred representation to him by serving to him as heirs of tailzie and provision.

After the interlocutor of the 15th of June 1841, (vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 451,) the cause returned to the Lord Ordinary, when Mr Hamilton claimed to be preferred to the whole fund in medio, on the ground that the Misses Farquhar represented their brother, and were liable for his debts. The estate of Gilmilnscroft had been settled in 1772 under strict entail,—the destination being to Alexander Farquhar (the entailor), and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to his daughter, “Jean Farquhar, and to the heirs whatsoever of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of my said present or any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to Dr William Farquhar, physician in New York, America, my brother-german,” and a series of heirs, terminating with the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the entailor. On the entailor’s death his daughter, Miss Jean Farquhar, succeeded, and made up titles under the entail. She was succeeded by her son, Colonel Gray Farquhar, who also made up titles as heir of entail, and died in 1828, leaving a son, John Gray Farquhar, and two daughters, the present claimants. John Gray Farquhar possessed under the entail till his death in 1836. As he died without issue, the succession opened to his sisters as heirs-portioners. At first, Miss Margaret Farquhar, the eldest sister, attempted to make up a title to the estate by serving as heir of tailzie to her brother; but Miss Jane Gray Farquhar having brought a reduction of this service, and the infestment following upon it, concluded to have it found and declared that she had an undoubted right “to make up titles as heir-portioner and of provision to her deceased brother in special, to her pro indiviso portion of the said lands and tenantry of Gilmilnscroft,” &c.; and farther, that the succession “having opened up to the heirs whatsoever of the said Jean Farquhar, and under that character to the heirs-portioners of the late John Gray Farquhar, the fetters imposed to the late tailzie have now become inoperative, and the pursuer and the other heir-portioners are entitled to possess and enjoy the estate in fee-simple, free from the restrictions and limitations imposed by the said deed of tailzie.” Decree having been pronounced in terms of the libel, the Misses Farquhar were served heirs-portioners and of provision to their brother, John Gray Farquhar, as the person last infest in the lands, and have made up titles to the estate of Gilmilnscroft in fee-simple.

Mr Hamilton maintained that the Misses Farquhar, by entering into possession of the lands, and drawing the rents, had incurred a representation to their brother, and had therefore no right to compete with him as their brother’s just and lawful creditor.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“3d July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process—Repels the fifth plea for the Misses Farquhar, viz., that William Finlay Hamilton is barred by the letter of his deceased father, of 8th August 1836, from claiming on the estate of the late John Farquhar: Ranks and prefers the claimant, Margaret Gray Farquhar for the sum of £22. 10. 6., being the funeral expenses of the deceased John Farquhar: Quoad ultra, ranks her and the said William Finlay Hamilton pari passu; and appoints the cause to be called, in order that it may be settled how they are to proceed towards the ascertainment of the amount of their debts: Finds no expenses due to either party.

“Note.—The Lord Ordinary has found that Mr Hamilton is not barred by the letter of 8th August 1836: he nevertheless thinks this plea by no means free from doubt.

“Hamilton’s claim for a preference is founded on the proposition, that whenever an entail is brought to an end by the succession of heirs-portioners, the estate must be considered as having been a fee-simple in the person of the immediately preceding substitute,—that the portioners take in this view as heirs of that unfettered substitute,—and that they are thus liable for his debts. The Lord Ordinary has not given effect to this plea, because, though an entail may practically terminate when the succession actually opens to heirs-portioners, he sees no principle or authority for holding that the fact of their succession operates backwards, and compels us to hold that the fetters were dissolved before they succeeded, and while the estate was possessed by the immediately previous heir.

“It may be true that when the whole line of the substitutes is exhausted, the last one having nothing but heirs whatsoever before him, is free. But heirs whatsoever and heirs-portioners are quoad hoc essentially different, especially where, as is the case here, the substitution extends beyond the heirs-portioners. So long as John Farquhar, the substitute, who stood just before the heirs-portioners, was alive, it could not be known whether that distribution of the estate, which is the practical result of the succession of such heirs, was to take place or not. John Farquhar might have had a son, or his sisters might have died or been reduced to one. In this situation, is it the law, that because the succession of heirs-portioners was probable, the heir in possession was unfettered? It is maintained for Mr Hamilton, that an heir may be fettered or unfettered contingently, and that John Farquhar was at least free quoad his sisters, because no one can enforce fetters, merely that he or she may get the estate unentailed. But contingent fettering seems to be a novelty in our law; and it is surely competent to the last substitute of the series to purge an irritancy against any previous possessor, although the clear consequence of his enforcing the entail is, that it brings the lands to him free. It is very difficult to believe that two sisters, to whom an estate is in the course of descending, under the destination in an entail, are obliged to submit to see it sold in contravention of that entail by a prior substitute, merely because, being heirs-portioners, the tailzie must become inoperative when the succession reaches them. There is no case to warrant this. And in the case of Mure, 16th February 1837, the Court in its reasoning adopts the principle of Lord Corehouse (the Ordinary), as expressed in his note, that the estate becomes a fee-simple ‘as soon as the succession opens to the heirs-female.’

Mr Hamilton reclaimed on the merits, and Miss Margaret Gray Farquhar for expenses.

When the cause came to be advised, the Court, after hearing parties, ordered minutes of debate.

Pleaded by Mr Hamilton—

By our early law, a service as heir of provision to a particular estate rendered the party universally liable for the debts of his predecessor. It was afterwards thought that a title limited to a particular estate ought not to infer a general responsibility, and it was accordingly held that the representation incurred by a service as heir of provision, should be limited to the value of the succession. To this extent it never has been doubted that service as heir of provision necessarily infers representation. In this instance, John Gray Farquhar was the heir aliouqui successoris to the maker of the entail, and when he dies without issue, his sisters, as his heirs-portioners or heirs-at-law, were entitled to succeed to all his heritable and moveable property not otherwise destined. Having served to him in this character, it seems impossible, according to the well-known rules of law, to deny that they have rendered themselves liable for their brother's debts, at least to the extent of the value of the succession. It is true that a party, who makes up a title as heir of tailzie and provision under a strict entail, incurs no representation by a service to the heir last in possession. This is the well-known statutory exception introduced by the Act 1685, as essential to give a validity to entails. It is obvious, however, that the Misses Farquhar cannot claim the benefit of it, as they have expressly repudiated the entail, and made up their title in fee-simple. Nothing can show more strongly the effect of a service as heir of provision, in establishing a passive title, than the proviso in the Act 1685, as to the mode in which an heir of entail is directed to make up his titles in case of contravention. He is to pass over the contravener, and serve to the party last infest who did not contravene. The Legislature saw no other way of enabling the heir to escape from liability for the contravener's debts, than by sanctioning a marked deviation from feudal principles, and allowing him to make up his title by passing over the person last infest in the fee. It is said that John Farquhar could not contract debts which could be made to affect the estate,—that his sisters, or even any remoter substitute, could have prevented him from doing so by a declarator of irritancy; but it is clear that the only effect of such a declarator would be, not to preserve the entail, but to bring it immediately to an end, by giving the estate to the heirs-portioners in fee-simple. And it is difficult to believe that a court of law would ever give effect to a penal irritancy, of which this was to be the necessary result. It is said that John Farquhar might have left a son or a single heir-female—that there was a possibility that heirs-portioners might not have succeeded. Admitting this, it does not affect the argument in the case which has actually occurred. There is no inconsistency in holding that a party, who is prohibited from contracting debt in a certain event, may yet be entitled to contract debt which will affect the estate, if the entail should come to an end by the succession of heirs-portioners. The prohibition against contracting debt remains effectual so long only as the entail is in force. This doctrine is well illustrated by the case of Henry v. Watt. Even supposing John Farquhar had been a fettered proprietor during his life, the entail having come to an end at his death, the estate remained in his hereditas jacens as an unfettered fee, and was consequently liable to be affected by his debts; for the question is not, whether the debts, when contracted, were struck at by the entail, but whether they can be made effectual against the estate, now that the entail is at an end? The present claimant is confident that this question must be determined in the affirmative.

Pleaded by the Misses Farquhar—

The true question to be decided is, whether the property of Gilmilnscroft was a fee-simple in the person of the late John Gray Farquhar, or continued an entailed estate in him until it was vested in his sisters? It is of importance to observe, that the clause calling the Misses Farquhar as the heirs whatsoever of Jean Farquhar, occurs in the middle of the destination, and immediately before a long series of postponed substitutes,—that the fetters of the entail are complete, and directed against all the substitutes without exception,—and that, in regard to the character in which the Misses Farquhar made up their title, it was as heirs of tailzie and provision to their brother under the destination,—the heirs whatsoever of Jean Farquhar being in fact the precise character in which both their brother and their father made up their titles. The only difference is, that in consequence of the entail's omission to exclude heirs-portioners, notwithstanding of his intention to keep up the entail throughout a long series, the succession of heirs-portioners destroyed the entail, and necessarily made the estate a fee-simple. The argument on the other side derives all its plausibility from confounding the case of heirs-portioners succeeding to an estate under a destination to heirs whatsoever, having a long series of substitutes called after them, with the case of heirs whatsoever of the last substitute called at the end of a long destination. No two cases can be more unlike. Where the last substitute of a series, to whom, and to whose heirs whatsoever, an entailed estate is destined, takes up the property, he is a fee-simple proprietor, because the clause in favour of heirs whatsoever is merely a clause of style, originally introduced to prevent the estate from falling to the Crown or superior, and used without any intention of fettering the last special substitute, or benefiting his heirs whatsoever at his expense. But if it be admitted that Gilmilnscroft was effectually entailed on Jean Farquhar and her descendants, so long as they were males, or if females not heirs-portioners, it follows necessarily that John Gray Farquhar was under the fetters of the entail; because heirs-portioners are only presumptive heirs till their immediate predecessor dies. Their succession may be disappointed at any time by the birth of an heir-male; or, when the succession opens, only one of them may be alive. It was therefore impossible, before John Farquhar's death, to know whether the succession of heirs-portioners was to take place or not. The thing, therefore, truly pleaded on the other side is, that there was a contingent fettering of John Gray Farquhar,—that in one event he was to be regarded as an entailed proprietor, and in another not,—and that his real character, which it was impossible to determine in his life, was to depend on his being succeeded by one heir, or by heirs-portioners. The strangeness and novelty of such a doctrine is sufficient for its condemnation.

At advising,

Lord Mackenzie.—The question comes to this, whether the brother held the estate free, or under the fetters of the entail? If he held it free, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is wrong,—if not, it is right. It is said that he held it free, because the heirs next in succession to him were heirs-portioners. Now, when an entailed estate comes to the heirs whatsoever, and assignees of the grantor, in the end of the destination, I understand the fetters not to affect these. But, further, I understand the fetters to be held not to be imposed in favour of them. They are viewed as thrown in merely to exclude the Crown's taking as ultimus haeres, or as a declaration, that after the entail is ended, the ordinary legal succession is to revive again, without fetters by, or privileges from the entail. In this way the heir of entail who is last before such heirs whatsoever, is regarded as the last heir of entail, and so is free of the fetters, because there is truly no heir of entail intended to be protected by fetters after him. But this is not a case of that kind at all. To come nearer to the present case, when an entailed estate actually comes to heirs-portioners, then, also, I understand the fetters to be at an end, because the Statute gives no warrant for the division of an estate, entailed and registered as one, into an indefinite number of small entailed estates. There is no provision for such a division, nor can we suppose it contemplated and intended by any entail. It is inconsistent with the whole frame of an entail. How could the fetters work if an entailed estate were held in common property or divided into half-a-dozen shares, and these again divided without limit? Or how could this preserve a family, or estate, or name? I therefore admit an entail to be at an end when the estate actually comes to heirs-portioners. But I cannot see why an entail should be at an end because it has come to the heir of entail next to heirs-female, and where there is no exclusion of heirs-portioners, but where these are not the mere heirs whatsoever at the end of the destionation, but have other heirs of entail substituted after them. For, 1st, the division may never take place; there may be but one female heir, or none: 2d, We cannot, in such case, say that the entail did not regard these contingent heirs-portioners as fit to be protected by the entailing fetters. We are sure of the contrary by the extension of the destination after the heirs-female, and the general application of the fetters to these after heirs. I cannot therefore hold the heir of entail next to presumptive heirs-portioners to be free. The entail may go on. It may overleap the heirs-portioners, and last for ages one and indivisible. And in any event, it goes to those that we cannot say were not ranked among the heirs, and protected by the entail, or that were to hold it merely as under ordinary legal succession. It is said to be a general rule, that whenever it appears that an heir of entail will be free of the fetters, the heir next before him is also free, because the after heir cannot pursue for irritancy, so as to hold the estate himself in fee-simple. But under that rule, all entails would be unavailing. The last heir is free, therefore the next to him is free, and so the next to him, back to the first in the destination. They would in this way all go free in succession,—just as in a child's game at cards, when one is knocked down, they all fall in their turn. But we can never adopt that rule. We may adopt the rule, that the heir immediately before the heirs whatsoever, and assignees of the grantor, is free; but we can do no more. We can never adopt the general rule pleaded.

Lord Fullerton.—This is a case of nicety and difficulty, and after hearing the opinions just delivered, I must, of course, express mine, which is different, with great hesitation. But I think that the heirs-portioners do represent their brother, which is in result the same as holding that he was the unfettered proprietor of the estate at the period of his death. There cannot be a doubt of the intention of the entailor. He made over the estate to the heirs-male of his own body; whom failing, his daughter, Jean Farquhar, and the heirs whatsoever of her body; whom failing, the heirs-female of her present or any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to Dr William Farquhar, &c.,—the line of succession being protected by all the prohibitions of a strict entail. He evidently considered that heirs-portioners were excluded. There was a special power to alter the succession, wherever the apparent and presumptive heirs were female, so as to "settle the estate upon a younger daughter in preference to an elder daughter." Accordingly, in the former case, depending between the eldest sister and the youngest, it was maintained that there was enough in the deed, by implication at least, to exclude heirs-portioners. But this argument was unsuccessful. It was held that heirs-portioners were not excluded; and that, consequently, the fetters had become inoperative, and the entail had come to an end. The younger daughter thus succeeded in her action, declaring that she and her sister were entitled to the estate as heirs-portioners of the late John Gray Farquhar; and titles were made up by them accordingly. The question now is, whether they represent the preceding heir, their brother; or, whether they have a right to plead the fetters of the entail against his debts. I do not think this question is solved by what the Lord Ordinary says about contingent fettering. That is no novelty. It happens in every case in which the deeds or debts of the last substitute come in question. The last substitute under an entail unquestionably holds the estate under its fetters; and it is not known until his death, whether he has the uncontrolled power of disposal or not. The true way of stating the proposition is, not that he holds the estate in fee-simple, but that, in the event of his not leaving heirs of his body, or proper heirs of entail, there is nobody in existence who can plead the fetters against him or his debts. Now, this is a thing which cannot be known till his death, just as in the present case it could not be known till the death of the late proprietor, whether he left two sisters heirs-portioners of provisions, or one a fettered heir of entail. But again, I do not mean to hold that it necessarily follows, from the circumstance of a party's not being fettered, that he cannot plead the fetters against a prior heir. I can suppose the case of fetters being laid upon one heir, for the express purpose of giving the fee-simple of the estate to another. This was the case in Henry v. Watt, where the destination was to
